

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAKE REMINISCENCES, FROM 1807 TO 1830.

BY THE ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

NO. I.—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

IN 1807 it was, at the beginning of winter, that I first saw William Wordsworth. I have already mentioned that I had introduced myself to his notice by letter as early as the spring of 1803. To this hour it has continued, I believe, a mystery to Wordsworth, why it was that I suffered an interval of four and a half years to slip away before availing myself of the standing invitation with which I had been honoured to the poet's house. Very probably he accounted for this delay by supposing that the new-born liberty of an Oxford life, with its multiplied enjoyments, acting upon a boy just emancipated from the restraints of a school, and, in one hour, elevated into what we Oxonians so proudly and so exclusively* denominate a "man," might have tempted me into pursuits alien from the pure intellectual passions which had so powerfully mastered my youthful heart some years before. Extinguished such a passion could not be; nor could he think, if remembering the fervour with which I had expressed it, the sort of "nympholepsy" which had seized upon me, and which, in some imperfect way, I had avowed with reference to the very origin of lakes and mountains, amongst which the scenery of this most original poetry had chiefly grown up and moved. The very names of the ancient hills—Fairfield, Seat Sandal, Helvellyn, Blencathara, Glaramara; of the sequestered glens—such as Borrowdale, Martindale, Mardale, Wasdale, and Ennerdale; but, above all, the shy pastoral recesses, not garishly in the world's eye, like Windermere or Derwentwater, but lurking half unknown to the traveller of that day—Grasmere, for instance, the lovely abode of the poet himself, solitary, and yet sowed, as it were, with a thin diffusion of humble dwellings—here a scattering, and there a clustering, as in the starry heavens—sufficient to afford, at every turn and angle, human remembrances and memorials of time-honoured affections, or of passions, (as the "Churchyard amongst the Mountains" will amply demonstrate)—not wanting even in scenic and tragical interest:—these were so many local spells upon me, equally poetic and elevating with the Miltonic names of Valdarno and Vallombrosa, whilst, in addition to that part of their power, they had a separate fascination, under the anticipation that very probably I might here form personal ties which would for ever connect me with their sweet solitudes by powers deep as life and awful as death. Oh! sense of mysterious pre-existence, by which, through years in which as yet a stranger to these valleys of Westmoreland, I viewed myself as a phantom-self—a second identity projected from my own consciousness, and already living amongst them!—how was it, and by what prophetic instinct, that already I said to myself oftentimes, when chasing day-dreams along the pictures of these wild mountainous labyrinths, which as yet I had not traversed—Here, in some distant year, I shall be shaken with love, and there with stormiest grief?—whence was it that sudden revelations came upon me, like the drawing-up of a curtain, and closing again as rapidly, of scenes that made the future heaven of my life?—and how was it that in thought I was and yet in reality was not a denizen, already, in 1803–4–5, of lakes and forest lawns which I never saw till 1807?—and that, by a prophetic instinct of the heart, I rehearsed and lived over, as it were, in vision, those chapters of my life which have carried with them the weightiest burthen of joy and sorrow, and by the margin of those very lakes and hills with which I prefigured this connexion?—and, in short, that for me, by a transcendent

* At the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, where the town is viewed as a mere ministerial appendage to the numerous colleges—the civic Oxford, for instance, existing for the sake of the academic Oxford, and not vice versa—it has naturally happened that the students honour with the name of "a man," him only who wears a cap and gown. The word is not used with any reference to physical powers, or to age; but simply to the final object for which the places are supposed to have first arisen, and to maintain themselves. There is, however, a ludicrous effect produced, in some instances, by the use of this term in contradistinguishing parties. "Was he a man?" is a frequent question; and as frequent in the mouth of a stripling under nineteen, speaking, perhaps, of a huge, elderly tradesman—"Oh, no! not a man at all."

“In To-day already walked To-morrow?”

Deep are the voices which seem to call, deep is the lesson which would be taught even to the most thoughtless of men, by “any gladsome field of earth” which he may chance to traverse, if (according to the supposition* of Wordsworth) that field, so gay to him,

_____“could render back the sighs

To which it hath responded;”

_____“or could echo the sad steps

By which it hath been trod.”

But, if this recall of the real be affecting, much more so to me is this aerial and shadowy anticipation of the future, when looked back upon from far distance through a multitude of years, and when confirmed for the great outlines of its sketches by the impassioned experience of life. Why I should have done so, I can hardly say; but that I did—even before I had visited Grasmere, and whilst it was almost certain, from the sort of channel in which my life seemed destined to flow, that London would be the central region of my hopes and fears—even then I turned to Grasmere and its dependencies as knit up, in some way as yet unknown, with my future destinies. Of this, were it not that it would wear a superstitious air, I could mention a very memorable proof from the records of my life in 1804, full three and a half years before I saw Grasmere. However, I allude to that fact in this place by way of shewing that Oxford had not weaned my thoughts from the northern mountains and their great inhabitants; and that my delay was due to anything rather than to waning interest. On the contrary, the real cause of my delay was the too great profundity, and the increasing profundity, of my interest in this regeneration of our national poetry; and the increasing awe, in due proportion to the decaying thoughtlessness of boyhood, which possessed me for the character of its author. So far from neglecting Wordsworth, it is a fact (and Professor Wilson—who, without knowing me in those or for many subsequent years, shared my feelings towards both the poetry and the poet—has a story of his own experience somewhat similar, to report)—it is a fact, I say, that twice I had undertaken a long journey expressly for the purpose of paying my respects to Wordsworth; twice I came so far as the little rustic inn (at that time the sole inn of the neighbourhood) at Church Coniston—the village which stands at the north-western angle of Coniston Water; and on neither occasion could I summon confidence enough to present myself before him. It was not that I had any want of proper boldness for facing the most numerous company of a mixed or ordinary character: reserved indeed I was, and too much so, perhaps even shy—from the character of my mind, so profoundly meditative, and the character of my life, so profoundly sequestered: but still, from counteracting causes, I was not deficient in a reasonable self-confidence towards the world generally. But the very image of Wordsworth, as I prefigured it to my own planet-struck eye, crushed my faculties as before Elijah or St Paul. Twice, as I have said, did I advance as far as the Lake of Coniston, which is about eight miles from the church of Grasmere, and once I absolutely went forwards from Coniston to the very gorge of Hammerscar, from which the whole vale of Grasmere suddenly breaks upon the view in a style of almost theatrical surprise, with its lovely valley stretching in the distance, the lake lying immediately below, with its solemn boat-like island of five acres in size, seemingly floating on its surface; its exquisite outline on the opposite shore, revealing all its little bays and wild sylvan margin, feathered to the edge with wild flowers and ferns. In one quarter, a little wood, stretching for about half a mile towards the outlet of the lake, more directly in opposition to the spectator; a few green fields; and beyond them, just two bowshots from the water, a little white cottage gleaming from the midst of trees, with a vast and seemingly never-ending series of ascents, rising above it to the height of more than three thousand feet. That little cottage was Wordsworth's from the time of his marriage, and earlier—in fact, from the beginning of the century to the year 1808. Afterwards, for many a year, it was mine. Catching one hasty glimpse of this loveliest of landscapes, I retreated like a guilty thing, for fear I might be surprised by Wordsworth, and then returned faint-heartedly to Coniston, and so to Oxford, re infectâ. This was in 1806. And thus far, from mere excess of nervous distrust in my own powers for sustaining a conversation with Wordsworth, I had, for nearly five years, shrunk from a meeting for which, beyond all things under heaven, I longed. These, the reader will say, were foolish feelings. Why, yes; perhaps they were; but they had a laudable foundation; for I carried my modesty to a laughable excess undoubtedly; but yet it was modesty which co-operated with other feelings to produce my foolish panic. I had lived in profounder solitude than can have fallen to the lot of many people, which arose from the unusual defect of sympathy I found in all around me; and this solitude gave a preternatural depth to my master feelings, which originally were deep enough; and, to speak phrenologically, the organ of veneration must have received an inordinate development in my case. However, say what one can for it, no doubt my conduct was very absurd; and I began to think so myself. I fancied continually a plain, honest, old relative saying to me—“Let the man be a god even, he will shew himself very little of a good one if he is not satisfied with a devotion such as yours. You offer him almost a blamable adoration. What more can he require? And if more he does require, hang me if I wouldn't think myself too good for any man's scorn; and, after one trial of it, I would wish him good morning for ever.” Still I witnessed a case where a kind of idol had, after all, rejected an idolator that did not offer a splendid triumph to his pride; and with the additional cruelty of slighting this worshipper in behalf of one more brilliant, who seemed in great doubt whether he should admire or not. And, although I thought better of Mr Wordsworth's moral nature than to suppose it possible for him to err in this extent, or even with this kind of insolence, yet I could not reconcile myself to the place of an humble admirer, valued, perhaps, for the right direction of his feelings, but practically neglected in behalf of some more gifted companion, who might have the power (which much I feared that I should never have) of talking to him on something like equal terms, as respected the laws and principles of poetry. I could bear well enough to be under-valued, or even openly scorned; for, said I to myself, it is the lot of every man in this world to be scorned by somebody; and also, to balance that misfortune, every man has a chance of one worshipper. "I," says Sir Andrew Aguecheek—"I was adored once." Yes, even Aguecheek had his one adorer; and there is not that immeasurable fool in this world, but that (according to La Fontaine's consolatory doctrine) he has a fair chance for finding "un plus grand sot que lui-même." But, with all this equanimity in my expectation and demands, philosophically as I could have reconciled myself to contempt, there was a limit. People there were in this world whose respect I could not dispense with: people also there have been in this world (alas! alas!) whose love was to me no less indispensable. Have it I must, or life would have had no value in my eyes. Was I then so deficient in conversational power that I could not hope to acquit myself respectably? In that respect, it is a singularity in which (if I may presume, even for a defect, to compare myself with so great a man) I resembled Wordsworth—namely, that in early youth I laboured under a peculiar embarrassment and penury of words, when I sought to convey my thoughts adequately upon interesting subjects: neither was it words only that I wanted; but I could not unravel, I could not even make perfectly conscious to myself, or properly arrange the subsidiary thoughts into which one leading thought often radiates; or, at least, I could not do this with anything like the rapidity requisite for conversation. I laboured like a Sibyl instinct with the burden of prophetic wo, as often as I found myself dealing with any topic in which the understanding combined with deep feelings to suggest mixed and tangled thoughts: and thus partly—partly also from my invincible habit of reverie—at that era of my life, I had a most distinguished talent "pour le silence." Wordsworth, from something of the same causes, suffered (by his own report to myself) at the same age from pretty much the same infirmity. And yet, in more advanced years—probably about twenty-eight or thirty—both of us acquired a remarkable fluency in the art of unfolding our thoughts colloquially. However, at that period my deficiencies were what I have described. And after all, though I had no absolute cause for anticipating contempt, I was so far right in my fears, that since that time I have had occasion to perceive a worldly tone of sentiment in Wordsworth, not less than in Mrs Hannah More and other literary people, by which they were led to set a higher value upon a limited respect from a person high in the world's esteem, than upon the most lavish spirit of devotion from an obscure quarter. Now, in that point, my feelings are far otherwise; and, though it is praising myself to say so, yet say it I must, because it is mere truth—that, if a fool were so far to honour me as to profess, in Sir Andrew Aguecheek's phrase, even to "adore" me—yes, though it were Sir Andrew himself—I should say, "My poor fool! thy adoration will do me but little good in this world; yet, to know that thy whole heart's wealth is given up to me, that forces me to value thy homage more than I would that of Solomon in all his glory." Meantime, the world went on; events kept moving; and, amongst them, in the course of 1807, occurred the event of Mr Coleridge's return to England from his official station in the Governor's family at Malta; my introduction to his acquaintance at Bridgewater, where he was then (summer of 1807) visiting, together with his family, amongst old Somersetshire friends; his subsequent journey to Bristol, near which (at the Hotwells) I was then staying with a female relation; and, finally, upon discovering that he was anxious to put his wife and children under some friendly escort, on their return homewards to Keswick, (he himself being summoned to execute an engagement to lecture at the Royal Institution during the coming winter,) I offered to unite with Mrs Coleridge in a post-chaise to the north. My offer was readily accepted, and, at the latter end of October, we set forwards—Mrs Coleridge, viz., with her two surviving sons—Hartley, aged nine, the oldest; Derwent, about seven—her beautiful little daughter, about five; and, finally, myself. Going by the direct route through Gloucester, Bridgewater, &c., on the third day we reached Liverpool, where I took up my quarters at a hotel, whilst Mrs Coleridge paid a visit of a few days to a very interesting family, friends of Southey. These were the Misses Koster, daughters of an English gold merchant of celebrity, who had recently quitted Portugal on the approach of the French army under Junot. Mr Koster did me the honour to call at my quarters, and invite me to his house; an invitation which I very readily accepted, and had thus an opportunity of becoming acquainted with a family the most accomplished I had ever known. At dinner, there appeared only the family party, several daughters, and one son, a fine young man of twenty, but who was consciously dying of asthma. Mr Koster, the head of the family, was distinguished for his good sense and practical information; but, in Liverpool, still more so by his eccentric and obstinate denial of certain notorious events; in particular, he denied that any such battle as Talavera had ever been fought, and had a large wager depending upon the result. His house was the resort of distinguished foreigners ; and, on the first evening of my dining there, as well as afterwards, I there met, for the first time and for the last, that marvel of women, Madame Catalani. I had heard her repeatedly ; but never before been near enough to see her smile and converse—even to be honoured with a smile myself. She and Lady Hamilton were the most effectively brilliant women I ever saw. However, on this occasion, the Miss Kesters outshone even la Catalani ; to her they talked in the most fluent Italian ; to some foreign men, in Portuguese ; to one, in French ; and to most of the party in English ; and each, by turns, seemed to be their native tongue. Nor did they shrink, even in the presence of the mighty enchantress and syren, from exhibiting their musical skill.

From Liverpool, after about a week's delay, we pursued our journey northwards. We had slept on the first day at Lancaster. Consequently, at the rate of motion which then prevailed throughout England—which, however, was rarely equalled on that road, where all things were in arrear by comparison with the eastern and southern roads of the kingdom—we naturally enough found ourselves, about three o'clock in the afternoon, at Ambleside, fourteen miles to the north of Kendal, and thirty-six from our sleeping quarters. There, for the last time, we stopped to change horses, a ceremony which then took half an hour ; and, about four o'clock, we found ourselves on the summit of the White Moss, a hill which rises between the second and third mile-stones on the stage from Ambleside to Keswick, and which then retarded the traveller's advance by a full fifteen minutes, but is now evaded by a lower line of road. In ascending this hill, from weariness of moving so slowly, I, with the two Coleridges, had alighted ; and, as we all chose to stretch our legs by running down the hill, we had left the chaise behind us, and had even lost the sound of the wheels at times, when, all at once, we came at an abrupt turn of the road, in sight of a white cottage, with two solemn yew-trees breaking the glare of its white walls. A sudden shock seized me on recognising this cottage, of which, in the previous year, I had gained a momentary glimpse from Hammerscar, on the opposite side of the lake. I paused, and felt my old panic returning upon me ; but just then, as if to take away all doubt upon the subject, I saw Hartley Coleridge, who had gained upon me considerably during my pause of hesitation, suddenly turn in at a garden gate ; and, just then, the chaise, which had been rattling furiously down the descent, according to the invariable practice of Westmoreland drivers, (for in Westmoreland they never lock down the steepest descents, and therefore rightly keep up their horses at a flying gallop,) suddenly turned a corner of the road and came into sight ; at the same moment Mrs Coleridge waved her hand from one of the front windows ; and the direction of this motion to the right, at once confirmed me in my belief that here at last we had reached our port ; that this little cottage was tenanted by that man whom, of all the men from the beginning of time, I most fervently desired to see ; that, in less than a minute, I should meet Wordsworth face to face. Coleridge was of opinion that, if a man were really and consciously to see an apparition—supposing, I mean, the case to be a physical possibility that a spiritual essence should be liable to the action of material organs—in such circumstances death would be the inevitable result ; and, if so, the wish which we hear so commonly expressed for such experience is as thoughtless as that of Semele in the Grecian Mythology, so natural in a female, that her lover should visit her en grand costume, and “with his tail on”—presumptuous ambition, that unexpectedly wrought its own ruinous chastisement ! Judged by Coleridge's test, my situation could not have been so terrific as his who anticipates a ghost—for, certainly, I survived this meeting ; but, at that instant, it seemed pretty much the same to my own feelings. Never before or since can I reproach myself with having trembled at the approaching presence of any creature that is born of woman, excepting only, for once or twice in my life, woman herself ; now, however, I did tremble ; and I forgot, what in no other circumstances I could have forgotten, to stop for the coming up of the chaise, that I might be ready to hand Mrs Coleridge out. Had Charlemagne and all his Peerage been behind me, or Cæsar and his equipage, or Death on his pale horse, I should have forgotten them at that moment of intense expectation, and of eyes fascinated to what lay before me, or what might in a moment appear. Through the little gate I pressed forward ; ten steps beyond it lay the principal door of the house. To this, no longer clearly conscious of my own feelings, I passed on rapidly ; I heard a step, a voice, and, like a flash of lightning, I saw the figure emerge of a tallish man, who held out his hand, and saluted me with the most cordial manner, and the warmest expression of friendly welcome that it is possible to imagine. The chaise, however, drawing up to the gate at that moment, he (and there needed no Roman nomenclator to tell me that this he, the owner of this noble countenance, was Wordsworth) felt himself summoned, as master of the hospitalities on the occasion, to advance and receive Mrs Coleridge. I, therefore, stunned almost with the actual accomplishment of a catastrophe so long anticipated and so long postponed, mechanically went forward into the house. A little semi-vestibule between two doors prefaced the entrance into what might be considered the principal room of the cottage. It was an oblong square, not above eight and a half feet high, sixteen feet long, and twelve broad ; very prettily wainscotted from the floor to the ceiling with dark polished oak, slightly embellished with carving. One window there was—a perfect and unpretending cottage window, with little diamond panes, enobled, at almost every season of the year, with roses ; and, in the summer and autumn, with a profusion of jessamine and other fragrant shrubs. From the exuberant luxuriance of the vegetation around it, and from the dark hue of the wainecotting, this window, though tolerably large, did not furnish a very powerful light to one who entered from the open air. However, I saw sufficiently to be aware of two ladies just entering the room, from a doorway opening upon a little staircase. The foremost, a tall young woman, with the most winning expression of benignity upon her features that I had ever beheld, made a slight curtsey, and advanced to me, presenting her hand with so frank an air that all embarrassment must have fled in a moment before the native goodness of her manner. This was Mrs Wordsworth, cousin of the poet; and, for the last five years or more, his wife. She was now mother of two children, a son and a daughter; and she furnished a remarkable proof how possible it is for a woman, neither handsome nor even comely, according to the rigour of criticism—nay, generally pronounced very plain—to exercise all the practical power and fascination of beauty, through the mere compensatory charms of sweetness all but angelic, of simplicity the most entire, womanly self-respect, and purity of heart speaking through all her looks, acts, and movements. Words, I was going to have added; but her words were few. In reality, she talked so little that Mr Slave-Trade Clarkson used to say of her that she could only say “God bless you!” Certainly her intellect was not of an active order; but, in a quiescent, reposing, meditative way, she appeared always to have a genial enjoyment from her own thoughts; and it would have been strange indeed if she, who enjoyed such eminent advantages of training, from the daily society of her husband and his sister, not only hearing the best parts of English literature daily read, or quoted by short fragments, but also hearing them very often critically discussed in a style of great originality and truth, and by the light of strong poetic feeling—strange it would have been had any person, though dull as the weeds of Lethe in the native constitution of his mind, failed to acquire some power of judging for himself, and putting forth some functions of activity. But undoubtedly that was not her element: to feel and to enjoy in a luxurious repose of mind—there was her forte and her peculiar privilege; and how much better this was adapted to her husband’s taste, how much more adapted to uphold the comfort of his daily life, than a blue-stocking loquacity, or even a legitimate talent for discussion and analytic skill, may be inferred from his celebrated verses, beginning—

“She was a phantom of delight
When first she gleam’d upon my sight;”

and ending with this matchless winding-up of an intellectual homage, involving a description of an almost ideal wife—

“A perfect woman, nobly plann’d
To warn, to comfort, to command;
And yet!”

going back to a previous thought, and resuming a leading impression of the whole character—

“And yet a spirit too, and bright
With something of an angel light.”

From these verses, I say, it may be inferred what were the qualities which won Wordsworth’s admiration in a wife; for these verses were written upon Mary Hutchinson, his own cousin, and his wife; and not written, as Coleridge’s movable verses upon “Sara,” for some forgotten original Sara, and subsequently transferred to every other Sara who came across his path. Once for all, these exquisite lines were dedicated to Mrs Wordsworth; were understood to describe her—to have been prompted by the feminine graces of her character; hers they are, and will remain for ever. To these, therefore, I may refer the reader for an idea, by infinite degrees more powerful and vivid than I could give him, of what was most important in the partner and second self of the poet. And I shall add to this abstract of her moral portrait these few concluding traits of her appearance in a physical sense. She was tall—that I have already said; her figure was good—except that, for my taste, it was rather too slender, and so it always continued. In complexion she was fair; and there was something peculiarly pleasing even in this accident of the skin, for it was accompanied by an animated expression of health, a blessing which, in fact, she possessed uninterruptedly, very pleasing in itself, and also a powerful auxiliary of that smiling benignity which constituted the greatest attraction of her person. “Her eyes”—the reader may already know—“her eyes—

Like twilight, too, her dark brown hair;
But all things else about her drawn
From May-time and the cheerful dawn.”

But strange it is to tell that, in these eyes of vespertine gentleness, there was a considerable obliquity of vision; and much beyond that slight obliquity which is often supposed to be an attractive foible of the countenance: and yet, though it ought to have been displeasing or repulsive, in fact it was not. Indeed all faults, had they been ten times more and greater, would have been swallowed up or neutralized by that supreme expression of her features, to the intense unity of which every lineament in the fixed parts, and every undulation in the moving parts, or play of her countenance, concurred—viz., a sunny benignity—a radiant gracefulness—such as in this world I never saw equalled or approached.

Here, then, the reader has a sketch of Mrs Wordsworth. Immediately behind her, moved a lady, much shorter, much slighter, and perhaps, in all other respects, as different from her in personal characteristics as could have been wished, for the most effective contrast. “Her face was of Egyptian brown;” rarely, in a woman of English birth, had I seen a more determinate gipsy tan. Her eyes were not soft, as Mrs Wordsworth’s, nor were they fierce or bold; but they were wild and startling, and hurried in their motion. Her manner was warm and even ardent; her sensibility seemed constitutionally deep; and some subtle fire of impassioned intelleet apparently burned within her, which, being alternately pushed forward into a conspicuous expression by the irrepressible instincts of her temperament, and then immediately checked, in obedience to the decorum of her sex and age, and her maidenly condition, (for she had rejected all offers of marriage, out of pure sisterly regard to her brother and his children,) gave to her whole demeanour and to her conversation, an air of embarrassment and even of self-conflict, that was sometimes distressing to witness. Even her very utterance and enunciation often, or rather generally, suffered in point of clearness and steadiness, from the agitation of her excessive organic sensibility, and, perhaps, from some morbid irritability of the nerves. At times, the self-counteraction and self-baffling of her feelings, caused her even to stammer, and so determinately to stammer that a stranger who should have seen her and quitted her in that state of feeling, would have certainly set her down for one plagued with that infirmity of speech, as distressingly as Charles Lamb himself. This was Miss Wordsworth, the only sister of the poet—his “Dorothy;” who naturally owed so much to the life-long intercourse with her great brother, in his most solitary and sequestered years; but, on the other hand, to whom he has acknowledged obligations of the profoundest nature; and, in particular, this mighty one, through which we also, the admirers and the worshippers through every age of this great poet, are become equally her debtors—that whereas the intellect of Wordsworth was, by its original tendencies, too stern—too austere—too much enamoured of an ascetic harsh-sublimity, she it was—the lady who paced by his side continually through sylvan and mountain tracks, in Highland glens, and in the dim recesses of German charcoal-burners—that first couched his eye to the sense of beauty—humanized him by the gentler charities, and engrafted, with her delicate female touch, those graces upon the ruder growths of his nature, which have since clothed the forest of his genius with a foliage corresponding in loveliness and beauty to the strength of its boughs and the massiness of its trunks. The greatest deductions from Miss Wordsworth’s attractions, and from the exceeding interest which surrounded her in right of her character, her history, and the relation which she fulfilled towards her brother, was the glancing quickness of her motions, and other circumstances in her deportment, (such as her stooping attitude when walking,) which gave an ungraceful, and even an unsexual character to her appearance when out of doors. She did not cultivate the graces which preside over the person and its carriage. But, on the other hand, she was a person of very remarkable endowments intellectually; and, in addition to the other great services which she rendered to her brother, this I may mention, as greater than all the rest, and it was one which equally operated to the benefit of every casual companion in a walk—viz., the exceeding sympathy, always ready and always profound, by which she made all that one could tell her, all that one could describe, all that one could quote from a foreign author, reverberate as it were, d plusieurs reprises, to one’s own feelings, by the manifest impression it made upon her. The pulses of light are not more quick or more inevitable in their flow and undulation, than were the answering and echoing movements of her sympathizing attention. Her knowledge of literature was irregular, and not systematically built up. She was content to be ignorant of many things; but what she knew and had really mastered, lay where it could not be disturbed—in the temple of her own most fervid heart. In whatever I say or shall say of Miss Wordsworth, the reader may understand me to have the entire sanction and concurrence of Professor Wilson. We both knew Miss Wordsworth well; and we heartily agreed in admiring her.

Such were the two ladies, who, with himself and two children, and at that time one servant, composed the poet’s household. They were both somewhere about twenty-eight years old; and, if the reader inquires about the single point which I have left untouched in their portraiture—viz., the style of their manners—I may say that it was in some points, naturally of a plain household simplicity, but every way pleasing, unaffected, and (as respects Mrs Wordsworth) even dignified. Few persons had seen so little as this lady of the world. She had seen nothing of high life, for she had seen none at all. Consequently, she was unacquainted with the conventional modes of behaviour, prescribed in particular situations by high breeding. But, as these modes are little more than the product of dispassionate good sense, applied to the circumstances of the case, it is surprising how few deficiencies are perceptible, even to the most vigilant eye—or, at least, essential deficiencies—in the general demeanour of any unaffected young woman, acting habitually under a sense of sexual dignity, courtesy, pure tastes, and elegant enjoyments, assisted by the daily counsel and revision of a masculine intellect, in the person of a brother or a husband. Miss Wordsworth had seen most of life, and even of good company; for she had lived, when quite a girl, under the protection of a near relation at Windsor, who was a personal favourite of the royal family, and especially of George III. Consequently she ought to have been the more polished of the two; and yet, from greater natural aptitudes for refinement of manner in her sister-in-law, and partly, perhaps, from her more quiet and subdued manner, Mrs Wordsworth would have been pronounced the more lady-like person.

From the interest which attaches to every person so nearly connected as these two ladies with a great poet, I have allowed myself a larger latitude than else might have been justifiable in describing them. I now go on with my narrative:—

I was ushered up a little flight of stairs, fourteen in all, to a little dining-room, or whatever the reader chooses to call it. Wordsworth himself has described the fire-place of this as his

It was not fully seven feet six inches high, and, in other respects, pretty nearly of the same dimensions as the rustic hall below. There was, however, in a small recess, a library of perhaps 300 volumes, which seemed to consecrate the room as the poet's study and composing room; and so occasionally it was. But far oftener he both studied, as I found, and composed on the high road. I had not been two minutes at the fireside, when in came Wordsworth, returning from his friendly attentions to the travellers below, who, it seemed, had been over-persuaded by hospitable solicitations to stay for this night in Grasmere, and to make out the remaining thirteen miles of their road to Keswick on the following day. Wordsworth entered. And "what-likes"—to use a Westmoreland, as well as a Scottish expression—"what-likes" was Wordsworth? A reviewer in Tait's Magazine,* in noticing some recent collection of literary portraits, gives it as his opinion that Charles Lamb's head was the finest amongst them. This remark may have been justified by the engraved portraits; but, certainly, the critic would have cancelled it had he seen the original heads—at least, had he seen them in youth or in maturity; for Charles Lamb bore age with less disadvantage to the intellectual expression of his appearance than Wordsworth, in whom a sanguine, or rather coarse complexion, (or rather not complexion, properly speaking, so much as texture of flesh,) has, of late years, usurped upon the original bronzed tint and finer skin; and this change of hue and change in the quality of skin, has been made fearfold more conspicuous, and more unfavourable in its general effect, by the harsh contrast of grizzled hair which has displaced the original brown. No change in personal appearance ever can have been so unfortunate; for, generally speaking, whatever other disadvantages old age may bring along with it, one effect, at least, in male subjects, has a compensating tendency—that it removes any tone of vigour too harsh, and mitigates the expression of power too unsubdued. But, in Wordsworth, the effect of the change has been to substitute an air of animal vigour, or, at least, hardness, as if derived from constant exposure to the wind and weather, for the fine, sombre complexion which he once had, resembling that of a Venetian senator or a Spanish monk. Here, however, in describing the personal appearance of Wordsworth, I go back, of course, to the point of time at which I am speaking. To begin with his figure:—Wordsworth was, upon the whole, not a well-made man. His legs were pointedly condemned by all the female connoisseurs in legs that ever I heard lecture upon that topic; not that they were bad in any way which would force itself upon your notice—there was no absolute deformity about them; and undoubtedly they had been serviceable legs beyond the average standard of human requisition; for I calculate, upon good data, that with these identical legs Wordsworth must have traversed a distance of 175 to 180,000 English miles—a mode of exertion which, to him, stood in the stead of wine, spirits, and all other stimulants whatsoever to the animal spirits; to which he has been indebted for a life of unclouded happiness, and we for much of what is most excellent in his writings. But, useful as they have proved themselves, the Wordsworthian legs were certainly not ornamental; and it was really a pity, as I agreed with a lady in thinking, that he had not another pair for evening dress parties—when no boots lend their friendly aid to masque our imperfections from the eyes of female rigourists—the elegantes formarum spectatrices. A sculptor would certainly have disapproved of their contour. But the worst part of Wordsworth's person was the bust: there was a narrowness and a droop about the shoulders which became striking, and had an effect of meanness when brought into close juxtaposition with a figure of a most statuesque order. Once on a summer morning, walking in the vale of Langdale with Wordsworth, his sister, and Mr J——, a native Westmoreland clergyman, I remember that Miss Wordsworth was positively mortified by the peculiar illustration which settled upon this defective conformation. Mr J——, a fine towering figure, six feet high, massy and columnar in his proportions, happened to be walking, a little in advance, with Wordsworth; Miss Wordsworth and myself being in the rear; and from the nature of the conversation which then prevailed in our front rank, something or other about money, devises, buying and selling, we of the rear-guard thought it requisite to preserve this arrangement for a space of three miles or more; during which time, at intervals, Miss W—— would exclaim, in a tone of vexation, "Is it possible?—can that be William? How very mean he looks!" and could not conceal a mortification that seemed really painful, until I, for my part, could not forbear laughing outright at the serious interest which she carried into this trifle. She was, however, right as regarded the mere visual judgment. Wordsworth's figure, with all its defects, was brought into powerful relief by one which had been cast in a more square and massy mould; and in such a case it impressed a spectator with a sense of absolute meanness, more especially when viewed from behind, and not counteracted by his countenance; and yet Wordsworth was of a good height, just five feet ten, and not a slender man; on the contrary, by the side of Southey his limbs looked thick, almost in a disproportionate degree. But the total effect of Wordsworth's person was always worst in a state of motion; for, according to the remark I have heard from many country people, "he walked like a cade"—a cade being some sort of insect which advances by an oblique motion. This was not always perceptible, and in part depended (I believe) upon the position of his arms; when either of these happened (as was very customary) to be inserted into the unbuttoned waistcoat, his walk had a wry or twisted appearance; and not appearance only—for I have known it, by slow degrees, gradually

to edge off his companion from the middle to the side of the highroad.* Meantime, his face—that was one which would have made amends for greater defects of figure; it was certainly the noblest for intellectual effects that, in actual life, I have seen, or at least have consciously been led to notice. Many such, or even finer, I have seen amongst the portraits of Titian, and, in a later period, amongst those of Vandyke, from the great era of Charles I., as also from the court of Elizabeth and of Charles II.; but none which has so much impressed me in my own time. Haydon, the eminent painter, in his great picture of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, has introduced Wordsworth in the character of a disciple attending his Divine Master. This fact is well known; and, as the picture itself is tolerably well known to the public eye, there are multitudes now living who will have seen a very impressive likeness of Wordsworth—some consciously, some not suspecting it. There will, however, always be many who have not seen any portrait at all of Wordsworth; and therefore I will describe its general outline and effect. It was a face of the long order, often falsely classed as oval; but a greater mistake is made by many people in supposing the long face, which prevailed so remarkably in the Elizabethan and Carolinian periods, to have become extinct in our days. Miss Ferrier, in one of her brilliant novels, ("Marriage," I think,) makes a Highland girl protest that "no Englishman with his round face" shall ever wean her heart from her own country; but England is not the land of round faces—and those have observed little indeed who think so: France it is that grows the round face, and in so large a majority of her provinces that it has become one of the national characteristics. And the remarkable impression which an Englishman receives from the prevalence of the eternal orb of the human countenance, proves of itself, without any conscious testimony, how the fact stands; in the blind sense of a monotony, in this respect not usual elsewhere, lies involved an argument that cannot be gainsaid. Besides receiving this evidence from positive experience, even upon an à priori argument, how is it possible that the long face so prevalent in England, by all confession, in certain splendid eras of our history, should have had time, in some five or six generations, to grow extinct? Again, the character of face varies essentially in different provinces. Wales has no connexion in this respect with Devonshire, nor Kent with Yorkshire, nor either with Westmoreland. England, it is true, tends beyond all known examples to a general amalgamation of differences by means of its unrivalled freedom of intercourse. Yet even in England, law and necessity have opposed as yet such and so many obstacles to the free diffusion of labour, that every generation occupies by at least five-sixths of its numbers the ground of its ancestors. The movable part of a population is chiefly the higher part; and it is the lower classes that, in every nation, compose the fundus, in which lies latent the national face as well as the national character. Each exists here in racy purity and integrity, not disturbed in the one by alien intermarriages, nor in the other by novelties of opinion or other casual effects derived from education and reading. Now, look into this fundus, and you will find, in many districts, no such prevalence of the round orbicular face as some people erroneously suppose: and in Westmoreland especially, the ancient long face of the Elizabethan period, powerfully resembling in all its lineaments the ancient Roman face, and often (though not so uniformly) the face of northern Italy in modern times. The face of Sir Walter Scott, as Irving, the pulpit orator, once remarked to me, was the indigenous face of the Border: the mouth, which was bad, and the entire lower part of the face, are seen repeated in thousands of working men's; or, as Irving chose to illustrate his position, "in thousands of Border horse-jockeys." In like manner, Wordsworth's face was, if not absolutely the indigenous face of the Lake district, at any rate a variety of that face, a modification of that original type. The head was well filled out; and there, to begin with, was a great advantage over the head of Charles Lamb, which was absolutely truncated in the posterior region—sawn off, as it were, by no timid sawyer. The forehead was not remarkably lofty—and, by the way, some artists, in their ardour for realizing their phrenological preconceptions, not suffering nature to surrender quietly and by slow degrees, her own alphabet of signs, and characters, and hieroglyphical expressions, but forcing her language prematurely into a conformity with their own crude speculations, have given to Sir Walter Scott a pile of forehead which is displeasing and cataphysical, in fact a caricature of anything that is ever seen in nature, and would (if real) be esteemed a deformity; in one instance, that which was introduced in some annual or other, the forehead makes about two thirds of the entire face. Wordsworth's forehead is also liable to caricature misrepresentations, in these days of phrenology; but, whatever it may appear to be in any man's fanciful portrait, the real living forehead, as I have been in the habit of seeing it for more than five-and-twenty years, is not remarkable for its height; but it is perhaps remarkable for its breadth and expansive development. Neither are the eyes of Wordsworth "large," as I have been erroneously stated somewhere in "Peter's Letters;" on the contrary, they are (I think) rather small; but that does not interfere with their effect, which at times is fine and suitable to his intellectual character. At times, I say, for the depth and subtlety of eyes varies exceedingly with the state of the stomach; and, if young ladies were aware of the magical transformations which can be wrought in the depth and sweetness of the eye by a few weeks' walking exercise, I fancy we should see their habits in this point altered greatly for the better. I have seen Wordsworth's eyes oftentimes affected powerfully in this respect; his eyes are not, under any circumstances, bright, lustrous, or piercing; but, after a long day's toil in walking, I have seen them assume an appearance the most solemn and spiritual that it is possible for the human eye to wear. The light which resides in them is at no time a superficial light; but, under favourable accidents, it is a light which seems to come from depths below all depths; in fact, it is more truly entitled to be held "The light that never was on land or sea," a light radiating from some far spiritual world, than any the most idealizing light that ever yet a painter's hand created. The nose, a little arched, and large, which, by the way, (according to a natural phrenology, existing centuries ago amongst some of the lowest amongst the human species,) has always been accounted an unequivocal expression of animal appetites organically strong. And that was in fact the basis of Wordsworth's intellectual power: his intellectual passions were fervent and strong; because they rested upon a basis of animal sensibility superior to that of most men, diffused through all the animal passions (or appetites); and something of that will be found to hold of all poets who have been great by original force and power, not (as Virgil) by means of fine management and exquisite artifice of composition applied to their conceptions. The mouth, and the region of the mouth, the whole circumjacenties of the mouth, were about the strongest feature in Wordsworth's face; there was nothing specially to be noticed that I know of, in the mere outline of the lips; but the swell and protrusion of the parts above and around the mouth, are both noticeable in themselves, and also because they remind me of a very interesting fact which I discovered about three years after this my first visit to Wordsworth. Being a great collector of everything relating to Milton, I had naturally possessed myself, whilst yet very young, of Richardson the painter's thick octavo volume of notes on the "Paradise Lost." It happened, however, that my copy, in consequence of that mania for portrait collecting which has stripped so many English classics of their engraved portraits, had no picture of Milton. Subsequently I ascertained that it ought to have had a very good likeness of the great poet; and I never rested until I procured a copy of the book, which had not suffered in this respect by the fatal admiration of the amateur. The particular copy offered to me was one which had been priced unusually high, on account of the unusually fine specimen which it contained of the engraved portrait. This, for a particular reason, I was exceedingly anxious to see; and the reason was—that, according to an anecdote reported by Richardson himself, this portrait, of all that was shewn to her, was the only one acknowledged, by Milton's last surviving daughter, to be a strong likeness of her father. And her involuntary gestures concurred with her deliberate words:—for, on seeing all the rest, she was silent and inanimate; but the very instant she beheld this from a crayons drawing which embellishes the work of Richardson, she burst out into a rapture of passionate recognition; exclaiming—"This is my father! this is my dear father!" Naturally, therefore, after such a testimony, so much stronger than any other person in the world could offer to the authentic value of this portrait, I was eager to see it.

* In our Westmoreland highroads, which are so fortunate as to have little breadth beyond that of lanes, there is no side-path, not even on approaching towns; consequently everybody walks at large upon the carriage track.

Judge of my astonishment when, in this portrait of Milton, I saw a likeness nearly perfect of Wordsworth, better by much than any which I have since seen, of those expressly painted for himself. The likeness is tolerably preserved in that by Carruthers, in which one of the little Rydal waterfalls, &c., composes a back-ground; yet this is much inferior, as a mere portrait of Wordsworth, to the Richardson head of Milton; and this, I believe, is the last which represents Wordsworth in the vigour of his power. The rest, which I have not seen, may be better as works of art, (for anything I know to the contrary,) but they must labour under the great disadvantage of presenting the features when "defeatured," in the degree and the way I have described, by the idiosyncrasies of old age, as it affects this family; for it is noticed of the Wordsworths, by those who are familiar with their peculiarities, that, in their very blood and constitutional differences, lie hidden causes, able, in some mysterious way—

"Those shocks of passion to prepare
That kill the bloom before its time,
And blanch, without the owner's crime,
The most resplendent hair."

Some people, it is notorious, live faster than others; the oil is burned out sooner in one constitution than another—and the cause of this may be various; but, in the Wordsworths' one part of the cause is, no doubt, the secret fire of a temperament too fervid; the self-consuming energies of the brain, that gnaw at the heart and life-strings for ever. In that account which "The Excursion", presents to us of an imaginary Scotsman, who, to still the tumult of his heart, when visiting the "forces" (i. e., cataracts) of a mountainous region, obliges himself to study the laws of light and colour, as they affect the rainbow of the stormy waters; vainly attempting to mitigate the fever which consumed him, by entangling his mind in profound speculations; raising a cross-fire of artillery from the subtilizing intellect, under the vain conceit that, in this way, he could silence the mighty battery of his impassioned brain—there we read a picture of Wordsworth and his own youth. In Miss Wordsworth, every thoughtful observer might read the same self-consuming style of thought. And the effect upon each was so powerful for the promotion of a premature old age, and of a premature expression of old age, that strangers invariably supposed them fifteen to twenty years older than they were. And I remember Wordsworth once laughingly reporting to me, on returning from a short journey in 1809, a little personal anecdote, which sufficiently shewed what was the spontaneous impression upon that subject of casual strangers, whose feelings were not confused by previous knowledge of the truth. He was travelling by a stage coach, and seated outside, amongst a good half-dozen of fellow-passengers. One of these, an elderly man, who confessed to having passed the grand climacterical year (9 multiplied into 7) of 63, though he did not say precisely by how many years, said to Wordsworth, upon some anticipations which they had been mutually discussing of changes likely to result from enclosures, &c., then going on or projecting—"Ay, ay, another dozen of years will shew us strange sights; but you and I can hardly expect to see them." "How so?" said W. "Why, my friend, how old do you take me to be?" "Oh, I beg pardon," said the other; "I meant no offence—but what?" looking at W. more attentively—"you'll never see threescore, I'm of opinion." And, to shew that he was not singular in so thinking, he appealed to all the other passengers; and the motion passed, nem. con. that Wordsworth was rather over than under sixty. Upon this he told them the literal truth—that he had not yet accomplished his thirty-ninth year. "God bless me!" said the climacterical man; "so then, after all, you'll have a chance to see your childer get up like, and get settled! God bless me, to think of that!" And so closed the conversation, leaving to W. a pointed expression of his own premature age, as revealing itself by looks, in this unaffected astonishment, amongst a whole party of plain men, that he should really belong to a generation of the forward-looking, who live by hope; and might reasonably expect to see a child of seven years old matured into a man.

Returning to the question of portraits, I would observe, that this Richardson engraving of Milton has the advantage of presenting, not only by far the best likeness of Wordsworth, but of Wordsworth in the prime of his powers—a point so essential in the case of one so liable to premature decay. It may be supposed that I took an early opportunity of carrying the book down to Grasmere, and calling for the opinions of Wordsworth's family upon this most remarkable coincidence: Not one member of that family but was as much impressed as myself with the accuracy of the likeness. All the peculiarities even were retained—a drooping appearance of the eyelids, that remarkable swell which I have noticed about the mouth, the way in which the hair lay upon the forehead. In two points only there was a deviation from the rigorous truth of Wordsworth's features—the face was a little too short and too broad, and the eyes were too large. There was also a wreath of laurel about the head, which (as Wordsworth remarked) disturbed the natural expression of the whole picture; else, and with these few allowances, he also admitted that the resemblance was, for that period of his life, (but let not that restriction be forgotten,) perfect, or as nearly so as art could accomplish.

I have gone into so large and circumstantial a review of my recollections in a matter that would have been trifling and tedious in excess, had their recollection related to a less important man; but, with a certain knowledge that the least of them will possess a lasting and a growing interest in connexion with William Wordsworth—a man who is not simply destined to be had in everlasting remembrance by every generation of men, but (which is a modification of the kind worth any multiplication of the degree) to be had in that sort of remembrance which has for its shrine the heart of man—that world of fear and grief, of love and trembling hope, which constitutes the essential man; in that sort of remembrance, and not in such a remembrance as we grant to the ideas of a great philosopher, a great mathematician, or a great reformer. How different, how peculiar, is the interest which attends the great poets who have made themselves necessary to the human heart; who have first brought into consciousness, and next have clothed in words, those grand catholic feelings that belong to the grand catholic situations of life, through all its stages; who have clothed them in such words that human wit despairs of bettering them! How remote is that burning interest which settles upon men's living memories in our daily thoughts, from that which follows, in a disjointed and limping way, the mere nominal memories of those who have given a direction and movement to the currents of human thought, and who, by some leading impulse, have even quickened into life speculations appointed to terminate in positive revolutions of human power over physical agents! Mighty were the powers, solemn and serene is the memory, of Archimedes; and Apollonius shines like "the starry Galileo," in the firmament of human genius; yet how frosty is the feeling associated with these names by comparison with that which, upon every sunny bae, by the side of every ancient forest, even in the farthest depths of Canada, many a young innocent girl, perhaps, at this very moment—looking now with fear to the dark recesses of the infinite forest, and now with love to the pages of the infinite poet, until the fear is absorbed and forgotten in the love—cherishes in her heart for the name and person of Shakspeare! The one is abstraction, and a shadow recurring only by distinct efforts of recollection, and even thus to none but the enlightened and the learned; the other is a household image, rising amongst household remembrances, never separated from the spirit of delight, and hallowed by a human love! Such a place in the affections of the young and the ingenuous, no less than of the old and philosophic, who happen to have any depth of feeling, will Wordsworth occupy in every clime and in every land; for the language in which he writes, thanks be to Providence, which has beneficently opened the widest channels for the purest and most elevating literature, is now ineradicably planted in all quarters of the earth; the echoes under every latitude of every longitude now reverberate English words; and all things seem tending to this result—that the English and the Spanish languages will finally share the earth between them. Wordsworth is peculiarly the poet for the solitary and the meditative; and, throughout the countless myriads of future America and future Australia, no less than Polynesia and Southern Africa, there will be situations without end fitted by their loneliness to favour his influence for centuries to come, by the end of which period it may be anticipated that education (of a more enlightened quality and more systematic than yet prevails) may have wrought such changes on the human species, as will uphold the growth of all philosophy, and, therefore, of all poetry which has its foundations laid in the heart of man. Commensurate with the interest in the poetry will be a secondary interest in the poet—in his personal appearance, and his habits of life, so far as they can be supposed at all dependent upon his intellectual characteristics; for, with respect to differences that are purely casual, and which illustrate no principle of higher origin than accidents of education or chance position, it is a gossiping taste only that could seek for such information, and a gossiping taste that would choose to consult it. Meantime, it is under no such gossiping taste that volumes have been written upon the mere portraits and upon the possible portraits of Shakspeare; and how invaluable should we all feel any record to be, which should raise the curtain upon Shakspeare's daily life—his habits, personal and social, his intellectual tastes, and his opinions on contemporary men, books, events, or national prospects! I cannot, therefore, think it necessary to apologize for the most circumstantial notices past or to come of Wordsworth's person and habits of life. But one thing it is highly necessary that I should explain, and the more so because a grand confession which I shall make at this point, as in some measure necessary to protect myself from the appearance of a needless mystery and reserve, would, if unaccompanied by such an explanation, expose me to the suspicion of having, at times, yielded to a private prejudice, so far as to colour my account of Wordsworth with a spirit of pique or illiberality. I shall acknowledge then, on my own part—and I feel that I might even make the same acknowledgment on the part of Professor Wilson, (though I have no authority for doing so)—that to neither of us, though, at all periods of our lives, treating him with the deep respect which is his due, and, in our earlier years, with a more than filial devotion—nay, with a blind loyalty of homage, which had in it, at that time, something of the spirit of martyrdom, which, for his sake, courted even reproach and contumely; yet to neither of us has Wordsworth made those returns of friendship and kindness which most firmly I maintain that we were entitled to have challenged. More by far in sorrow than in anger—sorrow that points to recollections too deep and too personal for a transient notice—I acknowledge myself to have been long alienated from Wordsworth; sometimes even I feel a rising emotion of hostility—nay, something, I fear, too nearly akin to vindictive hatred. Strange revolution of the human heart! strange example of the changes in human feeling that may be wrought by time and chance! to find myself carried by the great tide of affairs, and by error, more or less, on one side or the other, either on Wordsworth's in doing too little, or on mine in expecting too much—carried so far away from that early position which, for so long a course of years, I held in respect to him—that now, for that fountain of love towards Mr Wordsworth and all his household—fountain profound—fountain inexhaustible—

“Whose only business was to flow—
And flow it did, not taking heed,
Of its own bounty or their need”— now, I find myself standing aloof, gloomily granting (because I cannot refuse) my intellectual homage, but no longer rendering my tribute as a willing service of the heart, or rejoicing in the prosperity of my idol! Could I have believed, twenty-five years ago, had a voice from Heaven revealed it, that, even then, with a view to what time should bring about, I might adopt the spirit of the old verses, and, apostrophizing Wordsworth, might say—Great Poet! when that day, so fervently desired, shall come, that men shall undo their wrongs, and when every tongue shall chant thy praises, and every heart “Devote a wreath to thee—

That day (for come it will) that day Shall I lament to see.”

But no; not so. Lament I never did; nor suffered even “the hectic of a moment” to sully or to trouble that purity of perfect pleasure with which I welcomed this great revolution in the public feeling. Let me render justice to Professor Wilson; as well as to myself: not for a moment, not by a solitary movement of reluctance or demur, did either of us hang back in giving that public acclamation which we, by so many years, had anticipated; yes, we singly—we with no sympathy to support us from any quarter. The public press remains, with its inexorable records, to vouch for us, that we paid an oriental homage, homage as to one who could have pleaded antique privilege, and the consecration of centuries, at a time when the finger of scorn was pointed at Mr Wordsworth from every journal in the land; and that we persisted in this homage at a period long enough removed to have revolutionized the public mind, and also long enough to have undermined the personal relations between us of confidential friendship. Did it ask no courage to come forward, in the first character, as solitary friends, holding up our protesting hands amidst a wilderness of chattering buffoons? Did it ask no magnanimity to stand firmly to the post we had assumed, not passively acquiescing in the new state of public opinion, but exulting in it and aiding it, long after we had found reason to think ourselves injuriously treated? Times are changed; it needs no courage, in the year of our Lord 1839, to discover and proclaim a great poet in William Wordsworth; it needed none in the year 1815, to discover a frail power in the French empire, or an idol of clay and brass in the French Emperor. But, to make the first discovery in the years 1801–2, the other in 1808, those things were worthy of honour; and the first was worthy of gratitude from all the parties interested in the event. Let me not, however, be misunderstood—Mr Wordsworth is a man of unimpeached, unimpeachable integrity: he neither has done, nor could have done, consciously, any act in violation of his conscience. On the contrary, I am satisfied, Professor Wilson is satisfied, that injuries of a kind to involve an admitted violation of principle, cannot have occurred in Mr Wordsworth's intercourse with any man. But there are cases of wrong for which the conscience is not the competent tribunal. Sensibility to the just claims of another, power to appreciate these claims, power also to perceive the true mode of conveying and expressing the appreciation—in a case, suppose, where the claims to consideration are at once real, and even tangible, as to their ground, yet subtle and aerial as to the shape they have assumed—claims, for instance, founded on a personal devotion to the interests of the other party, when the rest of the world slighted them—this mode of appreciating skill may be utterly wanting, or may be crossed and thwarted by many a conflicting bias, where the conscience is quite incapable of going astray. I imagine a case such as this which follows:—The case of a man who, for many years, has connected himself closely with the domestic griefs and joys of another, over and above his primary service of giving to him the strength and the encouragement of a profound literary sympathy, at a time of universal scowling from the world; suppose this man to fall into a situation in which, from want of natural connexions and from his state of insulation in life, it might be most important to his feelings that some support should be lent to him by a family having a known place and acceptance, and what may be called a root in the country, by means of connexions, descent, and long settlement. To look for this, might be a most humble demand on the part of one who had testified his devotion in the way supposed. To miss it might—But enough. I murmur not; complaint is weak at all times; and the hour is passed irrevocably, and by many a year, in which an act of friendship so natural, and costing so little, (in both senses so priceless,) could have been availing. The ear is deaf that should have been solaced by the sound of welcome. Call, but you will not be heard; shout aloud, but your “ave!” and “all hail!” will now tell only as an echo of departed days, proclaiming the hollowness of human hopes. I, for my part, have long learned the lesson of suffering in silence; and also I have learned to know that, wheresoever female prejudices are concerned, there it will be a trial more than Herculean, of a man's wisdom, if he can walk with an even step, and swerve neither to the right nor the left.

I shall now proceed to sketch the daily life and habits of those who are familiarly known to the public as the Lake poets; but, first of all, as a proper introduction to this sketch, I shall trace, in a brief outline, the chief incidents in the life of William Wordsworth, which are interesting not only in virtue of their illustrious subject, but also as exhibiting a most remarkable (almost a providential) arrangement of circumstances, all tending to one result—that of insulating from worldly cares, and carrying onward from childhood to the grave, in a state of serene happiness, one who was unfitted for daily toil, and, at all events, who could not, under such demands upon his time and anxieties, have prosecuted those genial labours in which all mankind have an interest.

“Brennus disoit aux bons Gaulois.”—BRANGER.

’Twas Brennus that spoke to the gallants of Gaul—
Now make ye a triumph, the crowning of all;
My darling has won a rich guerdon from Rome—
For a slip of the vine, boys, I bring with me home.
Hurrah for the vine! which in Gaul shall combine
Wit, valour, and love, boys—hurrah for the vine!

Long, long did we pine for the glorious draught;
We fought and we conquered; we conquered and quaffed.
The delicate tendrils, by dale and by down
Upspringing, shall furnish our victory's crown.
Hurrah, &c.

Our country, of these ruby clusters possessed,
Shall be envied of nations—north, south, east, and west;
Their juice, with the fire of the sunbeam all rife,
To poetry, painting, and music give life.
Hurrah, &c.

And ships, from the ports of this high-favoured shore,
In thousands shall wander the wide ocean o'er;
And, laden with wine and encircled with flowers,
Shall teach climes far distant the raptures of ours.
Hurrah, &c.

Ye fair ones! who rule with such absolute sway,
As ye polish our armour, bedimmed in the fray,
Your white hands the heavenly nectar shall pour,
And our wounds and our labours find one solace more.
Hurrah, &c.

So live we, united in heart and in mind;
And, in dark days of danger, our foemen shall find
That to rout them no deadlier weapons we want
Than the slender supports of this exquisite plant.
Hurrah, &c.

Great king of the grape! thee, to brighten her days,
A nation, frank, hearty, and generous, prays;
Make the exile, condemned from his country to roam,
Forget at our feasts, for a moment, his home.
Hurrah, &c.

Then Brennus called blessings on far and on near;
He hollowed the earth at his feet with his spear;
He planted the vine; and the Gauls, in a trance,
Looked forward, through time, to the glories of France.
Hurrah for the vine! which in Gaul shall combine
Wit, valour, and love, boys—hurrah for the vine!

HOW DO POOR MEN LIVE?

THE solution of the grave problem which forms the heading of this paper, will, we fear, be found more difficult than many that are submitted, by their College tutors, to the ingenious youth training for legislators. How the poor of our fellow-creatures live, is an inquiry pressing on all men pretending to be Christians and philanthropists; but it is the special duty of legislators and rulers not only to know how the great mass of the People live, but to see that they subsist in a condition that may prevent any reasonable cause of discontent. The comfort of the People, and the tranquillity of the State, are blessings intimately bound together, and which ought to be inseparable.

The steady growth, and the late manifestations, of popular discontent, are creating alarm among the wealthy, and not without some reason, when the causes of the general discontent are examined; for where one individual is dissatisfied from being refused the electoral franchise, there are, we fear, ten men and women, including, among the number, many of those who demand the suffrage, that are clamorous from the mere pressure of physical distress. It may not be to the credit of the intelligence of the lower orders; but we apprehend that, if our rulers, whether Whig or Tory, could contrive to raise the labouring poor to anything approaching a condition of physical comfort, they might be assured for a long term against any alarming consequences from political discontent. The seasons are beyond their control; but to remove the greedy, cruel, and insulting taxes and prohibitions on food*—imposed for the temporary benefit of the landowners, to the manifest injury of every other class, and the incalculable suffering of the largest, the least protected, and the most important class of all—is in their power; as well as to lighten the unequal pressure of our enormous taxation upon the lower class.

Some perilous crisis, if not anarchical revolution, can only be averted by the timely adoption of real reforms—by such financial arrangements as may tend to equalize the pressure of taxation, which in any event will always press heavily upon the basis classes—and by sweeping away the unwise, unholy, and most irritating imposts on food, with the restrictions on its supply. A pause, a breathing-time, might then be gained, to be employed in the political and moral regeneration of the People; and never until the labouring poor are rendered more comfortable in their circumstances, by enjoying a larger share of the fruits of their industry, can this breathing-time, this season for sending the nation to school, be obtained. They must be able to live before they are able to learn. Education is not the work of a year, nor yet of a generation. We admire the arrangement of a charity-school in the Catholic town of Galway, described by Mr Inglis. The first thing given to the scholars, and before any lessons begin, is a hearty breakfast of stirabout. Nations must be educated on the same principle. As matters now stand, it may be said that the promise of God has failed in the British isles, and that men are no longer able, by the sweat of their brow, to earn their bread; that it is a necessary law of society, that the rewards of industry should diminish, in proportion as its capabilities and exertions are increased.

One alarming symptom of the present popular discontents, is, that the mass of the poor have no accredited leaders in whose wisdom and integrity they may with safety confide. They despise the Whigs, and they abhor the Tories; that is, where they indulge political feelings at all: for, while they clamour after such men as Mr Oastler, it does not appear that any leader has much wholesome influence among them, or any that is likely to be either beneficial or permanent. But such considerations lead to a wider range of speculation than we propose to take. We do not mean to enter into political discussion; but to adhere to the mystery involved in the narrow text, "How do poor men live."

We apprehend this mystery was as clearly solved as the case admits, by the poor woman, who, when the question was put to her, probably by a poor-law assistant-commissioner, replied—"Lord bless you! we do not live, we only bide!" Many of the poor of England cannot, indeed, be said to live—they merely exist. "The children of the poor," says Charles Lamb, "are not brought up, but dragged up." It fares little better with their maturity. At best, they only make shift to live—always lacking, or sorely pinched in those things necessary to the comfortable subsistence of civilized men; and this chiefly—and now they know it—because a large proportion of their earnings is seized and divided between the government and the landed aristocracy.—But the Government must have revenue. True: but whence should it be principally derived? Is property not to pay the full rate of its own insurance?—And the landlords must have their rents. Yes: but how much more than their fair rent is wrung from the sweat of the poor by the Bread-meat-butter-and-cheese Tax?*

* The Corn-Laws is a misnomer for what is generally signified by them—namely, the Taxes on Food. It should be familiarly known to every man, and woman, and child, who earns a shilling by the sweat of the brow, and in laying it out in food, gives at least 3d. to the landowners, who are the law-makers, that it is not bread, not corn alone, that is directly taxed for the landowners' benefit, but all sorts of food. For example, fine new Dutch butter is now selling in the city in which we write at 10d. a-pound; but the import duty upon this butter is 25 per cent., which, were it an article of free trade, as it is one of universal consumption, might be bought for 7½d. a-pound. Foreign cheese is so heavily taxed that cheese for which the working-man pays 6d. a pound could be bought for 4d. The present duty on ham is, we believe, 28s. per hundred-weight. But there is also strict prohibition on the importation

While the Whigs were in the flush of popularity, and striving to be popular at small expense, a number of little books came forth under the patronage of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, labouring to prove the physical condition of the labouring poor of England one of superior comfort to that of any other people in Europe—a fact every day contradicted by the experience, and nearly the concurrent testimony, of travellers and statista. The other great object of these publications, was to shew that, whatever suffering and privation the labouring class is liable to, was the consequence of their own idleness, intemperance, and want of providence; or of their imprudent marriages, and bad domestic management. These little books contained also much sensible and good advice; but such as can be followed only by those who, deriving something like an adequate income from the wages of labour, have the power to manage economically, and to make savings. The chief lesson which the operatives require, is not how to accumulate, but how they are to gain such an amount of wages as, without starvation, admits of saving. And how small a minority is this of the whole labouring population! The advice to the great majority should have been, in the first place, how to save, by securing the fruits of their labour, and not by pinching back and belly, to save out of that part of their earnings which the tax-gatherer and the landowner leave them. To this class, the great majority of all labourers, economical advice was not much needed, poverty being a severe teacher. How to make the shilling left do its own work and also that of the one taken by the tax-gatherer and the landowner—how to procure two loaves, or two pounds of meat, (if poor men are to be allowed meat,) or two bushels of coals, when the labourer from his wages can only command the price of one—is the question.

It was neither Cobbett, nor Owen, nor any Radical visionary or incendiary whatsoever, but a zealous friend of all our institutions and of the established order of things, but, at the same time, a humane and well-intentioned man, who, speculating on the mystery of How poor men live, deprecating the vitiated old Poor-laws, and scheming how to better the condition of the labourer, gravely said—

“It is a melancholy truth—and the concealment of it will prevent the correction of the evil—that the poor of England are not properly fed.” But has the condition of the poor improved either in food or in clothing since this was asserted by Sir Thomas Bernard? Few will deny that it has deteriorated within that period—now about forty years—the condition of the manufacturing poor immensely, and that of the agricultural population in a considerable degree. By means of even the limited and imperfect diffusion of education—through Lancasterian, National, and Sunday Schools, Dissenting preachers, popular lecturers, newspapers, and cheap publications—knowledge has increased, especially in the more populous localities; and it has borne its natural fruits in improved habits of living among the poor, and, we would fain hope, in amelioration of morals. But the poor of England are neither better fed, nor clothed, nor sheltered, than when Sir Thomas Bernard wrote what we have cited; and until, by the fruits of their industry, they can be “properly fed,” they never will be, they never ought to be, a contented people:—an educated, a moral, and consequently a happy people, they never can be. Pinching poverty is as much opposed to the growth of virtue and civilization in societies as in families and individuals. But for none of the irritating and painful symptoms of poverty do rulers ever seem to care, save for open discontent. If the producers will only keep their poverty and rags within their cottages and cellars, all goes well; and they are most liberally allowed post obit bills on heaven for whatever has been unjustly wrested from them here. The strong ass, so long as he patiently coucheth between his two burthens, is declared the best-conditioned brute imaginable, and well-deserving his way-side thistle, —if he will seek it out for himself, and economize when he has found it.

It is a favourite topic of declamation with Alarmists and Conservatives, that education and discontent have spread together. This was foreseen by those old Tories who judiciously opposed education in all shapes, and every mode of instruction save the weekly sermon of the Established clergyman, as hostile to those principles of Government, of which the prop is popular ignorance and unquestioning submission.

of all kinds of fresh meat, beef, pork, mutton, &c., and a duty on eggs and fresh fruits. From Belgium and Holland, and the opposite coasts of France, the daily and hourly supply of untaxed provisions to our great towns, by means of steamers and railways, would have an instant effect in reducing prices which we need not describe. The Corn-Laws, then, popularly mean the Mouth-Tax, the Trencher-and-pot tax, the Food-impost. They comprehend the butter, the cheese, the ham, the hung-beef, the egg-and-poultry imposts, fastened upon the industry of the country, for the immediate benefit of the landowners, and for their ultimate injury. These laws mean as well the candle and soap laws, as the import duty which enhances the price of meat raises that of tallow; so that soap and candles are first taxed in the raw material, and then excised when manufactured. Let us, then, give the Corn-Laws their true designation—the MOUTH-TAX, the FOOD-IMPOST. Men live not by bread alone, nor yet, in this country, by any one necessary which escapes the landowners. Along with engravings and models of the different sizes of the loaf which is of equal price in despotic Russia, revolutionary France, and in free and happy England, where the poor man's house is his castle, however slenderly it may be provisioned, there should be, side by side, engravings and models of hams, cheeses, and tubs of butter, all so “beautifully lean,” for equivalent sums of Englishmen's money.

It is worse than idle to waste one more word upon British landowners. On this subject, they are given over to the curse of judicial blindness. In laboriously undermining the manufactures and trade of their country, while they half-starve their countrymen, they must be left to kill the goose that laid them golden eggs in their own way. Their sin will find them out: or the sins of the fathers must be visited upon the children, if the iniquity last so long.

It were futile to deny that discontent has increased, and will increase, with the spread of knowledge and education. It is the certain result; and this state of things must go on, until discontent is vanquished by the redress of every detected grievance, and, above all, by the removal of the evil of extreme poverty in the midst of the plenty produced, and capable of being much farther produced, by the industry, skill, and enterprise, of the whole members of a community, pursuing, each member in his own sphere of action, a common interest. The mass of the people of this country have, at this moment, the conviction riveted into their minds, that the interests of the higher, and, what is more to be lamented, of the middle orders, is diametrically opposed to their interests; that they must be ground to dust, in order that the capitalists and farmers may become wealthy, that the rich may live in luxury, and the great maintain their magnificence. With so plain a case as the Tax on Food, independently of every other inequality of privilege, glaring upon them, how is it possible for working-men not to feel, in the bitterness of their hearts, that the world, if not made for Cæsar, is by Cæsar usurped and plundered? While the labouring class knew no better than that they were born to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, they might be patient. Now content is no longer possible:—but, if full justice will scarcely satisfy their demands, how shall injustice and oppression? If the political axiom hold, that states are secure in proportion as the great mass of the people are contented with their situation, and, consequently, attached to the institutions of the country, what shall be said of the present condition of Great Britain and Ireland? In many of the despotic states of Europe, there is certainly far more contentment and security; because the physical condition of the people of the continental nations is always relatively, and often actually better. They may have less wages; but with toil less incessant, they possess a greater command over the necessities, and many of the comforts of life, as these are estimated in the society in which they live; and it must be borne in mind, that their elevation has kept steady pace with that of the middle class, while, in England, the middle class has advanced much more rapidly, in proportion, than the labouring class.

The basis of all effectual reform we hold to be the amelioration of the physical condition of the great body of the population; and the question, which is only one of time, is, Whether they are to look for this great step towards justice and improvement from their rulers, or to force it for themselves, by obtaining a real, not a mock control over their own affairs. It is worse than idle—it is insulting as unwise—to talk of the necessity of improving their own habits, and training their children aright, to ill-fed, over-worked, and harassed men and women, driven, by a sense of misery or actual inanition, to snatch whatever indulgence offers itself, indifferent to consequences, and callous at length to the strongest as to the tenderest affections of their nature. It is to accomplish this reform, which they know must originate with themselves, and which they believe never will be yielded by their task-masters, that the more intelligent of the working class now sink every consideration in the demand for direct control over their affairs through Extended or Universal Suffrage. They waive, unwisely we think, even the question of the immediate abolition of the Food-Tax, at a time when the seasons and the elements second the righteous demand, that they may obtain the instrument of all the reforms necessary to their well-being. They justly deem those political changes unsubstantial and useless which do not promote the comfort of their firesides: but for this they are contented to wait; and one may guess the extent of the sacrifice, and the importance which they attach to the Suffrage, when we see what they are ready to endure in the meanwhile to obtain that great instrument of salvation, free and direct representation. Like greater politicians, they seek, in the language of Burke, for “a power—what workmen call a purchase—to enable them to gain their end.”

In the meanwhile, How poor men live—how they keep soul and body together—is the standing miracle which few regard. From the late reports of statisticians—though they are always more or less inaccurate, and, moreover, generally disposed to err on the flattering side—the average wages of artisans in towns may be rated, at the very highest, at £1 per week; and we believe that, if times of dull trade and want of employment were taken into account, 15s. would be much nearer the truth. We say this confidently, as there are many callings—such, for examples, as that of printers—where, although 30s. or £2 may be gained by hard work and night-work when work is plentiful, a settled yearly wage of 18s. or 20s. would be preferred by a prudent compositor. And the same must hold of trades in which the wages are lower—such as those of carpenters or shoemakers. It holds, almost invariably, that in those callings where wages are very high, employment is fluctuating, so as to reduce all ordinary artisans to a nearer level of income than is at first apparent. And in how many trades do the workmen, for a few years, increase their wages by spending their capital—namely, their health, vigour, and skill—untimely worn out? If a working man must spend his whole wages as he goes along in the necessary maintenance of his family—and, alas! how seldom does that little all suffice for its comfortable subsistence!—if he make no accumulation against the evil day, he is assuredly living upon and exhausting his capital; that which ought to be stored against the season, not merely of fluctuation in trade, and sickness, but of diminished strength and ability of labour, and finally against decrepitude, old age, and the workhouse. A provision for his widow or his children is not to be thought of. But all this expended capital goes to swell the nominal amount of his wages in the days of his youth and his prime. Thus the average of 20s. a-week * in towns, is far too high a rate to take; but we shall, nevertheless, assume it. The average for the agricultural population may, at the utmost, be 10s. This seems to be the amount, or rather more, fixed by the Poor-Law Reports and other documents, and it also is too high. When the numbers of a family are assumed as data in economical calculation, five appears the golden mean—a man, his wife, and not five, nor seven, nor nine—very common numbers in a poor man's family—but three children. The average of the wages of agricultural labour in Ireland is not half that of England; 5s. upon the whole year would drive the Irish peasant mad with whisky and prosperity, and 12s. is an equally high average of wages for mechanics and handicraftsmen in that country. Yet how the peasantry of Ireland live, is, when the different habits of the people are considered, less wonderful to us than the mystery of existence among the very poor, but still the decent householders of both the countries; those who wear shoes, and stockings, and hats, all the year round, who use knives and forks, towels, brushes, and even bed and table linen; who sometimes see a cheap periodical or a newspaper, subscribe to a library, and pay for a pew in a church; perhaps give the pastor, the schoolmaster, or the priest, his dues; and contribute their mite to some purpose of benevolence.

The little books, published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, give us no help in making household estimates. They point out how surplus may be applied in Savings' banks, &c. and how much the weekly saving of a shilling, or any number of shillings, bearing compound interest, will amount to in a given number of years. We have, therefore, no guide save knowledge and experience. The only estimate we can find in these books, is one borrowed from the economical work of Mr James Luckcock of Birmingham,—and it can be of little use to working men, as it applies to an income of £400 expended in providing for a family of six persons, two of them being maid-servants.

We have to deal with an income about the eighth part of that sum, but which must maintain five persons. A work on domestic economy, published some years ago by Colburn, contains numerous household estimates—and the lowest income estimated, is exactly one shilling more than our sum, or 21s. a-week. We are content to throw that shilling into the total, which thus makes net 3s. 6d. a-day for every working-day in the year, and now give the particulars of the weekly bill:—

The framer of this estimate states, that he knows it to be low; but then there are many families in the country, whose incomes are even less than is here premised, to whom his statement must apply. He is quite right. It is not too much to say that the incomes of two-thirds of the aggregate families of the producers of Great Britain and Ireland are lower, probably to the extent of one-half. If Ireland be included, certainly fully one-half. It is framed on data given by a mechanic of Bristol, who, as coals are cheap there, consumes more, and yet saves on that article what affords him, now and then, "a dobbin of ale for himself;" and a brewer's servant in Norwich, who has three young children, and yet saves something out of 21s. a-week, "because he is determined to save." Granting that the allowance of bread, flour, and meat, here given is sufficient, which we think it is, we must notice that the price is too low—2½d. or 3d. for bread and flour is much nearer the mark.* Again, butter, cheese, and milk, in a family where there are three children, much of whose daily food should be milk, is far too low for healthful nurture. A quart per day is the smallest quantity that should be allowed for such a family, and this alone in London would cost 1s. 9d., and from 1s. 2d. to 1s. 5½d. in the country. It is to be observed, that in this estimate there is neither tea, coffee, nor any sort of groceries or condiments. Coals are estimated too low, in quantity, for comfort and domestic use, though in some localities the sum of 1s. 9d. is more than sufficient. One of the greatest blessings of the working-man's family, is being located in a coal district. There was a time in "merry England" when wood might have been had for the gathering; but such a thing is now hardly known. No woman or child can now enter a wood to pick up sticks but on trespass, if they do not commit a misdemeanour.

* There are various statements from which we could form a tolerably accurate estimate of the rate of wages of mechanics. We take those subjoined from the Report of the Poor-Law Commissioners, founded on facts collected by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce in 1832, when wages were rather higher than at present, and provisions much cheaper. Ironfounders, from 28s. to 30s.; Dyers and Dressers, 15s. to 20s.; Tailors, 18s.; Shoemakers, 15s. to 16s.; Whitesmiths, 22s. to 24s.; Stone-masons, 18s. to 22s.; Bricklayers, 17s. to 20s.; Painters, 18s.; Plasterers, 19s. to 21s.; Sawyers, 24s. to 28s.; Machine-makers, 24s. to 26s. The wages of manufacturers are much lower—generally 13s. to 14s. Spinners, 20s.; and in one high department, Stretchers, 25s. to 26s. The average wages of the Miners of Salop appear, by the Report of the Poor-Law Commissioners, to have been for the last twenty years—Holers, 2s. 3½d.; Tinsmen, 2s. 9½d. per day. At these iron-works, Blacksmiths gain 3s. 6d. a-day; Engineers, 3s. 6d.; Joiners and Carpenters, 3s.; Pattern-Makers, 4s. 6d. The state of the Colliers, in the same county, is dismal. Their wages are not high; they are often out of employment, and unfit for any other kind of labour. They begin hard-work (men's work) at eighteen; and, about forty-five, fall off. Their habits are bad and improvident; and it must be owned that the nature and accidents of their calling tend to make them so. Nearly all trades are liable to some peculiar disease, which often affects the constitution very early. Rheumatism and asthma, and pulmonary affections, are the diseases of the Collier and Miner, arising from damp, bad air, and dust; and so liable are they to accidents, that this return states, out of one hundred, seventy-five would, in thirty years meet with slight accidents, fifteen would be wholly disabled, and ten killed. Out of twenty deaths of male persons, in the seven years before the Report was made, sixteen were from accidents. At sixty, the agricultural labourer will be as able to follow his employment as the miner at forty or forty-five—from forty to fifty they are generally labouring under asthma, with all the appearances of premature old age. But in many occupations besides the miner, nothing can be more fallacious than the prosperity indicated by the apparent high rate of wages, when the precarious and deleterious nature of the employment is examined. The evidence before the Select Committee on the Poor-laws shews a much lower rate of wages. A common rate is 8s., and able-bodied labourers are at present thankful to work for 7s.

Let us look closer to the state of our poor family, though it will be time enough to enumerate the many items of expenditure that are required in such a household, which are omitted in the above estimate. The husband and father may have been a prudent youth, who, while a bachelor, has, from his wages, saved what would be sufficient to purchase good household furniture, and to defray the expenses of his marriage. Perhaps he may even have a few pounds hoarded against the evil day. His wife, likely a poor man's child, has, in all probability, been a servant in some respectable and economical family of the middle rank, which is taking the best view of her training and circumstances. She must, at first, have plenty of clothes if she has been careful, though, unfortunately, modern fabrics for female wear are not of very enduring texture. She is not likely to have made any considerable saving, unless well advanced in life. Personal vanity, duty, and kindly feeling—for she is sprung of an humble, and, most probably, of a poor and struggling family—will have absorbed the whole of her "sair-won penny fee" as fast as it was earned; and she can add little or nothing to the income of the family after marriage, unless her children and her domestic business are neglected, and herself made a much worse drudge than in the hardest of her early service as a maid-of-all-work. She is still a servant of all-work, but with scanty or no wages. The condition of a young woman, who passes from domestic service into that of the mistress of a working man's household, is, so far as regards her food, clothing, and lodging, almost always for the worse; while her work is often more exhausting, and her cares are increased tenfold. Affection, duty, the feeling of independence, and maternal love remain, to sweeten her toils, and atone for her many privations; and wo to her if hope, the cordial of life, should cease to sustain her under her exertions and anxieties!—In the meanwhile, after the first year or two of her married life, she will have sufficient business in nursing and tending her children, cooking, washing, making and mending for five; and, above all, in making her husband's wages furnish all that is required from them, with her early habits, not of comfort and indulgence, but of neatness and cleanliness, and her taste for the decent appearances of the humblest domestic life. How hard would her daily tasks now have seemed to her in her master's house! We once heard a lady say—"I always have my revenge on my bad servants after they marry."—But we wish to have nothing to do with either a bad servant or a bad wife. Our humble matron is one who brings health, knowledge of her business, frugality, activity, and good will, to the discharge of her domestic duties as a working-man's helpmate.

Let us suppose her looking over the above estimate. No tea or coffee! But even what is reckoned a scanty weekly allowance of these articles to each female servant is two ounces of tea, say, at 5s. a-pound, 7½d., and a half pound of sugar, say 3½d., and this has likely been hers while in service, or its value in money. Again, 3s. 6d. a-week for the clothing of the whole family of five is not much more than her own wages and perquisites while a maid-servant, if so much. It is £9 : 2s. a-year. How with this is she to get shoes for the family, flannels for all of them, clothes for the husband, finery—so dear to the mother's heart!—for the baby? But this sum also includes thread for making and mending, worsted thread, which is so very dear, for darning; tapes, needles and pins, which are always losing; buttons, hooks-and-eyes, and an infinity of small wares, for which 6d. a-week would be very little. This leaves but 3s. a-week; and, to us, shoes and stockings alone for five, would seem to swallow it up, though no other article of clothing were required. The dress of a gentleman in good circumstances generally costs less than that of his well-dressed lady, who requires such an endless diversity of things for all times and seasons, hours of the day, and months of the year; but the reverse holds in humble life, mainly, we fear, because one must want, and the wife is the voluntary victim. The respectability of the family depends upon the appearance of the husband; and where the wife is good for anything, her pride and her happiness depend upon the comfort and neatness of both husband and children. But a suit of new "Sunday's best" to a workman, even once in two or three years, would make a sad inroad on the 3s. a-week. A suit of Sunday clothes for a decent artisan, with hat, shoes, gloves, &c., cannot cost less than £6 or £7. They may last some years, but he must have linen, flannels, shoes, working clothes, &c. for daily wear; and in many trades clothes wear out fast. We leave the mystery of 3s. 6d. new-clothing and furnishing shoes, linen, and haberdashery to five of a family—for loath are we to think of a respectable artisan being driven to equip himself piecemeal at Rag Fair—and pass to other items. Candles, half-a-pound. This cannot be. Whatever is wanted, there must be more light. It is often after her nursing is put to bed, and when she should sleep, that the poor mother must do her washing, ironing, and needlework; altering the clothes of one child to suit another, or working for her husband; and we are assured by ladies, competent judges, that making is a joke to the labour of mending in a small family, and to keeping children's things in good repair. Nor is it easy to tolerate the idea of an industrious mother, in her hours of quiet, and when she might (where he is not too much exhausted by his daily toils) enjoy the conversation of her husband, or where both might gain mutual instruction and entertainment from hearing him read some good volume, being compelled either to sit in dreary chillness and darkness, or, laying aside her necessary needle-work, go to bed to save candle. A household without fire or light in the cold dark season of our climate—a household such as Cobbett has powerfully depicted, and such as may be found in many of the southern and midland counties of England—is the fit harbour for Swing; nor need the rich wonder that he of whom should sometimes sally forth from that dark den of despair which shelters his loved ones, and glut his vengeful eyes with one good blaze.

* Exactly as this paper passes through the press, November 6th, I find, on inquiry, that good flour, such as is used in my own family for pies, dumplings, &c., is 3d. a-pound.

Nor the world's law,

The industrious wife of an artisan will have more candles whatever she lacks. Light and warmth are as indispensable to her own industry—a mother's work being proverbially “never at an end”—as to her husband's comfort and good domestic habits. If the family apartment is a chill dungeon, he must go to the ale-house, and there would be no economy in sending him there. The allowance for soap and other things necessary to cleanliness is also too low. Whatever the neat respectable wife of a working man should want, she must have more soap, and also soda, sand, whiting, blacking, oil for her furniture, &c. These things she may, perhaps, gain off the beer allowance, which, however, as she has no tea, and very little milk, can ill be dispensed with. Even Hannah More allows the husband a pint, and the wife a half-pint of beer per diem; and in the work-house, under the old poor-laws, a great deal more was allowed. The sum of 2s. 3d. a-week, or £5: 17s. a-year for rent, will not pay for a palace of two rooms and a cellar; but we suppose it must do. In the country, even less will procure a neat, if cold, cottage; and in towns, a room or two in bad situations. But, as the children grow up, health and decency absolutely demand wider space and more separate apartments; for we have no doubt that much of the coarseness and indelicacy, if not the vice of the lower orders, may be traced to the pell-mell manner in which they are compelled to pig together for want of proper lodging-rooms. Taxes upon houses, local taxes, and parish rates of all kinds, which, by some means or other, affect the very poorest houses and householders however humble, are omitted altogether in the above estimate, with other items of necessary expense, which we have to specify, and which, as they are not constant, may be taken by the year. What does our estimate-maker allow for tea?—for there must be some of that luxury consumed in the course of the year: say then:—

* This is too low, and so is the education of the child, unless we are to subject our artisan, in the prime of his life, to the humiliation of accepting the aid of charity in educating even his first child. The cost of the education of each child at the National or British and Foreign Society's Schools, with books, &c. is estimated at about, £1; of which the parent pays about one-third. Our school-fees are rated too low; and so is the subscription to the Mechanics' Institutions, which is, in the different towns we have examined, from 2s. 6d. to 4s. a-quarter; in London, 6s. But how few mechanics belong to, or can afford to belong to them? This is sometimes made a complaint; but how is the ordinary mechanic, if married, to command money and time to improve himself?

Sickness and death, neither of them infrequent guests in the poor man's home, we leave out of account. If the father is laid aside by illness, or if a funeral occur, then is often taken the first downward step to irretrievable ruin, to "debt and danger," to the pawnbroker, if not yet to the workhouse. But we wish to look only to the bright side of the picture—in the working man's best years, when his strength is unimpaired, his constitution sound, and his family less expensive than it must soon become—if it be maintained, however frugally, in ordinary decency—and while his helpmate is still in full health and activity.

But, against the necessary items that we have enumerated, there is to be set £4 : 11 saving upon the weekly income of £1 : 1s., leaving a deficit of only £1 : 18 a-year. Where is this to come from, small as the sum seems?—and upon what article of the above expenditure can any saving be made? Our humble family are nearly tea-totalers, and have very little tea. The husband spends not one penny on his own pleasures, and he never loses an hour's work. Their allowance of solid food is not more than sufficient, and is, in meat and cheese, and even bread, not above the pinched allowance of paupers under the wholesome, temperate dietary of the new Poor-Law, and far under the rate of most parishes under the jolly old lawgivers, who considered that those who created all ought to have a good share, and only erred because they mistook or confounded idle, lazy paupers, with industrious labourers and artisans in misfortune. There is one blessing under the new Poor-Law: children under nine years have wholesome food ad libitum; children above that age, the same allowance as a woman. Now, every labouring man cannot be so liberal in his family, though a woman's allowance in the workhouse is by no means excessive. The paupers are allowed more cheese and butter than our artisan's family; as much bread and flour, and, as their meat is to be reckoned cooked, not much less meat. The paupers are allowed no beer. They have gruel for breakfast, or, if upwards of sixty years of age, the indulgence of the choice of one ounce of tea, seven ounces of sugar, and five of butter, to breakfast upon, for the seven days in the week. This certainly is not faring sumptuously any day; and yet we fear many of the labouring poor in our great towns, and very many of the manufacturing poor, fare even worse. Three shillings a week to shoe, and clothe, and furnish all sorts of small wares for a family of five, must be under pauper cost; although the modern work-house recognises no "Sunday best," nor neat holiday gown, shawl, or ribbon. As we look closer to the case, the mystery of how poor men live darkens upon us. The estimate of Mr Colburn's book is, we think, not to be challenged, save that in several things, as candles and soap, it is too low; and as to the omissions which we have endeavoured to supply, we cannot imagine any man objecting to even one of those items, who values the health, morals, and happiness of the operative class. We have allowed of no indulgence or luxury whatever, save two family holidays; scantily provided for many necessities; and left nothing for savings against old age, sickness, or misfortune; and yet there is a deficit of £1 : 18—and this is in a high income, as wages run throughout the country.

How then do poor men live? We fear Sir Thomas Bernard was in the right. The poor of England, and the workmen of England are not properly fed; they are not properly clothed; they are not sufficiently lodged and warmed; they are not able to pay for the proper education of their children, nor for the things necessary to their own improvement and domestic comfort, that there may be bread barely sufficient, and a decent, if meagre exterior maintained, as long as possible. But ultimately, our handicraftsman first gives up his savings; then his book-club—his wife probably thinks that an unnecessary expense; next his medical-club; then the child is taken from school, while two should be there—if all that is said of the uses of infant schools be true—for he cannot afford to pay for one. We cannot endure to trace this humble and virtuous pair through the gradations of misery and vice, into which so many of their compeers sink:—we turn from the melancholy perspective of the huxter or small dealer, to whom the workman's family become enthralled by pernicious credit, and who is often an extortioner, if he be not a cheat; from the miserable necessity of the pawnbroker's shop, the lying-in hospital for the wife, and some other charity for the husband in his sickness; from the winter doles of soup and fuel—the beer-shop—the gin-shop—and, finally, the Union Workhouse and the pauper's grave. The good principles and independent spirit of our poor couple will bear them out to extremity, and happily, by working and wanting, or economizing—i.e., half-starving—they will sometimes weather through, no one can say how. "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb; and they are shorn indeed, and that to the quick." But can that be a safe or wholesome state of society, in which even the virtuous and industrious of the labouring class are subjected to the manifold evils and temptations of such a condition? And ought they to be contented? It is also the workmen who are the immediate victims in the race which machinery is running against labour, ultimately to bless mankind; and this, while the subjects of a most unequal and an enormous taxation, and, above all, the thralls of the lords of the soil, through the Food-Tax—

"The Starvation Laws"—"The Devil's Laws"—as effectually as were their Saxon ancestors, with the collar and brand of their Norman masters on their necks.

Let us imagine the man who works so hard and constantly to earn his £1: 1s., talking with his wife after the candle has been extinguished to save it, and the more expensive fire raked out though the night may be chill, about the amount of wages which is actually taken from them and their children by the bread-bacon-butter-and-cheese tax; by the prohibition of the importation of all kinds of fresh meat; by the heavy taxes upon the few excisable commodities they consume—their half pound of sugar, which, but for duty, might be a whole one or more; their half pound of candles and soap; their beer; and the three pounds of tea by the year, which we have insisted for, and which might also be about doubled in quantity for the same money (12s.,) save for the duty. The working man may not be able to comprehend how taxation encounters him unseen at every turn, in the bricks, timber, and glass of his house; the dye of his coat, the leather of his shoes, the paper of his child's book, the nails in its coffin:—that defies the most skilful financier; but he understands the broad, glaring outlines of a system which grinds him from the cradle to the grave.

He may not be a politician, and, at all events, he is not a gin-shop or tap-room one; but Taxation and the Corn-Laws are standing topics of his household talk—matters coming home strongly to his bosom and his hearth. He strives to calculate how much more he could do with his wages, and how much he could save, if he had not to pay his disproportionate share of the interest of the debt occasioned by the glorious war, and if bread and meat were coming to his family as freely as they do to that of the French or the Belgian workman, without tax and without restriction. He tries to calculate the reduced price of those articles which his family consumes; and he finds that, while affording his wife tea every day, and the children many comforts and little indulgences in food and clothing, he would still be a far richer man. Perhaps he might even indulge the hope of bettering his condition—dream of becoming a master in his trade! Large farms have now tied down the agricultural labourers of Great Britain into serfs as effectually as caste does the labourers of the East; and poverty is doing the same with journeymen craftsmen. A labourer can have no hope of ever being a farmer; a journeyman little indeed of setting-up for himself.

Our artisan knows, however, that Government must have revenue to pay the interest of the debt, and for the necessary expenditure of the State; he is just and reasonable; but he thinks that the rich ought to contribute at least an equal share with himself, and that those who have large property should pay for its protection. Life he considers sufficiently protected in civilized society by the tacit mutual insurance of the whole community for a common object; and, to make the laws be respected and executed, need cost little. The necessity of frugality and economy has been seared into his soul by the rigid self-denial of his personal habits, and by that provident and thoughtful disposition which those of his superiors inculcate who pay any attention to him; and he naturally and properly extends his notions of thrift to the State. He may err in his calculations; but in this far he is right—that a searching financial reform, which should first lessen and then equalize the pressure of taxation, would place him in a much better situation than that which he holds; while the abolition of the Corn-Laws would remove the worst oppression he feels—that which corrodes and inflames his spirit with hatred against the aristocracy, because it half-starves his wife and children. He has been taught, by his reading and his observation, to know, that neither the Government nor the Parliament will give him and his fellow-workmen redress of this master-grievance, nor of any other that in the least degree affects their own interests and privileges, unless rulers are made uneasy. He is convinced that there is, for his Order, no protection save by obtaining a direct influence in the legislature through extended suffrage. And who is entitled to the first right of a free citizen, if he is not? He and his class—the intelligent working-men of Great Britain—will, therefore, never rest in entire quiet until they have obtained the elective franchise, with whatever is needful to protect its independent exercise; and they would be traitors to themselves if they did. The experiment of £10 voters has, they find, completely failed, so far as their interests were concerned, and indeed those of any other class, save that which Lord John Russell says it was contrived to strengthen—the landed interest.

It may be alleged that our picture of the condition of a working-man is extravagant and over-coloured, though it will not be so easy to say in what feature. The net annual income we have assumed—£54: 12s.—is very considerably above the average wages of British manufacturers and artisans, and of miners, colliers, glass-blowers, and those many callings in which health and life wear out so fast, and which are subject to so many casualties. The number in family which we have assumed is also low. Four children is nearer the mark; and we cannot imagine that any one will object to a single item of the necessary expenditure we have given. There is rather want of many of those things considered necessary to comfort in the humblest family in our state of society; and there is not ease-giving, hearty, cheerful plenty in any one article. A sup of milk, and a slice of bread and butter could not be freely afforded to a neighbour's child off our allowance. There is not, in our frugal English household, even the potato-basket, sometimes heaped, to which the Irish peasant can give the neighbour or the beggar welcome. And yet, we presume, no one considers a married artisan, with a guinea a-week of wages, an object of commiseration. Nor ought he to be sa, had he fair-play. We are not going to dispute that his condition is an improving one in spite of every drawback and obstacle; though the labouring classes have risen less and more slowly than the middle classes, and though we consider many of the indications of the artisan's prosperity, held out by those who studiously conceal one main cause of his hardships, extremely fallacious. We altogether disclaim that miserable, if it be not also false, ground of contentment or consolation, that, if his condition is one of hardship, that of the labourers of other countries is yet worse. The testimony of all modern travellers is directly against the fact assumed and so eloquently expatiated upon by those who tell our people that they are much better off than any other people, save, indeed, the Americans, (but then their case is an accident, an anomaly,) or that, if they be not well off, the fault is their own. Certainly it is their own fault, and they should instantly set about amending it, not by pinching back and belly, but by manfully securing to themselves what they hardly earn.

Among the popular fallacies employed to propagate the belief of the increasing prosperity of the labouring classes, are the Savings' Banks. But we will venture to say, that labourers who are householders, rearing families, are rarely indeed contributors to these useful establishments; unless they have some extraneous source of income. We have demonstrated the utter impossibility of a married workman, in the ordinary trades, saving anything, unless he starve his family. If the depositors in savings-banks be analysed, it will be found that they consist of a different description of persons. A very large proportion of them are female servants and children, who are directed by their mistresses and friends to this means of placing their small savings. Instead of the wanted gown or cap, a present from a sensible mistress to a faithful servant is now frequently a deposit receipt for a pound or two—the nest-egg of the future hoard. In examining the classes and descriptions of depositors in a savings-bank, in an English county, we find the greatest number to be female servants, who also hold the greatest amount of funds. There are also children, apprentices, schoolmasters and school-mistresses, seamen, clergymen, half-pay officers, revenue officers and pensioners, small farmers, and females engaged in trade—probably single women—guards, and drivers of coaches, and male domestic servants; but a small proportion of artificers, mechanics, and handicraftsmen, or of the labourers of husbandmen. And that small number, it is fair to conjecture, are single men, saving, in order that they may prudently marry, if ever a working man can prudently marry. We have seen his lot at the best. As his ill-educated children grow fit for labour, he is not in a condition to select suitable employment for them. His only care is how soonest to get them off his hand—one mouth off the scantily-filled dish before another comes upon it. It should be noticed, that the depositors in savings-banks are, in general, persons who either get their wages or pay in a lump, or who, like guards and drivers, have large though fluctuating incomes.

Another common fallacy, in looking to the condition of the labouring population, is the reduced price of all manufactured goods, and especially of clothing. The flimsy texture of the spurious wares which have deeply injured the character of British goods in every market of the world, and driven them from some, is never considered. A labourer's wife may now have four or five pretty-patterned cotton gowns for 4s. or 5s. each, where her grandmother's would have cost 20s.; but then it would have worn and washed out six of the gay and flimsy modern dresses; which, moreover, must cost four times lining and furnishing; and either the housewife's time, if she have the necessary skill, or else her husband's money to the mantua-maker. The same spurious economy holds of all articles of female, and many of male dress, used by the labouring class. How true is it that what is low-priced is not often cheap! But admitting that the pretty cotton gown and shawl, and the Sunday stockings of women and girls, are greatly cheaper, though worthless and flimsy, how does it stand with the more essential articles of clothing in our climate? We shall take the women's flannel and stuff-petticoats and gowns; their warm, long-wearing shawls and cloaks, stout shoes, and worsted stockings. These, if good and of lasting texture, are no cheaper—cannot be cheaper than those which labourers' wives formerly manufactured for themselves in their cottages, and now often go without, because they cannot afford to wear them, unless the lady of the manor deal out garments at Christmas. Articles of prime necessity to the comfortable condition of working men's families, are meat, beer, substantial woollen fabrics, and good shoes; and these never have been cheap in wealthy, manufacturing England; and never can be, even in the best times, easily accessible to the labouring class in anything like reasonable plenty under the present system.

The people would then require their whole earnings to keep them comfortably, nor find them too much. Pay the taxes who may, they will no longer, our improved machinery and cheap manufactures notwithstanding, spare the half or the fourth of their wages to the State and the landlord, than the untaxed American mechanic with his high wages.

After all, the difference of wages between the countries is not so great; and the English artisan would have very sufficient wages, could he call them his own.

He has, as he is often reminded, along with some other advantages, much nicer stone-ware and cutlery, and other such gear, than his simple ancestors; and, if not so substantially and warmly clothed every day, he is more showily dressed on Sundays. He is, however, prone to conclude that all that is good and true in these changes, he owes to his fellow-labourers and their employers; to the thinking heads, the enterprising minds, and working hands; all that is evil in his condition, to the improvident or rapacious rulers and nobles of his country. Besides, although the Staffordshire plate is much cleaner and neater than the wooden or pewter platter, it concerns him mightily that there should be at least as much beef, bacon, and dumpling served on the new utensil as replenished the old one; and this to him, is a very doubtful point. But how are these evils to be remedied? This must form the subject of another paper; in which we shall endeavour to shew, nicely and accurately, how much of our poor man's weekly guinea goes to the State, to the national creditor, and into the pocket of the landlord; and how much more would be subtracted if he indulged more freely in excisable commodities. If the sum taken were but a fourth part of his weekly income—as it is greatly more—how far would that rescued 5s. 3d. go in elevating his physical and moral condition! He could then educate his children by the fireside as well as in the school; he could live better; he could save and accumulate; he could hope to rise in the world, and he could look with cheerfulness to that gloomy future, the contemplation of which leads many a poor man to seek pernicious indulgences, until he becomes callous to every good feeling. There is a kind of misery pervading the depths of British society, which brutalizes the temper, indurates the heart, and endangers the public safety, upon which we have not yet touched. "Among savages," says a Tory writer, but a philanthropic man, "those tribes have ever been found the most unfeeling who possess the fewest comforts, and have the most difficulty in obtaining food; for when self-preservation becomes the prime concern, the natural charities are starved, a brutish selfishness occupies the whole heart, and man, having no instincts to supply the absence of his human affections, becomes worse than the beasts. Mournful as this is, it is far more mournful to contemplate the evils of extreme poverty in the midst of a civilized and flourishing society.

"There was a Methodist dabbler in art who, in the days of our childhood, used to edify the public with allegorical prints from the great manufactory of Carrington Bowles. One of these curious compositions represented a human figure, of which the right side was dressed in the full fashion of the day, while the left was undressed to the very bones, and displayed a skeleton. The contrast in this worse than Mezentian imagination is not more frightful than that between Wealth and squalid Pauperism, who are every day jostling in our streets."

MY COURT-DRESS.

"L'habit de cour,
Ne repondes plus de personne."—BENJAMIN.

Now, ne'er again trust mortal men—I join the courtly band;

Here, Moses, fly! I want to buy a court-dress second-hand. I've caught the eye of Royalty, to levee I must press; To the palace-gate must hasten straight, equipped in a court-dress—

Like the old courtiers of his Grace—his Grace's old courtiers.

Ambition, near my willing ear, already calls me slow; My robes so rich the fashion teach of bowing very low. Politeness here, politeness there, what throngs around me press!

As on I go, to make my bow, equipped in my court-dress.

With the old courtiers of his Grace—his Grace's old courtiers.

Not having yet a carriage fit, on foot I take my way; When, in the street, some friends I meet cry—"Join our breakfast, pray?"

"I can't refuse—but no time lose!" I answer their address;

"For I must go to make my bow—respect, sire, my court-dress!

I'm a new courtier of his Grace—his Grace's new courtier."

The breakfast done, away I run; but, by an ancient friend,

Again imprest, a joyous guest, his wedding must attend. The bowl is crowned, the song goes round, in mirth and happiness,

Till I must go, to make my bow, equipped in my court-dress—

Like the old courtiers of his Grace—his Grace's old courtiers.

At length, despite the champagne bright, I yield to honour's call;

With tottering feet, along the street, I gain my patron's hall.

But Rosa's there, with form so fair, amid the crowds which press—

More dear to me than Royalty, Rose wants not a court-dress,

Nor the old courtiers of his Grace—his Grace's old courtiers.

So, from the pile where coquettes smile on minister and peer,

I seek once more the humble door, in bygone days so dear.

By Rose's side, my robes of pride are awkward, I confess;

His Grace forgot, upon the spot I strip off my court-dress—

No more a courtier of his Grace—his Grace's new courtier.

Now, vain I deem ambition's dream, and courtly pomp deride;

My cap and bells are better spells the tavern-hearth beside.

My pipe I smoke, and crack my joke, afraid of no distress—

And who would pass to see his Grace may take my cast court-dress,

And be a courtier of his Grace—his Grace's new courtier.

DIALOGUE OF THE UNBORN.

SCENE.—The air over Japan, half-a-mile above the earth. Myrto and Erpias in their respective balloons.

Myrto. Good morning, Erpias! What a delightful surprise it is to meet you here! It was but yesterday I heard you were hunting eagles among the Ural mountains.

Erpias. That was quite true. I have travelled here overnight, having satisfied myself with the sport. I came here merely because there is to be dry weather in this quarter for several weeks; and, having a slight sore throat, I am desirous to avoid damp until I am quite well again. Had I thought of meeting you here, it would have proved an additional inducement. May I ask what cause has brought you here?

Myrto. I had no intention of being here; but my wife, Paulina, has a friend, a Japanese lady, and, being very desirous of seeing her, she prevailed on me to accompany her. I left her with her friend only five minutes ago, and they are not ten miles off. I am merely sailing about here, enjoying the delicious air and sunshine, and amusing myself with my wife's pet pair of tame condors. There they are, over the top of that hill towards the north.

Erpias. Are you accompanied by any of your family?

Myrto. One little boy. The rest are all either at home or otherwise occupied; and, on leaving, we did not propose making any long stay. At first, I thought my great-great-grandfather would have accompanied us; but he is beginning to get a little staid, and preferred remaining at home cultivating his flowers. Indeed, I do not wonder he likes quiet; for he is upwards of 150 years old.

Erpias. Oh, that is a trifle! One of my ancestors is 180 years old, and is to be married a second time, in a month, to a very nice person of 150. I think you must have met him at my table. His name is Pylas.

Myrto. What! old Pylas! I remember him perfectly. His sprightly conversation amused us all very much at a picnic party, conducted by your lovely Paulina, on the banks of one of the thousand branches of the Amazon. His contribution to the feast consisted of a splendid roasted rhinoceros, and a huge fragment of an iceberg for cooling the wine. But there was need for abundance; for I think the party consisted of 3000 at least. That was only three years ago; and I think Pylas had then a wife alive, and a fresh and fair wife, too.

Erpias. His wife died soon afterwards, at the age of 140. It was surmised that she had shortened her life by excessive indulgence in stimulating gasses. In fact, she was always helping herself to a gulp of exhilarating gas, or cephalic gas, or melancholic gas, or imaginative gas, or tranquillizing gas, or some such article. She made two gasmakers' fortunes, and never travelled without an assortment of gasses, in the most condensed form. However, de mortuis nil nisi bonum is a maxim we must not forget.

Myrto. You may forget it when you will for me; it seems to inculcate that charity should be most displayed where it can be of least use. I would say, de mortuis nil nisi verum. But, pray, tell me how you mean to spend your time in this region? I presume that, being in rather delicate health, you will not pass your nights, nor even the whole of your days, in the air. Your apparatus, too, seems scarcely calculated for that.

Erpias. Oh, this is a mere hunting apparatus, of small size, and wants, as you see, the self-acting plummet-works for keeping its place in the air during all changes of wind. But I have frequently passed the night in this little bark; and, in the present steady weather, I can easily adjust it before going to sleep, so as to find myself within ten miles at farthest when I awake. It is a London-made article, and acts admirably.

Myrto. The London ones are still the best; those made in Central Asia are cheaper; but, if you happen to get into the middle of a thunder storm with one of them, it is very apt to give out a bad smell.

Erpias. As to passing the night in the air, I have not thought of that one way or other. I am fond of the air, and am well provided with the means of securing a uniform temperature.

Myrto. Let me urge you, my dear friend, on no account to sleep in the air. Damp or electrical clouds, passing across, frequently produce mischief, independently altogether of change of temperature. Had you consulted our friend Dr Abercrombie on the point, I feel assured he would have agreed with me.

Erpias. To him then let us leave it. It so happens that this is just the hour when he is to be consulted at his own house at Edinburgh. Let us adjourn to the next electrical telegraph, and we shall have his answer in two minutes.

Myrto. I am delighted to have the opportunity of getting the Doctor's opinion. There is the telegraph, not two miles off, and we shall be there as soon as you can frame your question. Now, then, get ready; for I see the telegraph keeper at the door of his bureau.

Erpias.—(Addressing the officer of the telegraph.)—Will you have the goodness to despatch this message, and say when I may expect an answer?—(giving him a scrap of writing.)

Officer. The time required will consist of that occupied in sending the message from the telegraph-bureau in Edinburgh to the house of your friend; and in receiving his answer, and carrying it back at the rate of fifty miles an hour, with the addition of half a minute for the operation of the telegraph. I now despatch it.

Myrto. Can you tell us what changes are now in contemplation on the telegraphs?

Officer. I do not hear of much. It is said that the Telegraphic Council have now under consideration the best means of extending one to the North Pole, for the use of the population there, which is now pretty numerous, as in summer many people go there who dislike night; and, in winter, astronomers resort there, that they may be constantly making observations; besides numerous young men, for the purpose of fishing and hunting. It is also a great resort for pleasure parties at all times of the year. But numerous complaints have been made of the defective state of the communications. The nearest telegraph is at Spitzbergen, which is several hours distant.

Myrto. I have myself experienced the inconvenience, having a year ago made one of a pleasure party to the North Pole. Nothing could be more strange, amounting almost to pain, than the consciousness that you were cut off from the great mass of humanity by so dreary an interval. An ingenious attempt was made to communicate by the aurora borealis, but without success.

Officer. Here is your answer:—"Dr Abercrombie advises Erpias not to sleep in the air; at all events, not unless he has got the protective nictitating nightcap."

Erpias. As I have not got the nightcap, I shall, Myrto, follow your and the Doctor's advice.

Myrto. You do well; and I can ensure you a comfortable sleeping-place. But we have still time, if you are so inclined, to enjoy the beautiful twilight, by making a run across the island.

Erpias. With all my heart. (They proceed together in their balloons.) And now, Myrto, tell me what you of the Great Council of Europe are about?

Myrto. That is a wide question; and it is almost needless to go into detail at present, as the whole will be stated in our report to the Annual Universal Meeting, which will take place within three weeks.

Erpias. At least, tell me, was your last calendar of offences a heavy one?

Myrto. I lament to say it was. The state of Ireland has given the Council considerable anxiety. Offences, under the head of culpable ignorance, still prevail to an extent unknown in any other part of the globe. In one case, in particular, a schoolmaster in the south of Ireland was convicted of having his pupils in such a state that boys of eight years committed several errors in the differential calculus; while, in the higher branches, particularly in the doctrine of encyclopedic ratios, a gross degree of ignorance and misconception prevailed. This aggravated case was certified by the European council to the next Universal Meeting; and it is thought the teacher will be sentenced to suffer three consecutive sarcasms from the president.

Erpias. A dreadful sentence! to be sneered at before the whole world!

Myrto. Then we had much about the usual number of cases of selfishness from Scotland, insincerity from France, and so on. One Russian magnate was convicted of omitting the proper mark of respect to a peasant's wife.

Erpias. Has the Council as yet done anything regarding the great educational question of teaching ancient history to the children?

Myrto. Nothing has been done, farther than much copious discussion. The idea, however, seems to gain ground, that ancient history should either be wholly excluded, or, at least, restricted to the more advanced classes. There is, in fact, a large party who seem as much ashamed of being descended of our ancestors of the nineteenth and preceding centuries, as it is related these ancestors themselves were scandalized with a theory, propounded at that time, that mankind were merely improved orang outangs, and had originally tails. It has actually been proposed, that the whole records of ancient history, from the end of the nineteenth century backwards, should be utterly destroyed, with the exception of the sacred writings; and excepting also a complete library in each of the four quarters of the globe, under the control of the respective General Councils.

Erpias. The facts of history are, unquestionably, of a sort not to be readily introduced into the youthful mind. The existence, nay, the universal prevalence of so dreadful a practice as war, the shedding of human blood, the every-day perpetration of fraud and violence in a thousand shapes—tyranny, slavery, democratical violence, vulgarity, and brutality: all these things having now been so completely banished from the face of the globe, it is not necessary that the youth of the world should be too early familiarized with the ideas of them; and I incline to the opinion that, by prematurely accustoming them to such objects of contemplation, there may be danger of rousing the dormant mischief within their bosoms; for human nature is still essentially the same as it was three hundred years ago.

Myrto. I go along with you to a considerable extent; but I doubt the policy of excluding from the education of youth anything with which it is necessary or proper they should be acquainted in mature age; and I cannot but differ from those who would banish, as much as possible, the records of history from the contemplation of mankind. If these records shew, in fearful perspective, ages of blood, and tears, and toil; yet by these sufferings were laid the solid basis on which the present beautiful fabric of human society is built.

Erpias. It would, undoubtedly, argue a weakness of mind, to avert one's eyes from any part of human history. We must embrace the whole subject from the acorn to the oak, before it can be truly useful or even interesting. How can we fully relish the calm, unless we know the evils of the storm?

Myrto. We owe an infinite debt of gratitude to our predecessors, for struggling through the evils of life in a world which offered them little but discomfort, and which we can compare only to a house without doors or windows, and totally unfurnished. Only conceive the greater portion of the human race spending one-half of every year, shivering from a too low temperature, and groping about in comparative darkness, while, to the opulent few, uncomfortable means of light and warmth were supplied, by the dreary and dangerous toil of multitudes in subterraneous mines, and on oceans whose dangers they knew not how to overcome. It is by such considerations only, that we can appreciate those discoveries now so familiar to us, by which we can extract light and heat directly from the elements themselves, by merely evolving and calling into activity that which is at all times and everywhere present.

Erpias. Perhaps the earth, at that time, more resembled what was called a haunted house, two-thirds of its best apartments being locked up and rendered useless, on account of some goblin which the inmates had not skill to exorcise. Those glorious countries upon the equator, which now supply the world with food, and luxuries, and products of every kind, were then haunted by yellow fevers, agues, plagues, or other mischiefs, worse than the wild beasts, snakes, or mosquitoes; and thus our impotent ancestors fell the victims of that exuberant nature which is to us so tractable and invaluable a handmaid. They even knew no easy mode of purifying the air intended for respiration. From their miserable means of locomotion, the labourers' hours of recreation and repose were passed in the less salubrious atmosphere which brooded over the scene of his toil; instead of his being lightly wafted twenty, fifty, or a hundred miles, to a smiling cottage, on some sunny hill-side, where the purest breath of heaven might expand his lungs, and fill his heart with cheerfulness.

Myrto. Much also of that, as of many other evils, arose from the necessity of the population being so stationary. It was not enough, as now, that the people should be in those regions during the seasons of cultivation and of harvest; they were necessarily kept there during all the year round, to brave the trying vicissitudes of the rainy season, and of the scorching summer sun. Indeed, there is scarcely any region of the earth where it is salutary to remain the whole year round, even for the strongest constitution; to say nothing of the unpleasantness of a long, cold, cheerless winter, such as that of Russia, or even of Scotland.

Erpias. How wretched to be imprisoned in a country during the whole of a winter, a rainy season, or a hot season, instead of following the gracious sun into those climates where, for the time, his happiest influence dispenses beauty and salubrity, as all who are so inclined can now do. Indeed the human race could not then be said to possess the world so much as to subsist upon it. Each individual was nailed to a little locality, like a limpet to his native rock, and to roam was to incur danger and distress.

Myrto. It was ever the belief of our species, that the world was made for their use; yet the greater part of its resources remained, for thousands of years, unproductive. Until the nineteenth century, little had been done towards establishing rapid communication on land; and, at the same era, the use of steam first, in reality, conferred a partial command of the sea. These imperfect contrivances have since been superseded by agents infinitely more powerful and manageable. Nor was it until a still later period that man asserted his supremacy over that most delightful and congenial of all the elements—the atmosphere—which now bears our burdens and our bodies, from clime to clime, with such perfect safety, and with all the speed which our tremendous moving powers can bestow.

Erpias. To my mind, the tracing of these changes, and the revolutions consequent upon them, are the most interesting parts of human history. What vast changes, moral, political, and social, have, within the last two hundred years, metamorphosed the whole aspect of the world and its inhabitants!—and how contracted would be the policy that would limit our acquaintance with the elements of so mighty a revolution! How auspicious for the human race was the circumstance that from Britain—the land of liberty—emanated those inventions which, had they been disclosed in some of the many despotic states which then existed, especially in such a diabolically rapacious state as Russia, might have crushed a subjugated world, and banished liberty for ages. Even as it was, you may remember the struggles, vain and weak, of despotism aided by hireling ingenuity, against the might of science, liberty, and humanity.

Myrto. It is indeed a spirit-stirring tale how, by the spread of the electric telegraph, and of railroads and steam-navigation, and the consequently increased communication of ideas, the despots of the earth began to be troubled and dismayed, and to double the chains of their thralldom. Other inventions followed. The navigation of the balloon was accomplished, and the crisis was precipitated. Then came that ever-memorable time, when, in one night, by a single flight of free war-balloons, the power of the Autocrat of Russia was paralyzed over all his vast domains—his Siberian captives freed—Poland, Circassia, and Persia, delivered from his galling chain—and the boon, then scarcely desired or understood by the degraded people, of personal and political liberty, conferred on the thralls and serfs of his realm—and all without the shedding of blood. It was speedily seen that all personal thralldom, and all those commercial restrictions, necessary under a different order of things, must be abandoned. The world speedily resolved itself into a vast community—the laws of justice and humanity were everywhere enforced—and thus has commenced the system which has ripened into our present state, so much transcending the golden age fabled by the poets of ancient times.

Erpias.—How it charms me to hear you speak with such enthusiasm! It has sometimes struck me that our present times are rather too unexciting—that there is too little left of that novelty and adventure which gave interest to the olden time. We have now no fond lovers or affectionate relations in ignorance of the fate of some long absent object of their attachment—the telegraph has destroyed all that source of interest, since our antipodes can now communicate with us with the rapidity of speech. All the wonderful tales of miscreants fleeing from justice are now matters of mere history, since the arm of justice encompasses the globe.

Myrto. The interest of all these things lies in their history. They are most picturesque when viewed from a distance; but, could the story of our age have been told to our predecessors, what a marvel—what a miracle would it have appeared to them! The world all united in one community; harmony universally prevalent; and disputes decided not by the blind and ruthless arbiter War, but by a wise and just Council, whose authority extends over the whole world; the rights of all men respected; every human life valued and cared for; the glories and comforts of the earth, in all its regions, thrown open, as free as the light and air, to all the race of Adam; a universal language known and used by all, not in virtue of any despotic decree, but from a universal desire for it, produced by the most powerful motives—universal convenience; and directed towards its end by the greatest wisdom and talent; the means of health and longevity understood and provided for all men; and human happiness incalculably increased.

Erpias. Yes, these, although familiar to us, are indeed wonders, compared to which those of the ancients, such as the voyage of Jason in quest of the golden fleece, or of Columbus in search of what was called the New World, sink into child's play. Had such things been predicted to that conceited generation, the men of the nineteenth century, they would have treated the prophet as a silly dreamer. They, indeed, were so much occupied with the pursuits of money-making, or of personal enjoyment, that they would, on no account, engage in any scheme, however excellent, unless, as the phrase was, it would pay. That age saw a large portion of the population of England degraded into the slaves of manufacturing capitalists, under a system infinitely more debasing than the avowed slavery of feudalism, or of Russian barbarism. In those days, many of the nobles of the earth expended vast sums in the course of a year, on objects of mere personal enjoyment or splendour, when one tithe devoted to the development of science, would have vastly accelerated the approach of such happy days as those we now possess, and been to themselves a source of intense gratification.

Myrto. Had the gentlemen of England devoted to scientific invention one-hundredth part of the money annually expended on the single article of fox-hunting, it would have told on the destinies of humanity. Yet we know there were some splendid exceptions, although too few for any general effect. Another cause of the tardiness of improvement, was the timorousness of scientific men. They feared to peril their reputation by joining in or encouraging any great scheme. And here let me make an honourable exception of a chemical professor of Edinburgh, Dr Hope, a man of high reputation, who, at a dinner given in his honour by the most eminent citizens of Edinburgh, publicly avowed his belief that, in the course of time, the electrical telegraph would be established and adopted. I believe it was from this species of cowardice that the absurd idea of the impossibility of navigating the balloon through the atmosphere was so long allowed to prevail, and inventive ingenuity diverted from the attempt. But I fear it is time to turn, as Paulina and her friend will be expecting me soon—and you will accompany me.

Erpias. With infinite pleasure; yet, as we return, I trust you will continue the interesting conversation in which we have been engaged.

Myrto. Willingly. I may mention that the subject of the arrangements of the Universal Council itself will become matter of discussion at its next meeting. Last year it took place in the great plain at Texas, and was attended by four hundred millions of persons; but, although the arrangements were such as completely to prevent all confusion, it was found difficult for a single speaker, even with all our inventions for increasing the volume of sound, to make himself heard by so great a number. A proposal is to be submitted for remedying this evil.

Erpias. Look, my friend, is not that Paulina whom I see in the air, about twenty or thirty miles off?

Myrto. Lend me your glass. It is so; she is giving our little boy a practical lesson in the geography of Japan, by way of recreation; for at present he has the holidays. Poor little fellow! he takes to his studies with right good will. He and his sister, accompanied by their tutor, have already been four times over the globe, while engaged in successive courses of modern history, geology, botany, and geography. How delightful it is that instruction is now combined with exercise, fresh air, and happiness!—how much manly energy was formerly lost by the exclusively bookish system of education!

Erpias. I shall be truly happy to meet with my excellent friend Paulina. Where are you living at present?

Myrto. In the ancient city of Queatay. You may now see its towers and domes gilded by the setting sun. How different (excuse me for so often reverting to these historical discussions) from the same city, indeed from all cities, three hundred years ago, when every house poured into the polluted atmosphere its compliment of smoke, destroying its healthfulness and defiling its architecture—when filth, fetid odours, narrow streets, and a low and vicious class of population, dishonoured and degraded every city, driving many refined minds into constant residence in the country! These evils our ancestors considered inseparable from large cities. The physical ones, however, have been remedied by science; and it has now been found, that, if vice and discord have a tendency to concentrate in cities, so also have their antagonist forces, wisdom and virtue ; that the latter influences, if fairly and vigorously brought into the field, are ever an overmatch for the former ; and that, by the adoption of sound principles and systems, the just and virtuous regulation of a city is rendered easier than that of a rural district. The social appetency of human nature is good, and tends to good ; negligence and ignorance alone have led to its producing evil. But I see Paulina has recognised you, and is hastening towards us. I shall leave you with her for a few minutes, until I have a short telegraphic communication with a mercantile friend at Capé Horn, regarding some commodities which he is desirous of purchasing.—Au revoir.

A COURT.

AND what is a Court that the lip of the bold
Should be pale, and the heart of the brave should be cold
At its frown ; and the brow of the dastard be high,
And the traitorous craven flash pride from his eye,
And the laugh that is loud when the web of guile
Hath entrapped the free, break forth at its smile ?
Oh, it is a place of enchantment I ween,
The magical bower of a fairy queen ;
Where such wondrous vagaries of nature are wrought
That the wonders of Araby shrivel to naught.
Old Circe could charm the brave Greek to a pig,
And change to rough bristles the hairs of his wig ;
But ne'er like a Court could she charm to an owl
The grey phiz of a sage, or transform to the howl
Of a treacherous wolf and the face of a ram,
The beat and the face of an innocent Lamb.
Oh, merry and blythe is the courtly dance,
Bright with the sunshine of royalty's glance !

There Comus the statesman, all perfumed and sheen,
Gaily bedecked, in his glory is seen ;
No office is foreign his genius to shew
Of sweetly grimacing and jumping Jim Crow.
The hypocrite's there with his hollow smile ;
And the harridan's there with her painted wile ;
And there, like a tithe-pig, fat and sleek,
Is the heavenly bishop, when he's " to seek."

Oh, breathe not the word—for a word hath power
To unspell the charm, in its strongest hour ;
From the lip of Comus to dash the cup
Wreathed with the lily and mantling up ;
To wake the Sloth from its slumbers deep,
And wither the heart of the mighty Sheep ;
Make the lawn-robed vermin shudder and stare—
The word is Honesty !—breathe it not there.

SONG OF THE RHINE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHENKENDORF.

THERE is a tone that deeply thrills
Each native German heart along ;
With it his verse the poet fills Whene'er he wakes a German song :
Tis of an ancient, high-born king,
Whose worth each German heart will sing ;
His name repeated is so dear,
No German it too oft can hear.

It is the name of holy RHINE !
Throughout a kingdom rich he rolls ;
His name, as precious as his wine,
Each true-born German heart controls ;
In every breast his sway is still
For fatherland, its good, its ill—
Of all we think, whene'er begun
A song of Rhine—proud, rock-born son !

But, ah ! the foe-man's hand had now*
Robbed him of all his glory's pride,
And stripped from off his kingly brow
The verdant vine-wreath round it tied ;
Then fetter'd lay the hero's form ;
His proud lament, his anger's storm,
We oft have heard at midnight deep,
As spirits o'er him seemed to sweep.

How sang the conquer'd hero then,
With voice of mingled scorn and wo ?—
" O worthless world, and worthless men,
For whom no more may freedom grow !
Your honour gone, your trust all o'er—
Oh, can they then return no more ?
Tis mine to grieve my children's flight,
To mourn each broken German right.

" Alas ! my ancient, glorious time,
To me a spring-like golden day !
Still as once in my grandeur's prime,
My realm before me seems to lay ;

When by my banks, on either side,
Walked noble forms, with mein of pride,
Heroes who far and wide could roam,
With Soul and Sword to win their homes

" A race of worth once placed them here,
When giant-forms possess'd the land ;
Their lion-hearts ne'er felt a fear—
Yet gentle they as maiden's hand ;
In song their names men still retain,
How they by Hagen vile were slain,
And that dark deed inciting gold
My rocky bed still safe doth hold.

" So rage, ye tyrants, stain'd with crime !
Your guilty cup soon fill'd shall be !
That Niebelungen Hoard, in time
Shall rise and arm my sons for ye !
Your hearts shall sink with fear and dread,
When I my terrors round ye spread—
I well and true beneath my wave,
Have kept the store old Wisdom gave."

Lo ! now fulfilled is every word !
Our monarch old has broke his chain,
The Niebelungen's mighty Hoard
Hath risen to the light again—
Oh ! may it be our German pride,
To guard it well on every side !
Be ever justice, might, and fame
Link'd with our holy German name !
Grace, then, our Ancient Lord, to thee !
Again we drink thy welcome wine !
Our guiding star thy freedom be,
And for our signal word—" The Rhine !"
Anew to him our oath we swear,
As we must him, he us shall hear—
" Free from the rock his stream doth flow,
And to God's ocean free shall go."

MRS POSTANS' CUTCH ; OR, RANDOM SKETCHES OF WESTERN INDIA.*

THE Province of Cutch is likely to rise in commercial importance, from the successful introduction of steam navigation into India ; and people already begin to inquire into its capabilities, in the event of the Indus being traversed by steamers. Whether this work shall minister greatly to utilitarian purposes or not, is doubtful ; but the book is a right pleasant and lively book, and one that will prove engaging to the curious reader, whatever be the particular object for which he turns over its pages. The authoress has had good opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of the province ; she possesses lively talents, some power of reflection, and is wholly without pretension, and the worse affectation of being especially diffident and humble. Her work is the result of a series of notes taken during a residence of some years in Cutch ; and its embellishments, which are all characteristic, are coloured engravings, taken from her original drawings. But, as our space is very limited, we must make the most of it, in introducing that entertaining work to our readers. Mrs Postans, who is probably the wife of an officer, or some gentleman in the Company's military service, left Bombay for Cutch in a native vessel—the discomforts of which even surpass those of the boats which wont to ascend the Ganges, before the blessings of steam were known on the sacred river. Like all young authors, and too many female authors of every age, she is rather diffuse and excursive at the outset. Seeing so much that is new, such authors seem to imagine that it is absolutely necessary to describe all they see.

In a country where every one, at every age, is in a state of perpetual mental activity, or of incessant toil—where the labours of the senate, the desk, the loom, and the forge, do not admit of a moment's relaxation, from the rising of the sun until the extinction of the gas lamps—we are not sure but that the following picture of Asiatic indolence and dreamy repose may be looked upon with a certain degree of complacence. The toil-spent denizens of our counting-houses, mines, manufactories, and workshops, where men become spirit-worn and old before their time, and may be rather said to endure life than to enjoy it, can hardly at first sight avoid envying the luxurious idleness of the natives of tropical climates, or “ the long night of revelry and ease” of the northern tribes. Mrs Postans writes—

The crews of these boats are usually half Hindu and half Mahomedan. They are a satisfied and slothful race, who lie scattered about the poop, or on the rafters of the bows, during the noontide heat, with the exception of the helmsman, alternately sleeping and smoking until sunset, when they assemble round a large platter of rice, curry, and coarse grain cakes, which, after the prefatory measure of pouring a little water over their hands, they rapidly despatch—sitting round in a circle, and gathering up the rice between their fingers, each dipping into the same dish. I have never, on any occasion, observed the crew use water for the purposes of ablution ; neither have I seen any attempt made to cleanse a boat, or to put it into any sort of order. The whole scene is one of filth and confusion ; fowl-coops, cocoa-nuts, cooking-vessels, coir ropes, and passengers, mingled together, and surrounded by every ill savour that bilge-water and native cookery can produce. A boat's crew can imagine no state of existence half so desirable as one of rest ; they consequently display a total apathy as to their amount of daily progress. If a foul wind set in, they immediately anchor ; and if at night a fair breeze should spring up, they never set sail again, but remain very quietly until the following morning ; thus they can have no sympathy with their unhappy passenger, whose every sense furnishes him with fresh avenues for disgust and suffering. Remonstrance is vain ; but daily does he groan in spirit, as the approach of evening sees him little advanced on his weary way ; and the crew again prepare, even under a fair wind and a refreshing breeze, to drop anchor, and wait the morning tide. To enlarge on the miseries of such a locale is needless ; many of my readers may have experienced them, and memory will readily complete the sketch.

The European voyager, and, above all, the English one, must be extremely miserable ; but yet, on board the Cutch boats, “ the greatest happiness of the greatest number” is ensured. Mandavie is the principal port and harbour of the little province. The inhabitants are a busy, cheerful, and industrious race, slothful though the navigators be ; and the bright and varied costume of the inhabitants gives a look of gaiety to the town not often seen in the smaller towns of India. Here is a bit of good word-painting—

The population is principally composed of Banyans, Brahmins, and cultivators, many of whom may be seen on the outside of the town, either engaged in their several callings, loitering lazily along, or grouped together in little knots, gossiping, with vehement gesticulation, on any trifling subject of profit or pleasure. Here and there a retainer of the Rao comes swaggering along, displaying the superior height, aquiline nose, and long moustache of the Rajpoot tribe ; his arms are a sword, shield, and matchlock, and his dress and bearing are marked by an air of mingled haughtiness, foppery, and independence. Then are seen swarthy but fine-limbed children, rolling on the soft sand in childish glee, and shouting with joy, as a horseman passes them, circling and passing with consummate skill his gaily decorated steed. Near these, a water-carrier urges on his bullock, which, laden with the water-bags, slowly saunters forward, whilst his master smokes his hookah, and indulges in a passing chat with the women, who, gracefully bearing their earthen water-vessels on their heads, are returning to the well to which he journeys. Lastly, are groups of women, employed in sifting grain from light baskets, in which they display the most graceful attitudes ; the passing breeze winnows the corn, as it falls into large heaps, and numerous asses wait leisurely around, to carry it in sacks to the merchants' granaries.

Mandavie enjoys a considerable trade with the ports of the Red Sea ; and the Cutch mariners will sometimes even venture to Ceylon, and so far as the China seas, and the eastern coasts of Africa. The Cutch pilots are intelligent, and even skilled in navigation. All the inhabitants have a remarkable faculty for imitation, the first step towards invention. The exports of Mandavie are cotton cloths; the returns are dates, coffee, dried grapes, drugs, and coloured mats from the Red Sea. From Africa is brought elephants' teeth, and rhinoceros' horn.

The Arab sailors, who, coming from Mocha and other parts of the Red Sea, are frequently seen here, are a wild and singularly picturesque-looking race, and although wearing the flowing robe and graceful turban common to the East, seem strikingly dissimilar to the men of other tribes. Their dress is usually of a darker hue, and their pale blue and red turban less studiously arranged; their complexions are of a deeper hue than even those of the low-caste Hindus; their eyes sparkle with a darker, yet more restless brilliancy, and their general bearing is that of men used to peril, but accustomed to defy it. Such is a characteristic view of the sea-port of Mandavie, as it first appears to the stranger's eye.

The people of Mandavie are considered a peculiarly handsome race, which Mrs Postans attributes to the soft and cool climate, and the tempering sea-breezes. The dress of the women is peculiar, tasteful, and highly picturesque:—

It consists of a satin petticoat, with broad horizontal stripes of red, blue, and yellow, and a bodice tightly covering the bust, and embroidered with various-coloured silks; over the head and shoulders flows the usual "Saree," which, as it gracefully flutters on the breeze, affords a charming effect of grace and softness to the outlines of their elastic figures; whilst the becoming variety of colour selected for their dress, and the brightness of their numerous ornaments, adds gaiety and animation of no common order to the passing scene. On certain holy-days, all the women of the city walk together to the seaside in their richest dresses, to render there a votive offering of rice and cocoa-nuts; and on these occasions the grace and beauty of their persons, the richness and variety of their costume, and the barbaric splendour of their jewels, are shewn to the greatest advantage.

In the small town of Kaira, which boasts of having the prettiest women in Cutch, the damsels, among many other adornments, ornament the beams of their garments with little silver bells, and stitch bits of looking-glass into the embroidery of their bodices. Mrs Postans' destination appears to have been the British camp at Bhooj, which city may be considered the capital of the province. It contains about 30,000 inhabitants; and here is the palace of the Rao, or ruling prince. He is still a very young man, and is said to be of good dispositions and amiable manners. When his father was, for his crimes, set aside, by the King-making Company, this youth was, while an infant, taken under the protection of the British authorities, and his early education was superintended by an Edinburgh gentleman;* but the disorganized condition of the province made it necessary that the young Rao should become a ruling prince, long before his education was finished. Mrs Postans gives an agreeable description of this Prince, the effect of which is somewhat marred, by the coloured full-length likeness which fronts it, of a squab, square-featured, good-natured, middle-aged personage, in a costume more unique than elegant.

arly fine eyes, and a benevolent and agreeable expression of countenance, although, unfortunately, disfigured by the ravages of small-pox. His dress is usually rich, well-arranged, and strikingly picturesque. On state occasions, it consists of a most magnificent Kinkab turban, of the usual stupendous size worn by the Rajpoots, ornamented with strings of pearl, and jewels of great value, with immense ear-rings of gold wire set with precious stones. Over the muslin Ankriha, worn by all natives of respectability, his Highness has a sort of body armour of thickly wadded purple velvet embroidered with gold; a pair of rich satin trousers, also embroidered or rather embossed with gold; and crimson velvet slippers, curved upwards at the front, and decorated with pearls and coloured silks.

His Highness's jewels are of great price, and very numerous; consisting principally of armlets, bracelets, tawees, and a succession of rings and necklaces of which it would be hopeless to attempt a description. The gems most in use are pearls, rubies, and diamonds, but uncut, and set in the rudest style of workmanship. His Highness has some knowledge of the English language; and it is the custom for the European officers stationed in Cutch, to make him visits of ceremony, with which he seems gratified, and has in several cases evinced a warm friendship and interest for some.

We fear his Royal Highness is not in any respect superior, either in intellect or knowledge, to other native princes. His casual guests usually find him seated in his private reception chamber—

A small room, the walls of which are hung with swords, shields, matchlocks, and a curious variety of other weapons, of which his Highness seems most to value a beautifully inlaid gun, presented to him by Sir John Malcolm, on his visit to Cutch in 1830. During his hours of relaxation from the cares of business, the Rao is frequently attended by a negro giant, a sort of royal jester, who throws himself into all sorts of contortions, and displays an agility in the performance of his antics, which excites the risible faculties of his Highness to their greatest extent, keeping him in a convulsion of laughter at the monster's efforts.

Mrs Postans details all the magnificence of the palace and of the establishment, about which we see nothing very attractive, save the horses and the harem. Five hundred horses form the Rao's stud. His favourite dun riding horses are splendidly and richly caparisoned. On occasions of state, his Highness is attended by 500 horsemen, with elephants, banners, and other insignia of Oriental royalty, making no contemptible show; though, probably, one which fully justifies the mistake made by the natives in another place, who, on beholding a review of British troops, took the band, in their picturesque and rich, or, at least, showy dresses, for the great men. The Indian is nearly as fond of his horse as the Arab. With it he not only shares his meal, but his ball of opium. The horse in the East is a gentleman; his master's companion in peace, and his friend in war. To the ass, the bullock, and the camel, are left drudgery and heavy burdens. The horse is reserved for the nobler occasions of war and ceremony.

The government of Cutch, like that of so many semi-barbarous countries, is essentially feudal. The reigning Rao is but the highest chief among a set of inferior chiefs, called Jharrejahs, who are of the Rajpoot, i. e. Norman tribe, and hold their lands as feudal tenures, doing military service to the Raos when required. The system is complete in all its parts; the lesser chiefs, in like manner, owing allegiance, not to the Rao, but to their respective feudal lords. Those lesser Cutchee barons or retainers are called Grasiyas, and hold the government of the villages. This Norman class are a remarkable tribe. They are, says our author, a singularly fine race of men—

Naturally robust, and peculiarly warlike in dress and bearing; but in their habits dissipated, proud, and cruel. Some years have now passed since Cutch has been a scene of contention for federal rights; and during this interval, the Jharrejahs have sunk into a state of apathy and sensual indulgence. Addicted to the use of opium and spirituous liquors, those amongst them who are much advanced in life betray, in their haggard countenances, the common effects of these habits of intemperance and excess.

The Rajpoot women, who marry these men for the sake of their estates, are handsome, high-spirited, and very superior to the other castes of women. I speak, however, only from representation; as the Jharrejahs seclude their women, and I have not had any opportunity of being introduced to these Calyptos of the land. But it is said, that "the sacred harem's silent tower" is too often the scene of desperate intrigue; and that, "as fair as the first who fell of woman-kind," the dark-eyed Rajpootni frequently becomes the victim of her wayward and evil passions. Beautiful and high-born, these women feel little sympathy or affection for their debauched lords, and are accused of diverting the tedium of their lives by intrigues and associations of a most degrading nature.

The Rajpoot Jharrejahs derive their name from Jharrah, a Mahomedan of rank, who, coming to Cutch, which was at that time inhabited by pastoral tribes, became enslaved by the loveliness of a fair Hindu, whom he married. After his death, his young widow was expelled from his family at the instance of his Mahomedan wives; and, like another Hagar, she departed, with her infant son, to seek refuge from the more merciful. Her son grew; he took unto himself wives of the daughters of the land; and his descendants established themselves in independence, taking the title of Jharrejahs. In time, the chief of this tribe assumed the title of Jam, and held it for many years, until expelled from Cutch into Kattiwar, by the fiat of the celebrated Emperor Akbar. It is, therefore, difficult to decide, whether the Jharrejahs should be classed as Hindus or Moslems; more particularly as the Rao, who is the head of the Bhyaud, pays reverence to both modes of worship; and the "Order of the Fish" was bestowed on the early princes of Cutch by the Emperor of Delhi, on their pledging themselves to defray the expenses of all pilgrims travelling to Mecca. The Hindus also form family connexions with the Moslems. A sister of Rao Bharmuljee's, a princess distinguished by her wisdom and masculine understanding, married a Jam of the Noanugger family, in Kattiwar, but died shortly after her marriage; and it was suspected that she had been destroyed, by poison introduced into her slippers. The jealous passions of the harem's inmates could ill brook the sway of this highly gifted and most unfortunate woman. With a spirit uncontaminated by the presence of evil, Kesser Bhye had passed her life in a court degraded by crime, and all her energies and affections had been exerted to save the victims of her brother's dark and guilty passions. Often had his blood-stained hand been stayed from the commission of deeper crime, by the entreaties of his gentle sister; and though herself the victim of dark and private treachery, the name of Kesser Bhye is still hallowed throughout the province. It would appear, then, that the Cutch Jharrejah shares the proportions of his divided faith, according to the origin of his ancestry. He believes in the Koran, worships saints, swears by Allah, and lives in Mahomedan style: the worship of Vishnu is, however, skilfully mingled with all this, and the whole forms a curious melange of religious faith. Another caste of warriors, called Meyannahs, were originally shepherds, but, exchanging the crook for the spear, have become a fierce and warlike people, celebrated as plunderers, and as being ready to take any military service, if well paid and suffered to pillage without restraint. The hand of the Meyannah mercenary is equally ready for the warrior's spear or the assassin's dagger; and he never fails his employer, or hesitates to perform the most atrocious deed, if proportionately recompensed. In the reign of the Rao Bharmuljee, during a civil war, when the British power was required to quell the contentions of the feudal chiefs, the Meyannahs came to Anjar, and poisoned the wells, by which many men and cattle died. These men are Mahomedans, and may be mustered to the amount of three thousand warriors.

The Soodahs, although not a provincial tribe, may be mentioned here, as being intimately connected with Cutch, both by their predatory excursions and the intermarriages of their beautiful daughters with the Rajpoot Jharrejahs. This tribe reside in Wandhs, or grass huts, on the great desert of the Thurr, in a state of peculiar wretchedness and privation. Ignorant and barbarous, they pass their lives as shepherds, frequently assembling in hordes, and making forays across the northern Ruin, into the neighbouring provinces, and driving back the cattle of the villagers to their Wandhs, where they for a time subsist in peace, on milk, and the few vegetables of the jungle.

The Soodahs find their principal source of riches in the beauty of their daughters, for one of whom rich Mahomedans will frequently pay ten thousand rupees. Rajahs and wealthy chieftains despatch their emissaries, as Abraham sent his servant, to seek a wife for Isaac of the daughters of Nahor; and, like Bethuel, the Soodah father offers no objections to a wealthy suitor, but, on the contrary, robs his son-in-law, before his camels and servants depart. Beside the wells, and in the hovels of the Thurr, full many a flower of female loveliness would blush unseen, but for the fame of their surpassing beauty, which claims and maintains its ascendancy, and transplants the blossom of the desert to bloom amidst the gorgeous pomp of a royal harem. It is said, that the Soodah women are artful and cunning; and that by these qualities they gain a powerful influence over the minds of their liege lords, to whom they bear little affection. The Soodah wife of a Rajpoot cares only for her son; and, report avers, hesitates little to dispose of the father, to invest his heir with the estate.

The Soodahs themselves never intermarry, but form alliances with the people of the neighbouring provinces. From this circumstance, it is reasonable to infer that the daughters inherit their fairness from their paternal ancestry; as otherwise, it would be less uncommon. In Cutch the crime of infanticide prevents our judging of what charms may descend to the female offspring of the Soodah women; but I should imagine they would be many, as the Rajpoot Jharrejahs are naturally a very handsome race, although enervated by intemperate habits. Too proud to be virtuous, these haughty chiefs are cruel and debauched in times of peace, and terrible in the days of strife. No deed of blood, no act of treachery, is then too dark for their evil passions to plan and execute.

The Jharrejah families have Jewish features; and they speak the Sindh language, and pure Hindostanee, which is the language of the court. The boors have a rude dialect peculiar to themselves. It is considered loss of character for a Jharrejah's daughter to marry any man, none being considered her equal; and, as in India, celibacy is considered as synonymous with shame or guilt, infanticide of daughters is the only alternative. The aristocratic principle is everywhere incompatible with female happiness. In Catholic countries, the victim daughter of the noble could be sent to a nunnery; in Protestant communities, she may pine and wither on the virgin thorn. In India the deep guilt of the parent prevents the future misery of the child.

So thoroughly are women the slaves of custom, that the Rajpoot mothers (Soodah women) are more tenacious of its observance than their husbands. The infant is poisoned by opium applied to the breast of the mother. Of these Cutchee aristocrats, Mrs Postans remarks—

Depiciable as these wretches are, from the constant exercise of every vice, they imagine themselves superior to all other castes: and although their sensual passions lead them to seek wives from a tribe of plunderers, they consider that no caste is worthy to receive their daughters or to be honoured with their alliance. Not only the Jharrejaha, but all Mahomedans in Cutch, who pride themselves on being descended from the same original head, commit, daily, these deliberate murders. Great and various have been the efforts made by the British Government to prevent this dreadful practice; and the Jharrejahas have entered into a treaty with us, agreeing to forbid the destruction of their female infants, on condition that we respect the prejudices of the Hindus, and their religious reverence for the ox and cow. This agreement has been held sacred on our part, and the slaughter of these animals is forbidden throughout the province; but it is feared, that our forbearance has done little to suppress the amount of crime. It is wholly impossible to institute strict inquiries into the domestic affairs of a Jharrejaha's family; their women are secluded, and the harem's privacy is inviolable. According to the terms of the treaty, the Jharrejahas are bound to return a yearly census of their tribe; but we have no means of ascertaining its truth, and the male population so far exceeds the female, that no doubt can exist but that these murders are still common. It has been calculated that there was annually in this province, a destruction of one thousand lives, and that amongst eight thousand Jharrejahas, the number of their women did not exceed thirty. This very small number were preserved, some by accident, and some by the Jharrejaha believers in Vishnu.

The Rao has promised that if a daughter be born to him, he will preserve and nurture her, to prove his desire to correct this horrible custom; but, until the original feeling, the disgrace of a mendicancy and the shame of celibacy, be removed, the Rajpoots will prevent the imagined degradation of their daughters and their families, whatever example is set them. There is, meanwhile, good hope that the Rao will soon have an opportunity of setting a good example. He has already, at twenty-four, five wives; and he is about to take two more, the daughters of powerful chiefs, who naturally esteem it a high honour to gain admission for their offspring into the royal harem. French or English nobility esteem it a high honour to be nominated to some menial office in the household of the sovereign, even when there is little or no salary attached to the dignity of Gold Stick or Lady of the Bedchamber. Mrs Postans was so fortunate as to obtain admittance into the Rao's harem.

The avenue immediately leading to the women's apartments is guarded at its entrance by a pair of most hideous monkeys, who sit cross-legged, in a sort of basket chair placed on each side of the portal. These sooty guardians of female virtue are armed to the teeth, and in addition to that, have a large blunderbuss lying by each seat. Having passed these retainers of marital tyranny, we enter the large court, filled on the occasion of my visit to the ladies, by about three hundred women of the city, of various castes and degrees, who had come to gratify two of the strongest desires of the female mind, curiosity and gossip. After passing up an avenue formed by a double line of these dark beauties—and being greeted by whisperings, gigglings, and other demonstrations of amusement, at what they thought remarkable in my dress and manner, I entered the sitting apartment of the Ranees, which was a stone verandah, level with and open to the court, having sleeping-rooms, and other private apartments, leading from doors to the back.

The Rao's mother, who resides with her husband, the ex-Rao, in a separate palace, came to her son's harem on the occasion of my visit, and received me with great ease, partaking of the graces of European etiquette. Taking my hand, she expressed her pleasure at seeing me, and then placing me in a chair next her own, conversed agreeably on a variety of subjects, in excellent Hindustanee. She is a very lovely woman, and does not appear older than about five and thirty; she has a very fair complexion, fine figure, and lustrous black eyes; not possessing the languid sleepy softness which generally characterises the native eye, but large, bright, and expressive. She is the daughter of a chief of Soodahs, a tribe who inhabit the great desert of the Thurr, and are remarkable for the surpassing beauty of their women. The fathers of these belles calculate their amount of property according to their "heads of daughters," being happy to dispose of them as brides to the highest bidder.* And to judge of all, by this specimen in the person of the lovely queen-mother, "if lusty love would go in quest of beauty," few of the daughters of the land could, I think, compete with the passing fairness of the Soodah maidens.

The Ranees,

"Rich in the gems of India's gaudy zone," was superbly attired according to the fashions of Mandavie, which have been before described; but the materials of her dress were unusually costly and well-chosen. Her petticoat was of a rich Tyrian purple satin, embossed with a border, and scattered bunches of flowers; each flower being formed of various gems, and the leaves and stems richly embroidered in gold and coloured silks. Her bodice was of the same material as the petticoat, having the form of the bosom marked by circular rows of seed pearl; her slippers were of embroidered gold, open at the heels, and curved up towards the instep in front; from her graceful head flowed a Kinkab scarf, woven from gold thread of the finest texture and most dazzling brightness. Her soft glossy hair, parted in the Greek style, was confined by a golden fillet, and a profusion of pearl ornaments; and on her brow, imbedded in the delicate flesh, and apparently unsecured by any other means, rested a beautiful star of diamonds and pearls.

The lovely Ranees was absolutely laden with jewels: A description of her nose-ring, ear-rings, toe-rings, finger-rings, armlets, bracelets, anklets, and necklaces, would alone occupy a volume.

The young Ranees, the present Rao's wives, were seated together on a mat in a remote corner of the verandah, decked in all their finery; but the poor girls, abashed and timid, sat huddled together, afraid to be seen, yet every moment whispering to each other, with a half-suppressed giggle; now and then stealing a glance at me through their long eye-lashes, but turning their eyes away the instant the gesture was observed, and hiding their pretty faces in the laps of their companions. By degrees, however, they gained courage; gave me their trinkets to admire; asked me a variety of trifling questions; insisted on handling all the ornaments I wore, and would, I believe, have fairly undressed me, had I not avoided any farther familiarity, by re-commencing a conversation with the fascinating queen-mother.

The jewels of the young Ranees were similar to those already described; but one of the fair dames seemed peculiarly enchanted with the beauty of a ring she wore on her first finger. It was indeed of huge dimensions; in the centre was a mirror about the size of a half-crown piece, and this was encircled with rubies, pearls, and diamonds. The fair wearers of all this barbaric wealth must have been sorely wearied ere the day was done, had not female vanity aided them to support its burthen; their ear-rings alone were of solid gold, and not less than eight inches each in diameter,* and embossed with gems of a large size.

The Ranees have no family; they are all very young, and seem perfectly happy together, and contented with their lot.

After spending some time with the Ranees, who expressed great anxiety to hear of other English ladies who had visited them at various times, I made a movement for taking leave; when two slave girls entered, bearing trays, on which were little baskets formed of leaves, and containing betel-nuts, pān supairee, cinnamon, and other spices, with rose-water, attar, and sandal-wood oil in minute opal vases. The Rao's mother then presented me with betel-nut, which in Eastern etiquette is understood to convey a permission to depart; and having (as a mark of friendship) sprinkled me, by means of a little golden ladle, with the various unguents, accompanied by a profuse shower of rose-water, scattered through the rose of a richly-gemmed Golaubdani, the Ranees all politely and kindly entreated me to repeat my visit. Afterwards, each took my hand and raised it smilingly and gracefully to her forehead. I then left them, and was ushered back through the wondering crowd to the outer gate of the palace. The situation of the Ranees interested me deeply. I was pleased with their amiability; but felt sincere commiseration for their degraded, useless, and demoralizing condition.

Mrs Postans makes a very sensible discourse upon the condition, and the emancipation, of Eastern women, without entertaining much hope of her benevolent wishes being effective, save through British power.

She describes the degraded social condition and daily drudgery of the Cutchee women. They are unusually slight in figure, and have interesting rather than beautiful faces, save the females of Mandavie, many of whom are strikingly handsome. When Mrs Postans laments the hard fate of the Cutchee matrons, and their daily drudgery, is she aware, that not much better is that of the women, in a similar condition, in England and Ireland, if, as we fully believe, their menial toils do not greatly exceed those of their simple-mannered sisters of the East?

Separated as these women are from such advantages of civilized opinion, the taste of the observer is pained to see so much artless grace enslaved by ignorance, and so much real beauty condemned to the most filthy and disgusting labour. Notwithstanding the delicacy of her appearance, a Cutchee woman is capable of great exertion, and she pursues the fatiguing routine of daily duty without a murmur of discontent. At early dawn she grinds the corn for family consumption, collects the materials for firing, cleans the cooking utensils, and sweeps out the dwelling. Then, with probably a tier of three water-vessels on her head, an infant seated on one hip, which she supports with her arm passed round its body, and an elder child clinging to her skirts, she walks to the nearest well, or tank, returns with the water, cooks the family meal, and sits down to her spinning-wheel. After this, she again goes to the tank to wash herself and her clothes. This, indeed, constitutes her sole amusement. Divested of her upper clothing, she sits in the water, laughing and chatting to her neighbours, or trolling some simple ditty, as, with garments neatly tucked around her, she beats her linen against a stone, or holds aloft her gaily coloured sarree, to dry and warm in the sunny breeze.

ties to perform, and often in addition to hire out her labours to the farmer, or the factory, or her wealthier neighbours. It was but the other day, that a philanthropic gentleman of Bath was informing the world that poor widows were perfectly able to work for the support of two or three children, besides taking care of them. Women in Bath made a great deal, he alleged, by charring, and often maintained their husbands; so, when left with children, a widow can have no just claim from the poor-laws, and is no object of charity.

The author describes a recent suttee at Cutch, which she appears to have witnessed. The Rao is considered blamable by Mrs Postans, as his command would probably have prevented the immolation; and it is feared he secretly approved the Brahmins' proceedings. The whole of his people were present at the sacrifice, from his prime minister to the lowest wrestler. A suttee must be an exciting spectacle. What is a boxing-match or a bull-fight to it! About the same time, the beautiful queen-mother died of a violent fever, and an old female water-carrier, one of her attendants, buried herself alive, in order to attend her mistress in another state. A trait of this poor wretch displays the subtlety of one of the strongest instincts of human nature—the love of life.

Before her grave was closed, while yet the breath of heaven fanned her face, and the glad scenes of life floated before her eyes, she made a request so singular that I can find no one to account for it. She desired an inverted chattee to be placed over her head; which done, the earth was thrown over it, and in a few seconds trampled down with shouts of exultation. The unexhausted air in the chattee, must have preserved life for a short time after the grave had been filled in, and probably, while her pulse yet beat, the fiendish shouts of her murderers rang in her ears, and mingled with the agonizing death of this infatuated woman.

Both the widow and the attendant had the highest inducements to the sacrifice of life, founded on the promises and denouncements of the sacred writings of the Hindoos; and probably regarded lightly that which to us seems so dreadful. The widow was, in this case, a woman of high caste, and the only wife of an intimate and confidential friend of the Rao. She resolved to mount the funeral pyre in front of her husband's tomb.

News of the widow's intentions having spread, a great concourse of people of both sexes, the women clad in their gala costumes, assembled round the pyre. In a short time after their arrival, the fated victim appeared, accompanied by the Brahmins, her relatives, and the body of the deceased. The spectators showered chaplets of mogree on her head, and greeted her appearance with laudatory exclamations at her constancy and virtue. The women especially pressed forward to touch her garments; an act which is considered meritorious, and highly desirable for absolution, and protection from the Evil eye.

The widow was a remarkably handsome woman, apparently about thirty, and most superbly attired. Her manner was marked by great apathy to all around her, and by a complete indifference to the preparations which for the first time met her eye: from this circumstance an impression was given that she might be under the influence of opium; and in conformity with the declared intention of the European officers, present to interfere should any coercive measures be adopted by the Brahmins or relatives, two medical officers were requested to give their opinion on the subject. They both agreed that she was quite free from any influence calculated to induce torpor or intoxication.

Captain Burnes* then addressed the woman, desiring to know whether the act she was about to perform were voluntary or enforced; and assuring her that, should she entertain the slightest reluctance to the fulfilment of her vow, he, on the part of the British government, would guarantee the protection of her life and property. Her answer was calm, heroic, and constant to her purpose: "I die of my own free will; give me back my husband, and I will consent to live; if I die not with him, the souls of seven husbands will condemn me."†

Ere the renewal of the horrid ceremonies of death were permitted, again the voice of mercy, of expostulation, and even of entreaty, was heard; but the trial was vain, and the cool and collected manner with which the woman still declared her determination unalterable, chilled and startled the most courageous. Physical pangs evidently excited no fears in her: her singular creed, the customs of her country, and her sense of conjugal duty, excluded from her mind the natural emotions of personal dread; and never did martyr to a true cause go to the stake with more constancy and firmness, than did this delicate and gentle woman prepare to become the victim of a deliberate sacrifice to the demoniacal tenets of her heathen creed. Accompanied by the officiating Brahmin, the widow walked seven times round the pyre, repeating the usual mantras, or prayers, strewing rice and coorries on the ground, and sprinkling water from her hand over the bystanders, who believe this to be efficacious in preventing disease and in expiating committed sins. She then removed her jewels, and presented them to her relations, saying a few words to each, with a calm soft smile of encouragement and hope. The Brahmins then presented her with a lighted torch, bearing which, she stepped through the fatal door, and sat within the pile. The body of her husband, wrapped in rich kinkab, was then carried seven times round the pile, and finally laid across her knees. Thorns and grass were piled over the door; and again it was insisted, that free space should be left, as it was hoped the poor victim might yet relent, and rush from her fiery prison to the protection so freely offered. The command was readily obeyed, the strength of a child would have sufficed to burst the frail barrier which confined her, and a breathless pause succeeded; but the woman's constancy was faithful to the last; not a sigh broke the death-like silence of the crowd, until a slight smoke, curling from the summit of the pyre, and then a tongue of flame darting with bright and lightning-like rapidity into the clear blue sky, told us that the sacrifice was completed. Fearlessly had this courageous woman fired the pile, and not a groan had betrayed to us the moment when her spirit fled. At sight of the flame, a fiendish shout of exaltation rent the air; the tom-toms sounded, the people clapped their hands with delight, as the evidence of their murderous work burst on their view; whilst the English spectators of this sad scene withdrew, bearing deep compassion in their hearts, to philosophize as best they might, on a custom so fraught with horror, so incompatible with reason, and so revolting to human sympathy. The pile continued to burn for three hours; but, from its form, it is supposed that almost immediate suffocation must have terminated the sufferings of the unhappy victim.

And warm with life, her youthful pulses playing,"

The Hindoos believe that the victim endures no physical pain, but that her soul springs to the paradise of Indra the moment she fires the pile. Mrs Postans lays the blame of these cruelties upon the cunning and fraudulent Brahmins, who never forget that their duties, as priests, are to delude the people and profit by the delusion. This, we fear, holds, whether the priests be of Jove, Juggernaut, or Mahomet. Earthquakes have, at different times, been fatal in the province of Cutch; and, from one tremendous shock, the town of Bhooj was nearly a heap of ruins in two minutes:—

The Hindoos purified themselves, and made offerings to appease the wrath of the terrible Siva. The Mahomedan Moolahs stated the cause of the earthquake to be the horse Dooldool, pawing for his food. Thus, in the midst of terror and consternation, human selfishness prevailed: the Brahmins exhorted the people to make liberal donations to their temples, as a means of evading the destroyer's arm; and the Moolahs enjoined their disciples to send grain to satisfy the good steed, Dooldool, whose supplies were appropriated to the private use of the pious priests of the prophet. All sorts and varieties of ludicrous stories were framed for the explanation of this great phenomenon; and the more absurd, the more readily were they believed. After death, the greatest proof a rich native can give of his grief, is to feed and make presents to the Brahmins. Immediately after the decease of the Rao's mother, thousands of Brahmins came into Bhooj from every part of Cutch; and between their feasting for the ten appointed days of mourning, and donations made to the temple at D'waka, it is supposed that the Rao expended more than a lac of coorries.

The Hindoos have an ingenious theory of earthquakes. They fancy the world sustained by an enormous many-headed snake; one head only bearing the weight at a time. When that head becomes fatigued with the load, the snake shifts the burden to another, and an earthquake is the consequence. By a not unnatural superstition, they imagine the earth becomes heavier in proportion to the sins of its inhabitants. Mrs Postans gives a lively account of the general features of the scenery of Cutch, and of its animals and natural productions. The beautiful wild ass, with other wild animals, is found in great numbers on the Runn, an immense, desert, salt plain, which, from May to October, is flooded with salt water, and at all other seasons exhibits the wonders and enchantments of the mirage. In the islands or oases of this desert marsh, the Cutchee shepherds feed their flocks, in a primitive and patriarchal style. Here the wolf and the boar haunt; and the whole province, as well as the Runn, abounds in game of various kinds. The country is prolific in life, and the natives are sparing of all life save the human. Mrs Postans gives a minute account of the several religious sects of the province, and their superstitions, superstitious legends, and modes of worship. More attractive than these details of the two great sects of Brahma and Mahomet, and their numerous off-sets, is her description of the workmen of Cutch. They fabricate beautifully ornamented armour, and warlike and defensive weapons. The embroiderers are skilful, and, from the description given, they appear to have adopted the little implement for tambour-work, said, to be invented, above half a century ago by a Frenchman and long since in general use throughout Europe for a common species of embroidery. At least we suppose that the original invention is not Cutchee, of the tambour hooked needle and the mode of operation described. The only difference is, that the Cutchee workers have no pattern on the cloth embroidered, but, trusting to the eye, imitate one placed before them; while the European tambour-embroiderers have the pattern stamped on the fabric, which both favours exactness and rapidity of manipulation. It would be odd, after all, if the French claimed a petty invention really stolen from the Cutchees; for our authoress seems to have no doubt of this mode of embroidery being peculiar to the province. She says—

† This woman declared that she had already passed seven times through the fire; having been Sadhwes for seven husbands; and should she now withdraw, they would rise and condemn her, according to the doctrine of the Shastrus, which says—"As long as a woman shall decline burning herself, like a faithful wife, on the same fire as her deceased lord, so long shall she not be exempted from springing to life, in the body of some female animal."

The goldsmiths' work of Cutch has been long and justly celebrated. The artisans succeed admirably in imitating European patterns; but the rich purity of the Venetian ore, which they alone use, is seen in greater perfection in the native designs, which are massive and rich in "barbaric splendour."

The favourite native ornament is the Tulsi, a necklace formed of small plates of richly chased gold, strung on a small wire, or gold thread; ear-rings, also, fastened by a hook which passes through the bore of the ear, and secures them without a clasp; together with a great variety of bangles, or bracelets, usually made of an enormous weight, and adorned with curiously embossed figures of elephants, tigers, snakes, and monkeys. In common with the armourers, the goldsmiths work gold ornaments on a pure dead silver ground, with great taste and delicacy of design. This description of work is principally in favour for sherbet bowls, and golaubdanias, or rose-water sprinklers; the elegant forms for which are copied from those made in opal and china, which are brought from Turkey, as articles of merchandise with Persia.

The goldsmiths design remarkably well, and both draw and colour their designs with great correctness. In total ignorance of Hogarth's line of beauty, their acquaintance with the peculiar curve which constitutes grace in all delineations of the fine arts, is everywhere developed; and few models of ancient art can display forms more elegant than the Hindus choose for their common water-vessels, the designs for their embroidery, the garlands and wreaths which everywhere adorn their temples, tombs, and palaces.

The workmen have few tools, and those they have are of the most primitive description. Thus in embossing a cup, or snuff-box, which when finished displays a graceful garlanding of the most delicate flowers, with minute leaves, tendrils, and stems connecting them, the workman forms a large lump of lac round a wooden handle in the form desired, and, having moulded the silver on it, punches it out, in the pattern he requires it to be, by means of a little rough awl, apparently more calculated to mar, than to perfect, the tasteful elegance of the artist's design. The execution of work under these disadvantages is necessarily tedious; but its exactness and beauty must proportionally raise our admiration of the manual dexterity of the native artisan.

All these arts being, as it were, hereditary in families, produces, in the course of generations, a remarkable degree of expertness and high finish, however unfavourable the custom may be to invention.

The followers of the Prophet scattered over the countries of Sindh, Kandahar, and Cabool, pass through Cutch to embark at Mandavie, when they go to pay their vows at Mecca; and the Rao, by an old treaty, is bound to afford those pilgrims free convoy. The most interesting group of pilgrims which fell under Mrs Postans' notice, were Usbeck Tartars from Yarcund. Bent on their holy errand, they are contented to subsist on the alms of the faithful, or to receive those of charitable Hindoos or Europeans. Their dress and equipments are of the humblest kind—a hookah, a staff, and a small compass, named the Kebla Nimah, or "Director to the House of God."

This little instrument is enclosed in a silver case, about the size of a sparrow's egg: the dial of the compass is not divided, or marked, like our own; but the hand is in the form of a flying dove, whose beak, true to its duty, points always towards Mecca. This, the travellers ascribe to the influence of the Prophet, and follow its guidance over desert plains with as much implicit confidence as the mariner, secure in the power of science, tracks his way over pathless and unknown seas.

The authoress gives a view of the poetry and music in the province where she had her residence:—painting cannot be said to exist. Few natives study music as an art, the usual performers being hired or wandering minstrels; for women of character never practise any branch of the fine arts, as it is considered incompatible with morality and good breeding. An interesting chapter is devoted to the bards—i.e., the story-tellers—and to the bardic literature of Cutch. It is interspersed with many fanciful legends and romantic tales. The provincial bards repeat to the Jharrejah chiefs the warlike deeds of their ancestors, exactly as the Norman or the Irish and Highland bards, minstrels, and seanachies may have done, and with the same bardic license and extravagant use of hyperbole. These minstrels attend at marriage-feasts and other festivals. Specimens of their recitations are given. The same low caste, the Kalatnee, which furnishes hired or itinerant minstrels, also affords magicians, tumblers, jugglers, and snake-charmers. Of the arts of the latter calling, we have, for the first time, this rational account.

The Sampuris, or snake charmers, are a caste well known, in India; and though perhaps not entirely deserving the title of impostors, they are undoubtedly a shrewd, cunning, and abundantly fraudulent race, who almost equal the Brahmins in the art of imposing on the credulity of the people. That the beautiful description of snake, known as the Cobra Capella, may be attracted by a peculiar sound is possible, and undoubtedly they are at times so seduced from their hiding-places, and captured by the Sampuri. Generally, however, a succession of tricks are amusingly displayed by the artist, who ingeniously contrives to introduce one of his own snakes already trained for his purpose. A sampuri always makes an agreement with his employer that the snake shall not be killed; and thus one cunningly brought in his cumberbund, first dropped, and then at a fitting opportunity again caught near a suspected place, is quite sufficient to excite the wonder and awe of the spectator, and procure for the artist, the rupee, or half a rupee, promised to his success.

A short time since, a Sampuri made his salaam to us, intending to display his skill, and from him I learned the secrets of his calling. The man was shrewd, good-humoured, and active: he wore a red turban decorated with two bunches of pink feathers; under one arm he carried a small bundle, and from the other was suspended the instrument whose sound is supposed capable of charming the most venomous snakes. In form it resembled a double flageolet passed through the centre of a small gourd; but its sound far exceeded in harshness anything I have ever heard, except perhaps the bagpipe, whose drone it was somewhat like.

On the Sampuri's uncovering a small basket, a large and beautiful cobra raised itself perpendicularly, with the undulating motion peculiar to its species; and, spreading its hood, the apparently enraged reptile commenced a series of attacks upon its keeper, who, seizing it by the throat, affected to coax and play with it caressingly. Hereafterwards stated that it would readily take milk, or any description of appropriate sustenance; but, when the milk was brought, the Sampuri seemed to regret having given it such a character for docility as a messmate, and was constrained to administer the liquid by means of an ivory funnel, which, with an iron stile, he forced into the reptile's mouth.

The venom had been removed, but the fangs still remained. . . . In a remarkably small canvass bag, the Sampuri carried a second snake: it was large, and of a bright orange colour, relieved by black spots. This sort of snake is common in Cutch, and is called by the natives, the Lohar, or worker of iron. The Sampuri, I have no doubt, intended that this snake should remain perdue; and, had we consented to a display of his art, he would cunningly have watched his opportunity, and then, after a little piping on his calabash, he would have excitedly captured this poor reptile, and accused it of being the depredator of our fowl-house.

This snake, the Sampuri assured us, had been caught only a few days before; and he set it at liberty in the garden, and recaptured it for our amusement. The method of actually catching the snake, in the first instance, is curious, and requires great coolness and dexterity. The snake-catcher is provided with two long bamboos: the first he at once fixes on the reptile's tail, and rapidly slipping the other horizontally along his body, he seizes him by the throat, and, holding him tightly with one hand, despite all his writhing and wriggling, extracts the venom with a small hook. This done, the captive soon discovers its defenceless state, and is readily tamed.

The natives regard the whole as the result of magic; and, as magicians, fear, respect, and support the Sampuris who practise those arts. Of course, the Sampuris exercise all the tricks of their profession to sustain an opinion which thus conveniently ministers so much to their advantage.

From the above extracts, our readers may have a tolerably fair idea of this agreeable volume, which, whatever their opinion of its merits may be, we have perused with great satisfaction.

ILLUSTRATED and embellished works are this season so plentiful, that three months pass before they are all fairly out. To our former list we have now to add, first,

GEMS OF BEAUTY.

This work is edited by Lady Blessington, who seems to undertake for this species of literature, and probably takes fully more in hand than one lady can rightly accomplish. The "Gems" of 1839 are all SPANISH BEAUTIES, or at least are meant to be such; and they lack none of the appropriate insignia of comb, fan, mantilla, and guitar, though English beauty sometimes appears as if masquerading in Spanish costume; and we have but slight glimpses of either the high-browed dona, or of the olive-tinted maiden, with her delicious and piquant mixture of voluptuous languor and sprightly coquetry. The first plate, designed by Bostock, is the real portrait, as we have no doubt, of a beautiful Englishwoman, here named The Dejected, though we see no peculiar mark of melancholy in her composed and intelligent features. The Masquerade gives us a group of volant beauties, sporting on "light fantastic toe," and attired in operatic Spanish costume—the high, ornamented comb, the deeply-fringed basquina, and all the other et ceteras. In The Prado Miss F. Corboux is more true to national costume; and, if not to Spanish physiognomy, yet to expression. Her promenading ladies make a very pretty group. In The Siesta, Meadows has once more repeated his voluptuous beauty, against whom the critics in art will require to swear the peace before they get rid of her. There are a variety of other subjects. The last design is the gem of the "Gems." It is by Cattermole, and named The Duenna, though the Duenna's exquisitely lovely young charge is the prominent object. In this plate, besides the refined loveliness and animation of the lady, the air, attitude, and costume are faultless, and, if not Spanish, something better. The illustrative verse is all from the pen of Lady Blessington. Some of the ideas are felicitous, and touched in a light, sprightly vein; but they demand no particular attention.

THE CHILDREN OF THE NOBILITY.

Last year we were delighted with the first volume of this series. It scarcely keeps up to the high promise it gave, but is, nevertheless, a very attractive work, appealing to the purest tastes and tenderest sentiments of the human bosom; and certain, we should imagine, not to appeal in vain. Some of the children are represented with all the simplicity and infantile grace which once belonged to the infantine national character. Others are not children, but little mannikin lords and missykin ladies—fine, fussy, furbelowed, and mannered. The frontispiece, the Princess Mary of Cambridge, painted by Zeigler, is in good taste. The sensible-looking and rather plain little girl, appears as an English child should do, and with no marked lineaments of a princely race, save those for which she is indebted to her courtly bard, Dr William Beattie. Two children of the Earl of Durham, painted by a Russian artist, are also devoid of the tawdry ornaments for which we trust the other poor children are rather indebted to their nurse-maids than to the artists. Lady Blessington tells the little Viscount Lambton to tread in the footsteps of his sire, and "to serve his country for its weal, with patriotic love and zeal." She sees something in his face which assures her he will follow the path of his father. There would be no great harm though he went a generation back, and followed those of his grandfather, plain John Lambton. Of three daughters of Lady Jersey, two are very sweet and pretty girls; but a little daughter of Lady Charlotte Berkley is something more. The details of this picture are good, and, moreover, some of the best verses in the volume are devoted by Barry Cornwall, to the small Miss and her kitten. A group of three boys, with faces somewhat too beautiful, is sure to be quite "a mother's darling." The elder boy is dreamily watching the floating on of his mimic yacht in a pool; an operation which does not appear in the least to interest his younger brothers.

The Lady Margaret Coke, a daughter of Mr Coke of Norfolk, (now Earl of Leicester,) makes a charming picture of childhood, though the details and costume, while in keeping with the Lilliputian lady's rank, are rather inimical to simplicity. The expression of candour, goodness, and understanding in the truly English countenance of this child, is quite captivating. Then we have a small seraph boy, in contrast with a very long-backed, rough, and shaggy deer-hound; and in a daughter of the Marquis of Northampton, seated in a bower, with a lapful of flowers, a revival of the shepherdess of our grandsires. Landseer, to avoid the tame, the commonplace, and the mannered, has for once mistaken the reverse of wrong for right, and painted a little daughter of Lord Francis Egerton, as a mature Esquimaux beauty and belle. The original would appear to be one of those human stools—things of blood and substance, out of which often spring the finest women; but, meanwhile, the poor girl, though a striking picture, is certainly an extraordinary figure; indeed a perfect squat and dusky Esquimaux, finely contrasted with the gorgeous cockatoo perched behind her squab form.

The "Portraits of the Children of the Nobility," are edited, as before, by Mrs Fairlie. The literary contents are all that the occasion requires; light, elegant, and, of course, highly complimentary. As a favourable specimen, we will give a stanza from Barry Cornwall's address to the bright-eyed, yet thoughtful child, and her kitten:—

"I remember (many a day Since that merry time hath fled)
When the skies were ever gay—
Ever azure over-head;
When my heart ran o'er in showers
At the beauty of the flowers!
Even now I try to rhyme
Of that faded flowery time;
Loving more that morning gay
Than the later years serene—
Happier, though 't be lost for aye, Than if it had never been!"

"Gentle child, may time's soft hand
Lead thee at last to the happy land!
Meantime, gather, whilst thou may,
Every sweet of every day;
And when dull November cometh,
With its melancholy sun,
And the bee no longer hummeth,
Tell thou too, as I have done,
Of those times of stainless pleasures,
Which the heart so wisely treasures;
When thy thoughts were fresh and light,
And the hour was always bright,
And the world was without end,
And the kitten was thy friend!"

Landor's verses on the portrait of the Earl of Leicester's little English maiden, are in fine and pure taste. Happy the daughter of an English nobleman, who may truly appropriate his compliments, and happier still her sire.

"Many are prompt, my little maid,
To praise thy blooming face;
And many vainly have displayed
The lustre of thy race.

"Be thou as ready, and more wise,
In asking what they mean;
Then turn aside these lively eyes,
And view thy native scene.

"Where honest labour shalt thou see,
And labour's rich reward;
Nor want, to praise thy sire and thee,
Courtier, or Wit, or Bard."

HEATH'S PICTURESQUE ANNUAL.

Versailles has this year been selected for the subject of the Picturesque Annual. It is one abundantly fertile, and embracing great variety. Louis Philippe has been at considerable pains and cost in re-edifying the palace which was the principal residence of his ancestors in the most palmy days of the French monarchy.

The denizens of the palace, during the reigns of Louis XIV., XV., and XVI., the queens, princes, ministers, mistresses, wits, confessors, and courtiers of all descriptions, are the chief topic; the scene of action being less important than the actors and the drama which they performed for upwards of a hundred years. The "Picturesque Annual" is thus an anecdotal history of the French court in its most splendid and its most depraved era. Mr L. Ritchie has, upon this occasion, given way to a French writer, and figures rather as the translator than the author; though the descriptive parts of the work are all from his pen. The French author has given an immense mass of court scandal and anecdote; not put together in the artistical style, yet sufficiently piquant, though not scrupulous as to accuracy. An English author might, with the copious memoirs and letters which illustrate the private and personal history of the French court in the three reigns, have produced a better book, but not one that would so well have hit the French taste; and the "Picturesque Annual" will probably circulate as widely in France and Belgium as in England. The book is inscribed to Louis Philippe. If it chronicle the vices and crimes of his royal predecessors, it also records their power and magnificence. Monarchy had attained its consummation of external splendour, in the brilliant middle period of the reign of Louis XIV., in whose eyes "monarchy was a religion, of which he was at once the god and the priest; and, full of the idolatry, the most common of his actions appeared to him something solemn and sacred." On the other hand, the slavish and besotted people fell down and worshipped the idol they had made. Mr Ritchie describes the ceremonial of the chase instituted by Louis XIV. To him hunting was not a pleasure, but the necessary business or duty of a French king; regulated to the most minute details, and only to be shared, like the Order of the Garter or the Bath, by a privileged few. The King fixed, beforehand, not only where the stag should be run, but where he should be killed by his own royal rapier. For this purpose he arrived in his carriage near the spot, mounted his horse, and, all being previously prepared, performed the royal act of butchery, in the time and order pre-ordained. We should not have been at the pains to notice this burlesque, save to introduce the following anecdote. Among the other superannuated etiquettes against which the youth and high spirits of Maria Antoinette, and the simple and natural character of Louis XVI. had revolted, when Napoleon, wished to revive monarchical despotism under a new name, the royal chase was instituted afresh, along with all the other usages of the old Court.

One day, in the last years of the empire, on the occasion of a hunt in the Bois de Boulogne, a crowd assembled at the Porte Maillot, to which the huntsmen were seen to gallop. Here the stag, faint and bleeding, got out of the shrubbery, and sank down dead under a tree. He had been wounded in turning him out of the wood to put him in the Emperor's way; for the rule of the royal chase was, that the creature should fall by the hand of the Sovereign. But even death could not altogether baffle the green-wood laws of Louis XIV. The crowd were ranged by the valets in two parallel lines; Napoleon advanced gravely; and, with that hand which had traced the plan of so many battles, and signed so many glorious treaties, fired into the bowels of a dead beast! Among the spectators, there was a young man, then an obscure clerk in an office, but who afterwards became a great poet, and one of the loftiest of the political spirits of our era. This young man's name was BERANGER. He saw Napoleon there for the first time; and it was rather a singular occasion to make the acquaintance of the hero of Aboukir and Marengo.

It would be a curious speculation to contrast the manner in which the above incident would have affected the imagination of Walter Scott and Beranger, especially if the dealer of the finishing-stroke to the hunted and dead stag had been a legitimate sovereign, a Louis XVIII., or a Charles X. As a specimen of this work, we shall present our readers with a picture of the Court of France in one of its least depraved periods; for the profligate gallantries of the age of Louis XIV. were purity itself compared with the brutal sensuality, and unredeemed gross vice of the era of the parc aux cerfs. After stating very plainly that the King had an incestuous intercourse with his sister-in-law, Henrietta of England—a scandal renewed in a subsequent reign, affecting the unfortunate Maria Antoinette and her brother the Count d'Artois, and, in all probability, alike false in both cases—the French author commences the history of the King's first distinguished mistress, La Valliere—that French Magdalen, always sinning always repenting—

But still a sad, good Christian at her heart!"— that La Valliere, upon whom French and Frenchified English writers dwell with such tender fondness, and whose character and example—though we are far indeed from sinking her to a comparison with a De Montespan or Castlemain—has been probably more seductive. The career of La Valliere is dwelt upon at full, if not tiresome length. She was succeeded by Madame de Montespan. Henrietta of England, after being the instrument of the King in obtaining from her brother, Charles II., a secret treaty, disgraceful to the sovereign, and injurious to the interests of England, died in a few days after her return to France, of a very violent illness. She was, indeed, believed to have been poisoned, and there is no doubt that she thought so herself. These facts are not noticed here. Bossuet was then the court preacher; and the French author tells us grandly—"On Sunday the 29th of June, 1670, was heard echoing in the palace of St Cloud, that cry which Bossuet will transmit to future ages—"Madame is dying! Madame is dead!" The writer continues—

Even this event did not interrupt the gallantries of the court, which had become licentious in the extreme. Gallantry had taken the place of love, and, in like manner, diplomacy had succeeded a generous war. [The war was renewed; and, in 1679, the treaty of Nimuegen was signed, which left the King entirely free to pursue his pleasures.] In the seven years of the war, Louis led a very unquiet life. He went back and forward continually between the army and his palace, and always found in his court a fire as fierce as that which ravaged the frontiers of his kingdom. The King's example gave authority to the disorders of the time; for even the art and beauty of De Montespan, although she never actually lost the rank of favourite, were unable to preserve the fidelity of her royal lover. [The anecdotes of this period are hardly fit for Tai's pages.] There was a certain Madame de Lude whom the King looked at and talked to so often, both in going to and returning from mass, as to give not a little uneasiness to Madame de Montespan; who, to be short, one day flew upon her like a tigress, and nearly strangled her, and afterwards compelled her to retire to a convent, to do penance for her ambition. Madame de Montespan now fell sick, and the Countess de Guiche was ambitious of taking her place; but the latter, if not too innocent, was too inexperienced. She did not manage matters well; and, on the recovery of the chief favourite, she was put aside again without ceremony. The courtiers had laid bets upon the question; and the backers of Madame de Guiche complained justly of her imprudence. Madame de Montespan gained little by having excluded Madame du Lude from the Court, for Louis found the charms of Madame de Soubise just as poignant. The favourite, as usual, got into a passion, and the King condescended to dissemble; and one night Louis was missing, and all Versailles was in an uproar. In the morning, when the important subject came on the tapis, Madame de Soubise mentioned broadly a certain lady as the cause of the temporary eclipse of royalty; and this lady finding the scandal bitter because unfounded, complained so broadly, that the King himself was obliged to explain the nocturnal mystery. Madame de Soubise, and no other, was the culprit. Louis, in his confessions, went a little into details, which threw some light upon the manners of this voluptuous court. Madame de Soubise, it appears, as a sign that she consented to grant a rendezvous, wore emerald ear-rings; and Louis, to demand a tête-à-tête, put a diamond ring on his little finger. This lady was a good dissembler; and was more ambitious of the reality than the ensigns of power. She acquired a great empire over the King, and exercised it accordingly. The next favourite was Mademoiselle de Fontanges, who made a deeper if not more durable impression upon Louis. She was presented by Madame de Montespan herself, who talked incessantly of a certain beautiful statue she had seen with Madame [the successor of Henrietta.] Mademoiselle de Fontanges was in fact beautiful to perfection, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot; but she was utterly destitute both of mind and feeling. Yet the King adored this marble figure. She became the declared mistress, delivered herself up entirely to the pride of her new fortunes, swept past the Queen without saluting her, returned to Madame de Montespan even greater insults than she received, spent 100 crowns

a-month, and was astonished when that was called extravagance. She was encouraged by royal profusion, and her least caprice became the rule of the court. One day, in a hunting party, the wind having disturbed her head-dress, she tied it with a ribbon, the bows of which fell over her brow. The King, admiring the effect, requested that she would make no alteration the whole day; and next day all the ladies of the court wore fontanges. The most splendid fetes, of which she was the goddess, succeeded each other rapidly; and the imagination of Quinault seemed too poor in enchantments and machinery to please her. But her career was as brief as it was brilliant. An unfortunate accouchement destroyed all her charms, which the love of the King did not survive for a moment; and a convent in the Rue de St Jacques speedily received the queen of a moment."

Madame de Montespan was the sister-spirit of the harpy Castlemain; but Louis was not always so easily cowed as the indolent Charles. When Louis, too old to sinner it, began to saint it, Madame de Maintenon received all the praise of the King's recovery from "unbridled licentiousness" to "a severe devotion;" though Time ought to divide the praise with Scarron's widow—the most odious of all the royal favourites, inasmuch as hypocrisy, an intense and selfish ambition, and the most profound dissimulation, were added to other vices. We resume our specimen of court morals, and of the style of the Picturesque Annual.

Already she [Scarron's widow] had acquired a great empire over the mind of the King; and, at the time at which we have now arrived, towards 1680, when Louis abandoned himself to Mademoiselle de Fontanges, through weakness, and returned to Madame de Montespan, through habit, he was drawn to the side of Madame de Maintenon through taste. Madame de Montespan was speedily relieved of one rival by death; but the other was too many for her. All the brilliance of her spirit was nothing before the solid reason and profound dissimulation of Scarron's widow. Queen Maria Theresa, in the meantime, looked on these debaucheries of her lord for twenty years, without complaining, and without being pitied. She rarely stirred out of her apartments but to mix coldly in some cold ceremony. When told that Louis had taken a new mistress, she replied—"That was the old one's affair," and thought no more of the matter. She spoke little herself, and people spoke little of her. Once only she caused some excitement at court. It was when she lay in of a little girl, as black as a Moor, who was brought up in a convent, from which she never stirred in her life. This odd circumstance was explained by the presence of a young negro in the Queen's suite, who had one day frightened his mistress. At Paris there was a place where all the gallantries of Louis were criticised with freedom and ridicule—the drawing-room of Ninon de l'Enclos—where the most profound mysteries of Versailles found an echo. The greatest ladies, and those of the best reputation, came to inform Ninon of the new intrigues of the day, and Ninon did not allow one to pass. She was biting and audacious in her satire, tearing away every veil, and sparing nobody. Her witticisms were collected, repeated, and hawked about everywhere. They amused the very court which had occasioned them, arriving even at the ears of Louis himself, who often asked what Ninon had said last. This was truly a singular epoch. The court was full of prelates, who witnessed all these improprieties without uttering a word. Bossuet himself was silent; and the task of censuring the manners of the court was left in the hands of a courtesan.

How closely allied are elements of character in the voluptuary or debauchee, and the bigoted devotee—characters, in certain circumstances, divided only by twenty or thirty years—and how the blackness of the sinner enhances the brightness of the saint. It was upon knowledge of this fact, which is never so fully developed as among the devotees of the Romish Church, that Scarron's widow founded her empire. "She felt that Louis, arrived at the last stage of debauchery, wanted repose rather than excitement, and, pondering on this theory, she soon began to please and satisfy that withered heart which could no longer be inflamed. She found, besides, in preaching moderation, that there still lingered at the bottom of his soul some traits of the devotee, which she, at length, developed with consummate skill." This part of the history of the court, and the character and long reign of the favourite, who had stepped in when satiety and the terrors and compunctions of superstition became her allies, is instructive. To expiate the sins, past and to come, of the King, the ceremonial observances of the Church were not sufficient; and, from the filth of debauchery, he plunged into the fury of religious persecution. The wrath of heaven was propitiated by fouler crimes than those by which its laws had been outraged. The revocation of the edict of Nantes was signed—the most cruel outrages were committed upon his unoffending Protestant subjects, who were murdered and tortured; and not even allowed to escape from the demoniacal fury of the royal saint, who shortly afterwards braved the pride of the French monarchy, and fully propitiated the wrath of heaven for his early debaucheries, by secretly becoming the husband of Madame de Maintenon.

The traditional history of the intrigues of this cold-blooded female Machiavel, to be declared Queen of France, are amusing, but are very probably exaggerated. The church and the state both interfered here. The loyal French people, and the nobility, who would have forgiven their King a whole seraglio, with constant additions, and liked him all the better for his gallantries, would not have endured a Queen of France that was not of the blood-royal. From the extreme of licentiousness to that of equally extreme devotion—ceremonial devotion—for we will not degrade religion by giving even its name to the bigotry and ritual formality of Louis, or the hypocrisy of Madame de Maintenon—the King had passed by the most rapid transition. The voluptuary grew at once into the ascetic, and the court followed the example of the King. Gallantry had been the fashion when he was young, and amorous hypocrisy became the rule when he was old and devout.

It will be seen that the Picturesque is of much more permanent and higher interest in the literary department than the ordinary annuals. It contains the essence of history; and both facts and lessons. The plates, the landscapes, or architectural views, are all good, and well finished. The likenesses of some of the royal favourites are less deserving of commendation. They cannot be from authentic portraits. They look, indeed, like wax figures in court costumes, or those personages at which children wont to peep through a glass at a penny-show, where they were assured that they had a view of the King and Court either of France or England, walking in Kew Gardens or the Tuileries.

James' Book of the Passions.

This elegantly printed volume is embellished or illustrated in the style of the Annals. It consists of six tales, each descriptive of a passion—or, at least, more descriptive than dramatic. Remorse, Revenge, Love, Jealousy, Despair, and Hatred, are each assumed as the subject-matter of a single story. Mr James may not have conquered a difficulty which Joanna Baillie scarcely surmounted; but he has produced a book that will while away an hour pleasantly enough, to those who seek amusement in pictures of life which are about as true to nature as the engravings with which they are connected.

WHAT NEED WE SEEK THE BALLOT, SIRS?*

WHAT need we seek the Ballot, sirs?

Why should we vote by stealth?

We fear not kings nor ministers—

Why insolence or wealth?

Would LANDLORDS wield us?—Who are they?

Whence spring they? Let us see:

They once, perhaps, led in the fray—

WHO COMBATED?—Why, WE!

No longer useful, like the drones,

Still ranked as "men at arms!"†

They were allowed—the mighty ones!—

To quit their place on terms.‡

Their dull successors, monted men,

Mere dealers in vile pelf,

Have now no other care or pain

But caring for their self.

They sell the use of land, we buy—

Both subject to the state:

Whence then their claims of dignity,

Or right to rule our fate?

They gone, all still would be as now,

Our profits only—more;

But, wanting us, no blade would grow

Where girdles now run o'er.

The thews and sinews of the State,

Of use where'er we go,

Is it for us to dodge and wait,

Who might command? Not so!

Each husbandman should have his lease,

And thence the means to live;

And use his every right in peace,

O'erawed by none that live.

"May one not use what is their own?"

Some fool exclaims—Amen!

But nothing has been made our own

To give the power to pain.

The earth on which the empire stands,

Is ITS, not any MAN'S;

It is in the nation's hands,

And its abuse in none's.

Let husbandmen make common cause

To scout the wretch that grinds,

And soon the maker of the laws

Were harmless as his hinds.

Who next insults? The wealthy cit.

His tradesmen must succumb;

He, great by wealth, and not by wit,

Would make the world sing dumb!

Proclaim him! Let no tradesman serve

This dollar-chief—this clay!

One flip—and you for life unnerve

This tyrant twopenny!

Yes! should the very menial but

Take up the Freeman's cause,

The very humblest household slut

Could vindicate the laws.

Untaught themselves to serve, the great

Must buy, at any price

Of wealth or yielding, those who wait—

And that too in a trice.

Behold the greatest potentate

Reduced to roast and stew!

The greatest dandy in the State

Could scarcely clean a shoe!

We blame the Irish helot for,

Though starving, he'll not serve

The man he hates: but the wherefor

Might all our ire unnerve.

If 'tis the man who tramples on

His heart, his only wealth,

He's right; and we such rights should own,

And aid, and not by stealth.

Who shall resist the working man,

The sinews of the State?

By whom it stands, as it began,

Its founder and its fate!

And why should we the Ballot seek?

Why should we vote by stealth?

WE—if we will it, poor and weak;

In fact, the commonwealth!

And Whigs or Tories should we trust?

No!—both alike are fools!

And shameless—yes!—is this unjust?—

Let us inspect the tools:—

Stands not great LAMBTON, (that is, great

As public men now go,

The least and meanest in the State,)

Stands he not thus, or so?

An empty jobber, and so gross

Even PELL upbraids with truth;

Whilst we who furnish all the dross

Must vote by stealth, forsooth!

Down, down, then, with the Ballot, sirs!—

He's shamed that votes by stealth,

Or quails to Kings or Ministers,

Or insolence or wealth!

PHILO-BERANGER.

* We insert this poem, not that we agree in the leading dogma expressed, but to shew what we know to be now the predominant feeling among a great majority of the unfranchised—and those the most energetic. Ballot, like every other right too long withheld, has lost half its original value, and all its grace. The masses have become indifferent to Ballot; and, unless coupled with a large extension of the Suffrage, if not with Universal Suffrage, would consider it—whether justly or not is a different question—as a positive injury to them. Lord John Russell may, therefore, spare his contumacious refusal of the Ballot this session; the ten-pound voters in towns do need and wish it; the peasants will now, in a vast majority of cases, vote with their lords, whether protected or not; the working-men despise what, if they conceded, would have been esteemed a boon, and have proved one.

† Queen's Pensioners—Yeomen of the Guard.

‡ Henry II. first allowed the Barons, Earls, or Aldermen, to sell their places as Landreeves; a thing entirely incompetent, but found to be convenient. They had become nuisances.

BLANCHE DELAMERE.

CHAPTER I.

BLANCHE, COUNTESS OF DELAMERE, was "the accident of an accident;" and one exceedingly mortifying and provoking to the noble lady whose pure Norman stock she came into the world as if on purpose to taint with the admixture of her plebeian blood. The father of Blanche Georgiana Yates Delamere had been the only surviving representative, almost the only living relative, and the sole heir to the long accumulating honours of a very ancient and still wealthy family, now represented by the Countess Marguerite Delamere, a Peeress in her own right.

In very early youth, when just entered at Oxford, a high-spirited and ingenuous, though a proud and wayward boy, George Delamere had become passionately enamoured of a very lovely, ingratiating, and well-educated girl, who, by the ill favour of her stars, had been promoted to the perilous office of reader and amanuensis to the Countess; and who, until the low and degrading attachment was surmised, had, from her meekness of submission and sweetness of manners, been rather a favourite with her haughty patroness. The origin of the beautiful Margaret Yates was no loftier than being the fondly cherished and only child of the curate of Stoke Delamere, himself the descendant of an old stanch race of respectable north-country yeomen, some of whom were becoming opulent, from having early engaged in the cotton manufacture.

When the guilt of the youthful culprits had been fully detected, and it was ascertained that the heraldic readings for which the Honourable George all at once took so violent a fancy, had been followed by stolen interviews in the gardens, and way-layings in the glades and dingles of the park, through which Margaret passed on her daily visit to her father, the Countess summoned the youth to her presence. She received him in the library in baronial state, and with the grandeur, dignity, and severity of the times when aristocratic parents were the stately tyrants of their children—the children hating or dissembling slaves. The guilt and audacity of him—a boy, a child—meditating insult or injury to a young person under the protection of her roof, one of her household! immediately about her person! was duly expiated upon by the Countess.

"Insult, injury to Margaret!" exclaimed the arraigned youth, indignantly.

"Presumptuous boy!—this tone to me!" returned the Countess—the blood of the Delameres rushing to her knitting and throbbing brows—"Is the seduction and shame of a virtuous girl, however low be her rank, no injury to her, no degradation to you?"

The eyes of the youth flashed wildfire.

"What wretch has abused your ear, madam? The love of her guardian angel is not more pure towards Margaret than is mine. That I love her is most true—that I hope to deserve—to win her love—most true—but that!"

"The boy is mad!" cried the Countess, sternly. "Do you, young sir, remember who you are, and in whose presence you stand? If you forget, I cannot. Her love!—win her love!—away, sir; your tutors have been negligent. This boyish folly must be whipped out of you." (This taunt to the proud heir of the Delameres—a man of eighteen, a lover of three months!) "It shall be my task to command the girl her duty."

The lofty dame rung the large silver bell which stood on the table before her easy chair, or rather throne of judgment, and Margaret was ordered up in thoughtless, passionate haste. The Countess was not a woman of conciliation or management. She could not be made to understand how a Delamere, a peeress in her own right, a race ennobled as long as the De Roosens and the De Cliffords, should not carry all points with a high hand, or by her sovereign pleasure. The pale and trembling girl, conscience-struck, and inexpressibly alarmed, glided slowly into the room, like a doomed thing. Tears were her only answer to the abrupt and contumelious questionings of the Countess; and the sobbing, reiterated words—"Forgive me, my Lady—forgive me; suffer me to return to my poor father!" were all she could utter.

"Margaret, why forgiveness?" said the rebel lover, walking up to the girl's side—"Is it then a crime to love me? But you do not love me—you contemn me, shun me, perhaps hate me—while I!"—The sentence was interrupted by the girl's imploring glance, as, for one moment, she raised her eyes to her impetuous lover, full of tender reproach, and of inextinguishable love. That look's electricity was instantly felt by one who, if she had ever known, must have long outlived the remembrance of the passion whose excess it spoke.

"Are we to have a love-scene rehearsed in my very presence?" cried the Countess, starting from her chair. "Begone, audacious boy!—on your duty, I command you! The bold companion of your folly shall be fitly cared for. Gracious heavens! for what sin of mine or of my fathers is this stroke sent upon my house in my old age!"

CHAPTER II.

"Blood of the Mirabels!" said the jocular, witty, and impudent new-come London footman to the three giggling house-maids and the two young laundresses, as they sat over their double ale in the servants'-hall, about two hours after this scene—"what a kippage my lady was in! and what a rumpus up stairs! Mr George off like the whirlwind, as if the deuce were after him, while it is only the Chaplain to fetch him back; and Miss Yates, poor thing, crying and packing her handbox. Can't say why the lad should put out his eyes to a pretty girl, or sing dumb because the old 'un is as proud as Lucifer's bride."

"It's very 'dacious, though, of a poor Methodist's daughter to go for to think of being a 'my lady,'" said the elder housemaid.

"But they say she won't or would not have him; and I'm sure she always runs out of his way as if the red bull were after her, when she sees him in the chestnut avenue—for I see'd that myself," added the younger girl.

"Poh! all make believe of you skittish ladies, Miss Molly," replied the footman, archly: "run, that you may be pursued behind the bush."

"Well, if I were a young gentleman, or a young lord," said the youngest and prettiest of the housemaids, "I would follow my own fancy, and marry ever a pretty girl I liked, whatever my grandmother said, though with never a shift"—she corrected herself hastily—"chemise to her back."

"Oh fie, Miss Betty," interrupted the footman, smiling wickedly and archly; and the young and really pure-minded girl blushed at a supposed breach of delicacy; while Miss Molly, affectedly pushing Harry, cried, "Go, you naughty fellow!"

"I mean I would rather marry for love than money, any day," added the young girl.

"Bravo!" cried Harry, in honour of this generous sentiment from a very pretty girl. "And make pretty Miss Yates 'my lady,' rather than ever a one of that skinny, dun Lady Honoria my Lady wishes to tie my Lord George to; and she is an old puss too." There was here a side glance at Miss Molly, head-broom of the chambers in Val Crucis Abbey; and Harry laughed, and Betty giggled.

"Had she but a few drops of good blood in her, our George might do worse," continued the and free and easy gentleman's gentleman.

"Blood here, blood there," said the provincial under-cook, "the blood without the suet won't make the dumplin'. And Mr Jervis Yates, her uncle, is as rich as Cruises; and a coining o' more, by them factories of his'n."

"And neither chick nor child but herself among the Yatees; and were she once a 'my lady,' never a poor soul of his kin would handle a stiver of the fortune the nigger is grinding out o' the faces o' the poor," said the elder laundress, who had great local knowledge of the district in which Mr Yates was flourishing.

"Ay, ay," added the north-country under-cook, "ilka one lards the fat pig's tail. But I reckon if Lord George got Jervis Yates' fortin, they might keep a decenter table for poor servants, and no ha' the housekeeper's long nose for ever a-poking in the dripping can; so I says—Amen!"

"Suppose, ladies, we drink to the good luck of the match," cried the gallant Harry.

"But, gracious, not in more of that nasty, heavy, fat ale," said Betty.

"A pitcher of stingo is drink for a squire," cried the under-cook and brewer of the Abbey.

"Faugh!" rejoined the refined Harry, producing a bottle of old and choice claret; and the happy marriage of our George and Miss Yates, was toasted by "the ladies" in the best vintage of the Countess's cellar. Before this revel was concluded below stairs, the Countess had conferred with her chaplain above. Afterwards, she consulted with her woman, and finally her pillow; and the result was, that Margaret should, as a measure of prudence and safety, remain at the Abbey, while her lover was to be sent to London till his college term.

The Countess repented the explanation into which her temper (she said her feelings) had hurried her. But George was a boy, whom the first glimpse of the world, of good society, and of well-born women, and even elegant women of pleasure, would shew his folly and bad taste; and the audacious hussy must be taught her duty. "What is Mr George but a child?" said the lady's maid. "Heaven bless him! a mere child. A woman of seventeen is more than a match for a boy of nineteen at any time, let alone having the arts of our sly Miss Margaret."

The hopes of the Countess—if it were possible to believe that she calculated upon the pleasures and seductions of the capital leading her grandson to forget his plebeian but virtue-strengthening attachment—were fully accomplished. George Delamere, surrounded by temptations, plunged into the vicious excesses of other young men of his rank; and, among her other sufferings and mortifications, Margaret had soon the misery of hearing the chaplain and his patroness discuss the gay follies of the high-spirited youth, who vindicated the blood of the Delameres on the turf, at the gaming-table, and in every fashionable haunt. His letters to Margaret, which it had cost her such agony of apprehension to receive, became shorter and more rare; and alarm for the detection of the correspondence was lost in a feeling tenfold more bitter, when few letters came. Those few were ever kind—or she tried to think so—ever delicate; and Margaret felt that all hope was not lost, that his heart could not be wholly changed, while he spared her those details of the fashionable scenes in which he was engaged, which he dutifully related to his grandmother, especially when he wanted a remittance. The agony of the Indian tied to the stake could not be more exquisite than the torture of the poor girl, compelled to control her feelings, and read and re-read these epistles to her conscious tormentor.

If, as we have said, the object of the Countess of Delamere had been to wean her heir from his ignoble attachment by plunging him into scenes of dissipation, it was amply fulfilled. Before he was of age, the Honourable George had been three times "ruined," and twice had his debts paid. If the incensed lady ventured to remonstrate against his profligacy and extravagance, the ready and careless apology was, that, in refusing to consent to his union with Margaret Yates, she had sacrificed the happiness of his life to her heartless pride, and he cared not what came next. Such observations rendered the Countess doubly indignant; and for some months she had broken off all intercourse with her heir. Poor Margaret was now to experience another stage of misery, when six weeks passed, and no tidings of any sort came; and when the former "cruel letters" would have been comparative bliss to the torturing anxiety—the yearning suspense of her present condition. No one in the Abbey knew much of the prodigal heir of Delamere, save, perhaps, the lower servants. He had been on the Continent; he was said to have gone to the Greek Isles. The newspapers, gently ministering to the tuft-hunting propensities of John Bull, who takes such a devouring interest in the movements of the fashionable world, represented the Honourable George Delamere as now in London, now at Melton Mowbray, now here, now there; and Harry, the oracle of the servants' hall, avouched "that the chap had some spunk in him after all—shewed blood." The second table discussed the affair more respectfully and gravely; and the chaplain and Countess Marguerite held daily senates and councils on the gloomy prospects of the House of Delamere. "A dashing affair," announced to the housemaids by Master Harry, about this time, deeply incensed the Countess, and also created an immense sensation in the fashionable world. The Honourable George had, one night, by mistake, carried off a brilliant foreign singer in the first blaze of her fame, who was claimed as wife by some other foreigner, who, at least, appreciated her salary in the character of husband. In the first heat of anger, the old lady paused upon the propriety of yielding to the wishes of the headstrong youth, before he had utterly ruined the health and principles of the representative of the Delameres, painful and deplorable as the sacrifice was. What was her unfeigned astonishment, her glowing indignation, to hear the humble curate, summoned to her august presence, emphatically declare, that, although he never would force his daughter's inclinations, yet so far as legitimate paternal influence might go, it should be the duty of his life to warn Margaret against the misery and degradation of an alliance with George Delamere, until he was a changed man. He added, "that he trusted to her own good principles and strength of mind enabling her soon to eradicate every trace of her misplaced and unhappy attachment." The silent and bitter tears of Margaret gave faint confirmation to these hopes of her father. This night, he carried her home with him—the mortified and angry Countess felt, as if in triumph.

"That insolent, beggarly, puritanical parson," said she to her chaplain, "has pride enough for a cardinal; will not even my coronet content his ambition for his offspring?" And the name of father and daughter were forbidden ever to be mentioned again within the walls of the Abbey. Whatever might have been the effect of this dreadful visitation on the health of the curate, it is certain he did not long survive it. He died of a fever caught in visiting a poor parishioner; and his orphan daughter was transferred to the care of her wealthy uncle, Mr Jervis Yates.

Meanwhile, the rebellious heir was once more forgiven and taken into favour; and all his debts, whether of honour or dishonour, were once again discharged. As his opposition to every matrimonial overture was as resolute as ever, and his name, at this time, too much up, to make him, without going through some intermediate state of penance and purification, an acceptable match in the great but poor aristocratic family, to one of whose five marriageable daughters his grandmother wished him to throw the handkerchief, it was settled that he should, for a time, sojourn in the East, as an attaché of an old family friend, lately appointed ambassador to the Porte.

Chance led him, immediately before his departure, to attend the county races, where again chance introduced him to his old acquaintance, Mr Jervis Yates—a coarse and unpolished link in the electric chain of his fondest associations. "Could she love me still, all unworthy as I am?" was his painful yet tender thought; and he felt that Margaret could. The accidental invitation of Mr Jervis Yates, was gladly accepted; and where much love was, there came full forgiveness. How willing was Margaret to listen to those half apologies, and half and very slight explanations; and to believe that seductive example, and the snares of the wicked and deceitful world, had, for a transitory moment, only for a moment, led him astray, who protested, and truly protested, that, in his wildest aberrations, he had never ceased to love her!—and how blest the gradation of her softening feelings, from the proud, silent indignation with which the insulted girl met him, through the silent, weeping regrets that such things had been—into full reconciliation and renewal of love and confidence—into a dream almost as ecstatic as that of the few untroubled moments of their early passion!

There was now no high-principled, wise father to oppose the warnings of wisdom and duty to the wishes of the lovers. In the East, Mr Delamere felt that he should be spared the sound of the fashionable world's dread and withering laugh, still so appalling to him; and Margaret saw how she might for years escape the more dread presence of that awful lady who had been as the Nightmare of her young existence. The only individual wholly delighted with the hurried marriage, was, perhaps, Mr Jervis Yates, whose ambition was gratified at his niece becoming a Countess in prospect, upon any terms. It was in his carriage the fugitives repaired to Scotland; it was he doubled the allowance to Mrs George Delamere, of the paltry £1500 a-year, withdrawn by the Countess in the first impulse of impotent fury; and it was still Mr Jervis Yates against whom the fond and meekly enduring wife could feel rather than perceive, that the stomach of her aristocratic partner rose, even while he accepted the low-born man's benefits.

CHAPTER III.

The exiles had been for nearly two years in Syria—for Delamere had speedily disengaged himself from his diplomatic appointment—when Mr Yates wrote, that the serious illness of the Countess opened a near prospect to the brilliant succession. The tidings came too late. Delamere, an altered and a sadder man, was, ere they reached him, daily watching, by an infant's cradle, or by a solitary grave under the Cedars of Lebanon—a grave whither devoted affection for himself had hurried the gentle and endearing creature, who, in teaching him to love, had first taught him all the charm, and now all the misery and nothingness of life. Mrs Delamere, in attending on her husband under an attack of the plague, when friends, attendants, and even physicians had abandoned them, subsequently sank under the frightful malady, from which her husband recovered, having, as he felt, paid her life for his. Their infant had been received into the family of the nearest European Consul, and Delamere abandoned himself to solitude and sorrow. Yet was not this time misspent. It was during this melancholy period, that, in perusing the journals of his wife—so full, from earliest girlhood, of himself—and the letters and private papers of her father, that the high-born Delamere obtained the first perception of a virtue which transcended all his previous ideas. The high-minded integrity, and simple, self-sustaining dignity of the humble pastor; the gentle forbearance, the unflinching tenderness—pure emanations of the unbounded love of her he had not learned fully to appreciate until she was for ever gone—came to him now like heavenly revelations. How unworthy had he been of so noble a creature!—yet how wretched to have lost her! How low seemed now the standard of the false world's virtue, its honours, and its ambitions, compared with that placed before him in the writings of his humble, Christian father-in-law! He began to suspect that his dislike or antipathy to Mr Jervis Yates might be the effect of aristocratic prejudice; for was not he the brother of this meek-minded and high-hearted man?—and, in the sudden recoil of his feelings, he appointed Mr Yates of Bellevue Park, and his own friend the Consul, the guardians of the rights and person of his infant heiress.

The birth of the infant Blanche had been duly and dutifully intimated to the Countess, her august great-grandmother, who deigned no reply. Her only congratulation had been an angry remark to her chaplain upon the “impudence and presumption of bestowing the favourite female name of the Delameres upon Miss Yates' base-born brat,” while she threw him the letter. That prudent and excellent person knew better than that the child was base-born; but he had no desire to cause his patroness another of those ambiguous fainting-fits, which might have proved fatal to his hopes of the good living for which, through a dozen years, he had sorely laboured.

It was from the newspapers, soon afterwards, that the Countess first learned that “the bane of her life and of her house,” as she termed Margaret, was no more:—“Dead or alive, I should never have acknowledged that intriguing and ungrateful minion as his wife; nor the offspring of a clandestine Scottish marriage as the heiress of Delamere,” was her lament.

Her hopes of the glory of “her house” revived with the death of Margaret. Delamere was not yet twenty-three—and widowers of twenty-three, in all ranks, and however afflicted, are generally consolable. Yet strange reports came home about his habits; nor were those who knew him best surprised to hear that the wayward and eccentric heir of the Delameres—a man of violent passions and enthusiastic feelings—had, upon the death of his wife, and his own narrow escape from death, become devout, if not a gloomy ascetic, buried for life in one of the monasteries of Sinai. It was in vain that his grandmother repeatedly wrote, urging his return; in vain employed the influence of the ambassador, and, finally, of the Sublime Porte, to drive the rebel to England, and to “his duty to his religion and his house.”

Mr Jervis Yates indirectly co-operated in urging the same measure; for, though the old lady, surrounded by chaplain, surgeon, steward, “own maid,” housekeeper, and cook, all alike deeply interested in her preservation, seemed to bear a charmed life, it was medically if not morally certain, that she must pass off suddenly at last, and perhaps speedily; and wise in her heir to be near the spot. Bellevue park was quite at the command of Mr Delamere. The Countess despatched one letter, which she did not shew even to her chaplain. It excited the deepest indignation in her grandson, though it contained the magnificent offer—the rich bribe—of instantly surrendering all the honours and emoluments of her station to her heir, upon terms specified. “The heartless woman—the cold-blooded aristocrat!” was the exclamation of the gloomy Delamere, to the wife of the Consul. “And she would actually strip herself of all those baubles and distinctions she prizes so highly, to gain her unworthy end! Her hatred and prejudice have depraved her natural feelings, as well as perverted her moral sense. Would she have me dishonour the memory of my wife, and bastardize my child, and bribe me, by free license in vice, to the line of conduct which her idiot pride exacts?”

He replied to the offer of the Countess rashly and resentfully, though sorrowfully; and, in answer to one insinuation, stated, “that all the honours of English nobility could not wean him from a lonely grave in Syria; nor all the powers of Hell keep him from England, if the honour of his wife's memory, and the rights of birth of her child, made his appearance needful there.” The rage of the Countess, on the receipt of this letter, was unbounded. The measure of her hatred of her contumacious heir at last fairly exceeded that which she had entertained towards his submissive wife.

Failing the infant Blanche, the honours of the lofty and far-descended Delameres reverted to a little boy still at school in a remote town in Ireland, whither his mother, the widow of “a Captain Delamere,” had retired from motives of economy. The degree of kindred was so distant, that only a herald or genealogical lawyer could have reckoned it. With the mother of the boy a communication was instantly opened.

But the grave in Syria was not long solitary ; and indurated as the feelings of the Countess seemed, in the first revulsion and anguish of her heart for the loss of the last of her family—him who had been once the idol of her hopes—sentiments of tenderness sprang up, and the claims of the infant Blanche might have been favourably considered, save for the impertinent interference of the child's guardian and low-born relative, Jervis Yates, Esq., of Bellevue Park.

"Do I not remember this paltry weaver, when a lout of a boy, deeming it an honour to run through the muddy lanes to open the gates for the lowest of my menials," said the haughty dame; "while the boor, his sire, held the plough on his own fields, in better ordered times than these—times when every churl at least knew his own place."

The question of legitimacy or illegitimacy—heiress or not heiress—now assumed a very grave shape ; and soon Lancashire, the West Riding, and the County Palatine, were fairly divided into two bitter factions—of legitimists and illegitimists, aristocrats and democrats, Blancheites and Marguerites. Strange it was, that some of the plebeians declared loudly against Mr Jervis Yates ; while a few of the patricians pronounced the always eccentric Countess now fairly mad. But these persons were of the order whom she contemptuously denominated "Pitt's Peers," or "Peg Nicolson's Knights," only one degree better in birth than "Jerry Yates" himself.

Several years had been spent in the contest, and immense sums of money lost on both sides ; but the suit still proceeded briskly and hopefully. The litigants were admirably pitted—the pride of purse, and much real respectability of character and good sense, however alloyed by pitiful ambition on the one hand, and extreme obstinacy, ignorance, and aristocratic hauteur on the other.

The innocent object of this legal battle still lived in happy ignorance in Syria, in the charge of the lady of the Consul, to whom her dying father had committed her, and who had cherished her orphan childhood with maternal tenderness. It was not until the seventh year of the great suit, that, by the judgment of the Chancellor, the little girl in Syria was declared the legitimate child of George Delamere, and consequently presumptive heiress to the Countess, his grandmother. The Countess appealed to her peers—she wrote to Queen Charlotte with her own hand. She tried to stir and warm the blood of the Howards, the Cavendishes, and Stanleys, and of whatever, as she said, was still worthy of the name of noble in England, to sympathize with her wrongs—and in vain. "Little cared I for the decision of that pettifogging, pitiful fellow, sprung from the dregs of the people, who carries the Great Seal of England," cried the frantic lady ; "but I did hope there was still enough of manhood and chivalry left among the Peers of England, to have protected a helpless and insulted woman, one of themselves :—but no ! there is neither faith nor honour among them. I shake them off. The person of Marguerite Delamere shall never more darken the doors of St. James' Palace. From a Hanoverian Court, I or mine had little to expect. And to this insult to a lonely, childless woman, the last of a brave and noble race, the few real, though degenerate Peers of England have consented !—what had I to look for from the descendants of Castlemaine and Nelly Gwynn ?" In her blind anger, the Countess vowed never again to stir beyond her park walls. England she excommunicated, with its degenerate Peers. A happy diversion of feelings which tended to madness, was contrived by the chaplain, who suggested that, since the law had declared Blanche her heiress, she was entitled to claim the care and education of the child—even as her nearest relative ; and she soon became as much excited in thwarting Mr Jervis Yates as in vituperating the degenerate Peerage.

Scarcely had the mansion and numerous mills of that gentleman ceased to blaze in honour of his victory, when he was compelled to surrender the Countess Blanche, as his domestics had been instructed to call her, to the care of her grandmother, as the Court of Chancery had directed. Blanche had not been many months in England, when, in a carriage on which the arms of the Delameres and Yateses were learnedly quartered, and, with a cortège that might have sufficed for a princess, the rich manufacturer, attended by his law-agent and counsel, conducted the bewildered child to her ancestral home in Val Crucis Abbey. The party was received in form by the Countess, in the grand saloon or hall. She was attended by her whole household, from the chaplain downwards—all the men-servants being duly marshalled, with a few mutes and supernumeraries from the stables and gardens. The ceremony of surrender and reception was gone through with great decorum and solemnity, to the especial wonderment of Hassan, the Arab attendant of the fair child.

It was to the hand of this wild, swarthy, picturesque-looking person, her father's attendant in the Desert, and her guide across the seas, that the little Blanche clung the more closely when desired to approach the lady named her grandmamma. It was round the neck of the kneeling Arab that she wrapped her arms in uncontrollable sorrow, imploring him "to take her home—back to her own home." Though no one, save Mr Jervis Yates, knew one word of that plaintive, wailing speech, the spectators were affected by the deep grief of the child. Mr Yates, whose sense of propriety, and of the lofty presence in which he stood, began to be scandalized at this scene of violent sorrow between persons so dissimilar in condition as a future Countess of Delamere and an Arab servant, interfered, somewhat abruptly, to end that prolonged weeping-farewell, at which the old lady stared, haughty and vacant. The child, unaccustomed to contradiction or control, looked angry and defy-ingly towards her plebeian uncle, and resolutely maintained her place by Hassan's side. The chaplain whispered to his lady. Her features relaxed; she looked more graciously to the indignant little girl, fancying she perceived a small rearing of the swan-like neck, an indescribable proud turn of the aristocratic head, as Blanche looked postingly and scornfully towards Mr Jervis Yates. "The blood of the Delameres" was mounting in this small and degenerate specimen of the race, and her Ladyship hailed the sign. The chaplain and the lady whispered again; and then the reverend personage, stepping forward, in a very bland voice and courteous manner, informed the child that her kind grandmamma, the Countess of Delamere, would receive Hassan into the household until she should become more familiarized with her new home. It was in the speaking eye of the Arab, that Blanche read the meaning of this speech, even before he interpreted it to her in French, and as rapidly and eagerly uttered his own thanks. The delighted child, instantly comprehending what she had gained, and from whom, sprung as of impulse towards her noble relative, gracefully kissed her hands, and pressed them to her forehead and kissed them again. The stately lady was taken by surprise. She was almost affected.

"What a lovely graceful creature, and how very like!" was the whisper of the housekeeper.

The Countess, recollecting herself, drew up, saying, coldly, "Enough, child;" and she bowed Mr Yates and his counsel off, and gave orders that "Lady Blanche Delamere" should be conducted to the nursery apartments prepared for her. The words, the title, (albeit one of mere courtesy,) spoken in the hearing of his lawyers, half appeased the resentment of Mr Jervis Yates, who shook hands with his grandniece, and, bowing profoundly, backed out of the presence, and for years saw no more of his intended heiress.

The little Blanche, on the insinuation of the chaplain, who, as usual, dined tête-à-tête with the Countess, was sent for after the dessert had been placed on the table. Her costume was singular, and her ways even more "odd" than her eastern dress. Her imperfect English, and wild glances of shyness, of proud defiance, or of keen scrutiny, were pronounced boldness or sulkenness. His Reverence judged better and more kindly; and good-naturedly ventured to impute her shyness to her strange position; and advised that she should be let alone; while his noble patroness maunderingly bewailed her own hard fate in being plagued with such a charge, and the desolate condition of the house of Delamere.

A plate of dates served in the dessert, attracted the regard of the child. She fixed her eyes passionately upon them, burst into tears, and threw herself upon the carpet in an agony of sorrow. The chaplain hastened to present her with some of the fruit, and she pressed it fondly to her lips and bosom. She was, by his caresses and signs, induced to eat; and she soon smiled to him, and forgot her grief. The Countess stared at the child in an amusing state of perplexity. There was the creature she had wrested from the hands of Mr Jervis Yates, her grandson's child, decked out like a stage-player, unable to sit upon a chair, like a Christian child, or to speak a word of English—yet, alas! the heiress of her house! There was a singular mixture of refined awkwardness and free natural grace in the looks, and motions, and attitudes of the child of the Desert; yet, it must be owned, Blanche was much more like a young gipsy than a well-born English girl. The chaplain found amusement in watching her proceedings; while she, in turn, seemed to drink in with her lustrous eyes the conversation which was maintained about herself and her parents. Before lights had been ordered, the windows of the small dining-room used by the Countess when alone, were thrown open, at her desire, to admit the perfume of the tuberose and other plants arranged in the terrace which ran along this front of the Abbey, the Delameres being, as she always observed when repeating the same order, "epicures in flower-scents."

"And this little lady displays the hereditary taste," the chaplain ventured to remark, as Blanche, recognising the flowers of her Syrian home, darted out upon the terrace, kissed their petals, addressed them, fondly flitted about among them, like a butterfly, enjoying their beauty and odour, and finally sung to them, a wild and low, but beautiful strain, in some tongue unknown at Cambridge. The stately lady was somewhat mollified. She had baffled Mr Yates. Good digestion had waited on appetite; and a few glasses of old Madeira, medically ordered, and strictly administered by the chaplain, had attended on both. He again, in the regular course of his duty, as physician in ordinary, as body-curer and soul-preserver, filled her glass.

"I am almost sure I have had my proper quantity already, doctor." The chaplain protested, and solicited her attention to Blanche:—

"Well, really, it is a not ungraceful, foreign-looking, little creature—but all English children have now got a sad foreign air—and if those Yateses can be kept aloof—which must be"—

"Shall be!" reiterated the emphatic chaplain.

"If she is properly trained, and never hear nor surmise one word of what is low in her descent—for which I shall issue immediate orders—who knows, my excellent friend, but that the Providence who has ever graciously watched over my illustrious race, may even from this insignificant girl rear up anew the desolate house of Delamere? The throne of Great Britain will, in all human probability, one day be filled by a girl, goodly as was the family of noble sons which my queen and my friend, Charlotte of Strelitz, bore to England. Shall I repine, when the royal house is thus left desolate, while mine may again be raised from the dust? But, alas that it should be by such means! The child shall never know anything of her origin, not even of the unhappy person who gave her birth; yet what, my dear friend, can cure that fatal taint? You guess, my excellent friend, that a double-Delamere must have faith in blood."

"And that the pure and noble will overcome the mean," replied the chaplain, who really suffered daily martyrdom from the twaddle of his patroness; though, with a steady eye to the expected Rectory, he bore all with exemplary philosophy. "Your Ladyship's usual acuteness perceived how the little lady bore herself when that person, that Mister Jervis Yates, interfered with her; one spark shews the flint as well as a thousand. But what is the child about?" He hastened to the window. The crescent moon had risen in her brightness, and was shedding silvery radiance on the ancestral towers and woods of the little heiress. This was another dear friend met in a strange land; and, turning from the flowers, Blanche was gracefully kissing her hand, and bending in adoration to the Queen of Heaven.

"My Heavens! is the child an idolater also?" cried the lady, falling back, quite shocked, in her pile of cushions. The clergyman was not half so much alarmed; and when the girl clapped her hands, and the Arab sprung to her side from the gardens, and both together talked, gesticulated, and pointed with rapture to the sight; and when the child drew the chaplain to the window, and, in broken English and with joyous looks, shewed him the blessed planet, and attempted to say, "She shines in Syria too," he could not help thinking her very like her beautiful mother—that poor Margaret whose sufferings from their patroness he had so often pitied, and whom he could almost have married himself, provided he had first got the Rectory. He signed to Hassan to be gone, shut the windows, and led the child to her grandmother, and, with a little pious fraud, or perhaps two frauds, pretended to interpret to the old lady the flattering and kind things which Blanche said in Arabic, (a language of which he knew not a word,) of her "dear, grand, princess grandmamma," and of her own love and gratitude. The humour of the Countess became so gracious that he ventured to sound her upon keeping up some sort of prudent connexion between her heiress and the enormously rich manufacturer. But on this topic he soon sang dumb, marvelling withal, well as he understood her, at the incredible folly of the woman, who said, vehemently and bitterly, "His money perish with him, sordid dog! The very air of the north of England is polluted with these filthy factories. Some one," she continued, glancing rather suspiciously and scornfully at her chaplain, "has had the impertinence to inform my woman, Martin, that this very fellow derives more profit from his dirty cotton concerns than the whole revenues of the Delamere estates. It is a lie!—a base lie! But, if it were true, who shall presume to weigh filthy lucre against the honour of an ancient race—against the rich blood of princes?" The child was staring, with her searching, soul-beaming eyes, upon the excited lady. "Take her away—out of my sight!

She is like her mother!" And the chaplain himself hurried Blanche away. Another affray arose. The child would not sleep with her newly-appointed nurse only, in her chamber. She demanded Hassan. She wept, and stormed, and stamped, like a little fury; and the Arab, who had scarcely been parted from her for one day of her short life, seemed equally resolute to maintain his post in her apartment. There was a compromise; and he slept as usually at her chamber door.

These early difficulties were gradually surmounted. Both Hassan and his charge became favourites with the household, and were tolerated by the Countess. The peace-making chaplain was the steady friend of both; and there were suspicions that he was even the secret correspondent of Mr Jervis Yates, who had now livings in his gift as well as money in his purse. Blanche, in a few months, made considerable progress in the English language, though very little in the Church Catechism; and when she either kissed hands to the moon, crossed herself, or called on Allah, her spiritual instructor was charitable, and had no more doubts of the ultimate Christianity of an English Countess than of her aristocratic feelings springing in due time. Her grandmother, on perceiving her readiness to cultivate the friendship of all sorts of people, and especially of the children admitted to weed in the gardens of the Abbey, hinted to the chaplain that the little wretch had, she feared, naturally the same democratic taint with which old Yates had, at one time, nearly vitiated the mind of her unhappy grandson, by unaccountable and most abominable interpretations of Scripture, to which the Church gave, she was sure, no sanction—such as, that to honour the king meant to honour the law, and other such like seditious and Radical trash. The chaplain always, however, "through the grace of God and the noble example of his patroness," hoped the best for the child, whom he probably loved, and to whom he was uniformly indulgent and attentive. It was a trial to Blanche, as well as to the Countess, when, after a very severe winter, the long-expected living became vacant, and he departed. At first, he spoke of remaining and appointing a curate; but then came his strong sense of spiritual duty in these awful times. He was, in truth, heartily tired of the weary work of attending upon and studying the caprices of a weak and violent woman; but, though he wished to recover his freedom, he wanted to retain his influence.

The piety of the Countess, it is to be feared, languished after his departure, and the education of Blanche stood wholly still. He was always looking out for a chaplain and tutor, but none proper to the high and double office could be found; so he still paid his patroness frequent and long visits, for the advantage of her soul, and of the mind of her heiress. The arrival of Dr Hayley, or "Madam Grandmamma's Religion," as Blanche named him, was ever welcome to the Countess, as an event in the dreary monotony of her elevated and dull existence; for she was now becoming as indolent in body as enfeebled in mind; and there was ever something to be discussed relating to the dignity of the Delameres, which no one could understand or appreciate so well as "the good Doctor."

Blanche alone, of that grand, cheerless, monotonous, and heartless, aristocratic household, was happier than she knew. Many loved or seemed to love her, and all flattered and bent to her will. The imperative orders of "Madam my grand-mamma," (as the child termed the Countess,) under pain of dire displeasure, and the penalty of instant dismissal, had prohibited the slightest mention of the story of ignoble birth; yet, by some means, Blanche divined much of the truth; and nature had already constituted her the warm champion of her plebeian mother. The interdict of the Countess could not extend to the Arab, who freely indulged the little girl's tender curiosity about her parents, and kept alive in her mind that beloved Syrian home, to which she skimmed back, flying through the air, in those rapturous dreams which she recounted to Hassan, and sometimes to the chaplain; her beaming eyes and lively gestures telling more than half the story. So excited did she become in relating her dreams, that the nurse-maids sometimes half fancied the little idolater and her wild attendant held intercourse, by means of broomsticks, with the pagan lands they decried.

Want of the society of children was the most severe of the present privations of Blanche. The little, shoeless, merry urchins, in their smock-frocks, who weeded, or scared away the birds, had been formally tabooed to the heiress, for reasons she could not be made to understand. The meaning of such English words as low, raiser, plebeian, were as incomprehensible as "Madam Grandma's" lectures on gules and argent, griffins and wiverns; nor could she understand why she must not go beyond the park walls, and run about the village green at play with the other children, on whom she looked so wistfully as often as a distant glimpse of them could be obtained. "Take me to the village—tell me of my own mamma," were the only wishes that could not be complied with; though the personal attendants of the Lady Blanche, if not judiciously kind, were attentive and indulgent; and all were studious to gratify the wishes of the only young creature who had for twenty years gladdened the dreary residence with the music of childhood's speech and joyous laughter, and with the sweetness of childhood's smiles—of her, moreover, who was the future lady of all, and whose young and warm heart it was their interest to impress and attach. Through the glades and wood-paths of the wide domain, she might gallop her pony at will, Hassan running by her side; but then came those impassable gates, guarded within by cross, old lodge-keepers, and assailed without by terrific giants and ogres, under the appalling names of Swing and the Weaver. On the other point, Blanche was more successful. If the Emperor of Austria could not prevent his grandson, the young Napoleon, from hearing the wondrous and interdicted tale of his father, it was not to be expected that the Countess of Delamere could prevent her heiress from learning something of her beautiful and gentle low-born mother.

Notwithstanding the edict which cut off the child from all congenial society, and her still imperfect knowledge of the language, it was wonderful how much eye knowledge she had acquired and stored for future rumination during her first year in England.

A scanty acquaintance with the language—more apparent, however, than real—sometimes betrayed her into ludicrous blunders and mistakes. She seemed to attach to particular words the meaning of deaf and dumb persons, who very often apply the true instead of the proper or rather the conventional word. Where another child would, even at her age, have softened the word ugly into plain—or a lie into a falsehood, or a fib—Blanche unconsciously spoke the true word, and called "a spade a spade." Many of her ideas were as odd and savage, or as anti-civilized as her words. Instead of prizing the society of the little gentle-folks who were occasionally permitted to come from some of the neighbouring seats to visit and play with her, she still sought the tabooed hoers and weeders. They were more living, she said, and more funny, and ran and jumped better, and she loved them more. This native innate vulgarity was studiously concealed from the Countess, who, in the frequent passionate caprices and headstrong fits of the mismanaged child, pleased herself to see the blood of the Delameres "assert itself."

CHAPTER IV.

The Countess, who had never recovered the insulting decision of the Peers, was now often confined to her winter suite of apartments; while the Lady Blanche, almost nine years old, reigned, with Hassan as her vizier, supreme from the stables to the attics of the Abbey—from the laundry to the conservatory. Her ignorance of language fortunately rendered the patois of nearly all the under domestics an unknown tongue.

One day, when Blanche had been nearly a year in the Abbey, she flew to the apartment of the Countess, exclaiming—

"Madam Grandma, your Religion is coming; I saw his carriage in the avenue. I am so happy! I shall dine with you to-day; and pray do order the poacher for dinner. Your Religion likes game—I have often heard him say so—and I wish to eat a bit of a poacher myself; in Syria we never had any."

"My Religion, child," interrupted the old lady, "coming up the avenue in a carriage! What do you mean? And to order a poacher for dinner!—you mean a pheasant, I presume. But you never will learn your mother tongue—I mean pure English," caught up the lady, who had made a slip in using the word mother. "I fancy you mean that Dr Hayley is coming—my former chaplain—who, though a worthy minister of religion, is not my Religion."

Blanche was not convinced. "What, then, is it?—this?" She touched the large gilt prayer-book, which now formed a part of the customary garniture of the dressing-room.

The Countess frowned.

"Or this?" And Blanche touched reverently the sacred, crimson-velvet hassock.

"My heavens! such deplorable ignorance!" exclaimed the petrified Countess—"something must be done with this heathen child."

"Oh, then, these are only what you do religion with—not your religion its ownself—I understand. I knew a lady at home, in Syria, who had so beautiful a Religion! a string of beads as long as so, and a Jesus of gold. But do, good madam, my grandma, order the poacher for dinner—the poacher the keepers shot last night."

"My heavens, child! the fellow is surely not shot dead! Good God! to what the guilt and audacity of the lower orders are driving persons of condition, in defending their property! But where is Martin—where your maid, young lady?—and why, with so little ceremony, do you intrude on my privacy uncalled?"

The nurse-maid tapped, entered, curtsied, and looked very demure.

"You are come just in time for a very naughty child, Mrs Martin," continued the old lady, as the nurse-maid stood curtsying on, and frightened as to the consequences of her pursuit of her fugitive charge. "Pray, is that wretched man—one of the Watertons of Millhurst, is he not?—is he seriously hurt?"

"Smartly winged, my Lady, and richly deserving it, the desperate villain! to go to clamber into the preserves, in spite of your Ladyship's strict orders about the game, every feather of it; though your Ladyship's housekeeper, in distributing the flannels last Christmas, gave his wife as fine a petticoat—three full widths—as any of your Ladyship's servants need wish for their own wear. Well, he won't clamber over my Lady's park pales in haste again, ungrateful vagabond;—so please come away, Lady Blanche; but tell her Ladyship first how you ran off in spite of me."

"I did," said Blanche, gravely, and without once looking at her nurse, who stood dangling her bonnet. "Then, madam, a poacher is a man. I shall remember to tell Hassan that—not a bird—not a beast."

"Surely, child; a worthless, lawless wretch, who breaks into my preserves to kill and destroy the game—my hares and my pheasants!"

"And you hire the keepers to shoot poachers when they shoot birds?"

"Surely, child," said the instructive grandmother—"but not quite that. I, and persons of my rank and condition, have gamekeepers to protect our game, not merely to shoot poachers." It was a distinction too nice for Blanche.

"And weavers too, grandma?—the keepers shoot weavers. Did I ever see one, Martin? Is it a bird or a beast?"

"The child is an absolute fool," exclaimed the vexed lady, fearful that even the rich blood of the Delameres had not quickened the plebeian puddle of the Yateses. "A weaver is a sort of a man, certainly—a low kind of man—one of the lower orders, and wild enough probably."

Blanche was wrapt in musing. There were other "chimeras dire," of which she had heard in the nursery, besides poachers and weavers, and of which there were no pictures in her little books of natural history.

"And Swing?" she said at length. "But I fancy he is a fiery-dragon, or perhaps a giant."

"To fly away with naughty little ladies," said the simpering nurse, who had probably used the dreaded name, to subdue her charge to the wholesome terrors of the nursery.

"My heavens! what shocking ignorance and perverted knowledge!" cried the alarmed noble grandmother. "Where can the child have heard of all those disagreeable and horrid things? This must be looked into. She is almost nine years, and can read, and has been carefully taught her prayers and catechism."

"Oh, yes!" exclaimed the girl, eagerly; "and I have a soul:—have the lower orders souls, grandma? Your Religion takes care of your Ladyship's soul, Martin says. Does any one take care of the poachers' souls?"

"Truly, child, you get too deep for me, and not a little impertinent," said the Countess, haughtily, while her secret thought was, Here is the blood of the puritan fellow. The command was given—"Take the Lady Blanche to her nursery, Mrs Martin."

"If madam my grandma don't tell me, I don't care," cried the angry and excited child. "Plenty of people will tell me. Aint I a girl of quality and fortune, Martin?"

"To be sure you are, Lady Blanche," replied the nurse, in a caressing tone; yet as if afraid that stair-walls might have ears. "Though a very young lady, you will be mistress of all, and a generous one too: but my Lady, though a dead old lady, may hold out a long while yet. But here is the Doctor: now, do behave handsome, Lady Blanche, and credit your nurse." Blanche, always glad to meet her grandmother's smiling, bland, and comely Religion, and doubly so now to learn that his pocket contained something to be exhibited at dessert, forgot Swing and weavers, and all sorts of fearful and nondescript English animals; and, with unusual patience, suffered herself to be equipped for her daily walk in the park, attended by Martin and her own footman, Master Harry. The gates, the impassable gates, were at all times the point of attraction for the walkers; and this evening, "my Lady" being secured at table for at least two hours, the gate next the village was the favourite rendezvous, for there news might be obtained of the desperate skirmish of the former night, between the poachers and the game-keepers. Several men were believed to be wounded and severe wounds had been inflicted on the keepers; but only one delinquent had been left in the hands of the enemy—the unfortunate Waterton. The pale face of this man's wife, who sat on a curb stone without the gate, a child in her arms and two at her knees, was the first object that met the walking party who slowly approached. She sprang up and forward—a gleam of sad pleasure shooting, for an instant, across her meagre features.

"Oh, Mrs Martin, how happy am I to have met with you! The cruel gate-keeper will not admit me, though I hoped, if I could see you, you would speak to the house-keeper, to plead with my Lady for my poor Tom."

"Soh! indeed, admit you, Mrs Waterton! It is more than his place is worth, or mine either, to admit any such, or yet to speak of so ungrateful a law-breaker, to the best and kindest of ladies, who does so much for the poor every Christmas. Hares and pheasants, forsooth! Why, it is not often we have anything better than partridges, or barn-door fowls, at the second table. Good bread and cheese, or bacon and suet dumpling, were likelier food for your family, good woman." And the ignorant and "pampered menial," though not an ill-natured woman, tossed her head in scorn.

"Had I that same, or far worse for them?" returned the mournful woman. "Alas, alas! it is little the likes of you know of us, or what we have, or what we want. Yet, would that he who is lying in Stoke-Delamere jail, a maimed and bleeding object, had left us to beg or starve, rather than have brought this ruin and misery on himself and us!" The poor mother struggled with her tears, and the children wept aloud.

"To offend my Lady, who is so kind, and so particular about the game!" continued the nurse, severely.

"And break the laws," said the footman.

"And destroy the park wall," growled the gate-keeper.

"Alack, alack! what know I of your laws, but that they press hard on poor folks?" sighed the woman; "but if you, dear Mrs Martin, who have so much to say with my Lady and the housekeeper, would but speak a good word for that poor fellow. 'Tis his very first offence, and we were starving; and he is come of the good old stock of the Watertons, who have for two hundred years, they tell me, been under her Ladyship; and, were he only to get out, we would go to the Potteries or Factories, or anywhere, and never more trouble my Lady's game, or any living thing it was her pleasure to favour, were it but a stoat or a weasel."

"Mine daddy! mine daddy!" sobbed a child, like a chorus, to his mother's petition.

"Don't weep, little boy," cried the Lady Blanche, thrusting her caressing hands through the bars of the gate—"I had a father once, too, but he died. When I am a big lady, I will not allow the keepers to shoot your father; for I know now a poacher is not like a partridge or a pheasant. A poacher is a man, and has a soul."

Don't cry, ma'am, pray. Tell me what to say to Madam the great Countess. I am the little Countess myself, and yonder is Hassan, my Arab friend." She clapped her hands, and her family iar was by her side. She addressed him in their native speech, with lively emotion, frequently pointing to the woman and the children. His eyes flashed fire, and his gestures, as he threw his clasped hands over his head, were passionate and violent. "I have told Hassan, my friend, that poachers are men," said the animated little lady, "whom the Christian keepers shoot in England if they take a bird to the tent for the children's supper. He says Allah will be very angry with them; for they are wicked men, and Madam my grandmamma a bad old woman, for making her people shoot your baby's father for taking a few flying birds."

"Fie, fie, my Lady!—how you do talk!" said the nurse-maid, dragging away the child.

"I will talk," replied Blanche, resisting firmly. "Tell me what to pray for you, ma'am, and Hassan will do it too; and I shall make grandmamma's Religion do it for the children."

"Her Religion! Dear child! dear, kind-hearted, lovely child!" returned the poor woman; "for, lady-born though ye be, you have your mother's heart in your bosom. Say to my Lady, that a whole poor family—five miserable creatures, though still her fellow-creatures—cry for mercy to him who has offended her only from too tender love for us.—Oh, Mrs Martin, you can better tell my sad story to this dear, good child."

"A pretty story indeed!—Arn't you ashamed of yourself, to keep up such a confab with low villagers, Lady Blanche, and saying such things of my Lady, your own grandmamma, and dragging Mister Harry and myself after you to the gates, which is more than our places are worth?"

"Woman, that's a lie!" returned the imperious little Countess, whose sincerity and frank-dealing were much more unimpeachable than her choice of words; "but I won't tell—I am cunning—Hassan says I must be cunning among you Christian dogs." The footman and house-maid exchanged meaning looks. "Is not money good for something to you Christians?" continued Blanche, addressing her maid.

"Surely, my Lady," returned the nursemaid, forcing a smile, "good for everything in the whole world."

"And I have a great deal of money, ma'am," rejoined Blanche, addressing the poacher's wife—"a great mint of money, which my plebeian cousin, Mr Jerry Yates, will give me when I marry. I heard so yesterday from Betty Thompson, in the laundry; and I will be sure to give you and the children plenty; but, if you know where my vulgar cousin lives, you may go to him, and say it will be best to give you some now. Please tell him the Lady Blanche, the Little Countess, orders him to give you some of the money he has to give her when she marries."

The whole group smiled at the mimic dignity with which the Little Countess issued her commands, interpreting them, at the same time, to Hassan. The Arab better knew the Christian world ; and the scene closed by the nurse being ordered to surrender to the poacher's wife the one bright sovereign which she kept for the Lady Blanche, to give to the church collection on some approaching holiday. The attempt to kiss the baby, at parting, through the bars of the gate, fairly upset the nurse, following so soon on the compulsory levy.

"Marry, come up! kiss and fondle such like chits! I should not wonder if they gave her the itch! Fellow-creatures, indeed! to the Countess of Delamere, a Peeress in her own right! In good sooth, there is something in gentle blood, and in churl's blood, too, Master Harry; and it tells in an instance that shall be nameless"—and her eyes dropped on Blanche.

"You mean me!" cried the quick child, her eyes flashing. "You mean my mother's blood. I have heard the Great Countess talk of that ere now to her Religion, when she fancied I did not understand; but I did. I am cunning since I was a Christian. I said not a word; but from you I won't bear it. Hassan says my own mother was never a great Countess, and my own friends in Syria that she is an angel in heaven; though, when I went to Madam my grandmamma's, I must not speak of her. I think of her though, and say my prayers to her. I am not a fool, and I hate all the cruel Christians. I love only Hassan, my father's friend."

"Goodness gracious! Lady Blanche! my Lady!" screamed the alarmed nurse. "Did I mean? could I mean?—Mr Harry, could I mean anything so disrespectful as my Lady Blanche fancies?"

"Do not lie to me more," said the indignant child, taking the hand of her Arab friend, and walking on.

"Here is a kettle of fish! Was ever such a little vixen? But I don't know whether to tell the housekeeper or not. Yes, I daresay it will be wisest to sing dumb—a close mouth catches no flies."

Mr Harry's judgment sanctioned the prudent resolution:—"Better keep all from the ears of the old un."

It was with lively joy that the Lady Blanche embraced "grandmamma's Religion," when admitted to the dessert. He had heard of her diverting mistake about the poacher, and began to joke with her; but Blanche became very grave, and spoke low and earnestly—"Hassan says, 'tis wicked to shoot men so—Allah will be angry with Madam my grandmamma, when the poor woman weeps, and the little babes cry to Him, because their father was put in the prison for seeking their food."

"Hush, my dear!" whispered the peace-making Doctor; and he diverted the discourse; and Blanche had a hundred questions to ask him, all treasured up against the time he should arrive—doubts of her own and Hassan's, and mostly turning on the lower orders, to which class her mother had belonged, and on people of mean blood, and the poor. Blanche owned that she was persuaded they had souls; for, only yesterday, she had heard the groom, who was breaking the colt, say to the old deaf man, who brought sand to the maids in his donkey-cart, "Damn your old soul! get out of the way!" and give him a sharp cut with his whip. Dr Hayley smiled at the soundness of her logic.

"Is that groom a Christian?" inquired Blanche.

"That act and speech did not shew him to be such at all events," was the reply,

"Is the Bible all true?" was the next grave query. Luckily the old Countess was nodding in her easy chair.

"All true and all good," was the solemn reply.

"Then, I fancy, the Christians do not believe it, nor care for it; and are like the great Countess, my grandmamma, and my vulgar cousin, Mr Jerry Yates."

"Hush, hush! Well, but how do you think so?"

"Oh, I have been reading the Bible so much since you were here, and making the old laundress read it for me; and I don't think it will ever make me a Christian like grandmamma. It is so much the other way."

"The other way," was a peculiar and significant phrase with Lady Blanche, in her still limited vocabulary; but Dr Hayley had an understanding of what she meant; and, as the Countess shewed symptoms of wakening, he produced the pretty little volumes of coloured plates of animals, which he had brought for her. The Lady Blanche did not now weep over dates, and kiss the flowers which resembled those of Syria; yet it was with lively joy she recognised the gazelle and the dromedary. At the camel, she paused some seconds, and then addressed the learned Doctor.

"Madam my grandmamma is rich—is she not, sir?"

"Certainly, my dear—who properly can be called rich, as well as illustrious and honourable, if not my noble patroness the Countess of Delamere?"

"Grandmamma, you have no camels in your park—there are plenty of them at home in Syria:—and they are so large—so huge—bigger than two bullocks."

"I have seen camels, child," said the Countess, peevishly.

"Then, madam, do you know how hard it will be for you to get to Heaven?"

"Doctor, is this child merely impertinent, or a fool?" The question was difficult to answer.

"The Bible says—I can shew it you, myself—'It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven.' But Hassan don't think the Christians believe one word about that Heaven of theirs. But, were I you, and so old a lady, I should give away all my money, grandmamma, that I might get to that happy place, where my own mother is an angel, for she was poor and good."

"Good God! How that strange child talks!"

exclaimed the excited lady. "One might fancy the puritan, her grandfather, spoke through her lips; my nerves—my harassed spirits—cannot stand such shocks—take her away instantly." A worse shock awaited the noble lady. The alarm bell of the abbey suddenly broke on the stern silence which ever brooded over the domain. The report of fire-arms was heard.

"'Tis the Radicals, my Lady!" exclaimed "my Lady's woman," entering, and becoming hysterical.

"'Tis the poachers!" cried the housekeeper, who followed in haste.

"'Tis Swing himself!" announced the butler. "What, Doctor, shall be done? The left wing is on fire—we must save the papers, the paintings, and plate: I have sent for a party of dragoons."

The house-keeper fainted—the waiting-maid screamed—the Arab rushed in, and snatched away the Lady Blanche.

Remarks on the Evils affecting the Highlands and Islands. By Allan Fullarton and Charles Baird, Members of the Statistical Society of Glasgow.

THIS pamphlet is not only creditable to the general intelligence and talents for business details of the authors, but to their patriotism and philanthropy. We are the more disposed to call attention to it, as there is nothing in these statements, concerning the Highlands and the Hebrides, with their comparatively few inhabitants, which does not apply exactly to more than one-half of the Irish people. The Irish have a better soil and milder climate; but in almost every other respect their condition is the same. Language, character and manners, dwellings, food, occupations, and tenure of holding land, are quite alike. The chief difference is, that the Highlanders are rather more decently, if not more comfortably, clothed; and are, though suffering equal hardships, less turbulent. But then they have no tithes to pay, nor direct taxes of any kind, from all which their extreme poverty exempts them. The authors, after a general view of the condition of the people, make a number of special remarks on particular districts and parishes, both of the islands and mainland. These remarks contain much minute statistical information. It is a remarkable fact that where emigration was earliest introduced, and has been most continuous, population has run a race with and beat it. The population of Uist, Barra, Lewis, and Harris has been doubled within the last forty years, notwithstanding the constant drain of emigration and of the late war.

A singular circumstance regarding population is noticed. In a place on the west coast, of which the name is not given, there were, in 1790, 1900 inhabitants. Of these 500 emigrated; yet ten years afterwards the numbers were 1967, although no stranger had settled in the place, and 600 men had in the interval been supplied to the army and navy.

Every parish has a clergyman; and for the excellent reason, that in every one there are funds for the comfortable maintenance of one. These clergymen are often extensive farmers and graziers, lease-holders of course from the absentee lairds; and education, even with all the appliances of the Lowland Society, and the funds contributed, is in a wretched state. To hear of an island clergyman having a stipend of £200 or £300, together with his manse and glebe, and being also an extensive farmer, while there is neither school nor schoolmaster equal to the wants of a fourth of his parish, is disgusting. In Lewis and Harris there are seven parish clergymen, a population of about 21,000, and 1350 scholars in all attending schools, supported in all probability by contributions from the south. The island of Barra, where there is of course a parish minister comfortably supported, contains 2200 inhabitants, of whom only 200 can read and there is not one effective school on the island. If the General Assembly have not influence to establish a more Christian order of things in these outskirts of its dominions, and, if need be, to take something from the Church to maintain the School, it should strive to obtain the necessary power. The minister of one of the Uists grazes seventy milk cows with their followers, until, becoming three-year olds, they can be turned to good account at Doune Fair or Falkirk Tryst. Now, we should have no objection to such clerical farmers following the bent of their genius, in rearing cattle instead of Christians; but we would insist that they paid for having their duty being performed to the children of their parish, by more efficient and congenially-minded individuals. Parson Trulliber was nothing in the scale of his pig-fattening to these Hebridian clergy.

The population of Skye is about 24,500. There are eight resident clergymen, and 1296 children at school; nearly one half of the population cannot read at all; and we should imagine two-thirds of the other half very imperfectly. In some of the smaller islands, it is yet worse. Out of 1000 persons in Eigg above six years of age, 600 could not read. Yet the natives of the Hebrides are remarkable for their anxiety to be taught, and their docility. They are aware of the immense advantage of the slenderest education when they emigrate, or go south in search of employment—which many of both sexes annually do—as house-servants and labourers, post-boys, waiters, and the other vocations generally filled by Highlanders.

Among the evils affecting the Highlands and islands, (in common with Ireland,) are—absenteeism; over-population, in relation to the present means of subsistence; the want of education; the want of poor-laws; the want of capital; and, above all, the want of employment. How these evils are fostered and aggravated by the law of primogeniture, by entails, and their sure consequences—ruinous extravagance, and estates mortgaged and under trust—we leave to the readers of this intelligent pamphlet. The evils clearly stated naturally suggest the remedies.

A number of statistical tables are appended to the Remarks. Among these are the funds for the poor, which, in several parishes, do not exist, and, in others, are next to nothing. In Harris, the funds are £3, for a population of 4000; and every Highland population is very poor. In South Uist, for a population of 7200, there seems nothing. Nothing in Canna, Eigg, Muck, and Rum. Tyree, with a population of 3200, nothing. Applecross, with 3090 of a population, nothing. The paupers of Gairloch and Polewe, get 2s. 6d. each a year, and the other parishes are much in the same condition. From what is said in this pamphlet, we are led to imagine, that the general poor-law of Scotland does not extend to the Highlands and Islands. Legally, it must; actually, it does not. Of the 200 schools, scattered over those wastes and wilds, a large proportion are maintained by the funds raised by the General Assembly, and by voluntary societies and charitable persons, having no local or personal connexion with the Highlands. It is said, with entire justice, that, were the assistance drawn from foreign sources to cease, there is nothing more probable, than that the population would relapse into the utter barbarism by which they were formerly characterised; as, from their extreme poverty, they are unable to help themselves—and what can their poor landlords do for them, save squeeze through their factors as much rent out of them as possible, and in years of dearth leave them to the charity of the Lowlands?

We would earnestly recommend this pamphlet to every humane individual who, in giving his mite to the relief of the Highlanders, ought to turn his thoughts to that permanent improvement of their condition which the pittance wrung from compassion, however needful its bestowal, will not effect. Such persons may be encouraged in their investigation, by the assurance, that the very same remedies which are applicable to the Highlands, are equally applicable to Ireland.

Travels in Town. By the author of "Random Recollections," &c. &c.

Though there is a good deal of what, to provincials, will be curious information in these volumes, we would offer the author the friendly counsel of now lying fallow for a year or two, before he attempt to raise another crop of London notabilities. The present two volumes might have been in one, which would amply have held all that they contain which is not sheer make-bulk. The best chapters of the work are "The Post Office," "Magazine Day," "The Newsmen," and an account of the various religious sects of London; which last is, however, far too diffuse. It is stated that not one Scotchman in twenty-four, of those settled in London, attends any church; but what is more surprising, with all the Irish in London, there are only 26,000 Roman Catholics attending in all the chapels—not a very alarming number of active Papists, one would think, in the great Metropolis; yet the author is in great alarm at the spread of Popery. The number of Quakers is exceedingly small—eleven chapels, with congregations of about 150 each; nor are the Unitarians numerous. Six or seven hundred attend Mr Fox's Lectures. The aggregate number in all the chapels is estimated at 2,500, though of the body there may be 3,000. There is one new society, in which either the preacher (a Scotchman, named Aitkens) or his doctrines, are at present so popular, that his large chapel is constantly crowded; and, while 2,500 get in, double that number are excluded. Mr Aitkens appears to be a highly-stimulating preacher. One evening that the author attended, the following scene took place:—

For some time, his remarks appeared judicious enough; but, when he got to the middle of his sermon, he used expressions which might well make one shudder to think of. He said that, if the unconverted persons who were present did not come to Christ and be saved that very night—he having made so full and free an offer of the Saviour to them—he thought "that they deserved to be damned!" Shortly afterwards, he remarked that, if the unconverted sinners who were present did not come and be saved that night, then he would "bid them farewell: he did not wish ever to see their faces in that chapel any more; he did not wish ever to see them again, until he met them at the judgment-seat." Continuing the same strain of address, he added—"If you refuse to come and be saved this night, then I could almost wish that you were damned now." Here the preacher paused for some seconds, hurried his face in his handkerchief, and appeared as if weeping. Then, as if his breast were labouring under the most violent emotion, he remarked—"Perhaps some of you think I do not know what I am saying when making use of such expressions. I do know what I am saying; for, if you refuse to be saved to-night, you will only so awfully add to your guilt that it were better you perished now."

Towards the conclusion of his sermon, he implored, seemingly as if weeping, every person present who felt that he was not in a saved state to go into the vestry and pray for mercy—addressing them as if their eternal ruin would be the inevitable consequence of not complying with his invitations. Eventually, he sat down, completely exhausted by the excessive—indeed, almost superhuman exertions he had made, both by voice and gesture; and, on resuming his seat, he continued, for a few seconds, to address the audience in a sitting posture. About a minute or so after he had fairly concluded, he rose up again, with great quickness, and said—"I see many persons, in the gallery, leaving the chapel altogether, instead of going into the vestry, although, but a few minutes before, their eyes were wet with tears, under the sermon. It is," he added, with great emphasis, and looking to the parties—"it is a sure proof you'll be damned!" He then stood, for a few moments, without saying anything; when, all of a sudden, he pointed to a particular seat under the gallery, and said, with much emphasis of manner, to a female standing in the passage—"Sister Mayhew, I know there are two persons in that pew who are not saved—look after them." By this time, the passages were full of persons going to the vestry, but who were obstructed by the crowds that stood at the vestry door. Observing this, Mr Aitkens said to the obstructing parties—"Clear the way there, and allow the penitents to pass!" He then descended from the pulpit, and went about from pew to pew, imploring those whose curiosity prompted them to remain after the service to go into the vestry and "be saved." The great body of the people had by this time left the chapel: perhaps the number of persons who went into the vestry was from 150 to 200. [They were chiefly females.] And what shall I say of the scene which was there exhibited? It was a shocking sight. Scores of persons were to be seen on their knees in different parts of the vestry. Some calling out "Mercy! mercy!" only; some offering up longer prayers; others making use of language which was altogether unintelligible; but all, except the elders and teachers, either praying, in many instances, screaming as loud as they could, or heaving such deep groans as that they might have been heard a great distance. Then there was the excited state of their manner and appearance. The violence of some was so great that one could have fancied they were in hysterics. The scene of confusion, whether as regards the physical motions of the parties or the discordancy of the words, and phrases, and sounds they uttered, was such as I could not—and I am sure no one else could—have ever had any idea of before. And what struck me as remarkable was the matter-of-course like way in which the individuals who took upon themselves the task of comforting the parties, viewed the whole thing. They seemed to think nothing of it; but, with the greatest coolness and composure, went about giving counsel to the various "penitents;" for that is the term by which Mr Aitkens always calls them. I was much surprised to witness the singular suddenness of the transition which took place, in many cases, from a state of the most awful seeming alarm about the condition of the parties' souls, to the most perfect quiet and composure. One minute you saw a particular person displaying the most frightful gesticulations, and literally shrieking while praying for mercy; in another minute, the party rose from his or her knees and sat down on a form, or, it might be, walked through the vestry room, as tranquil, and seemingly as much at ease, as if nothing had happened. In several instances, while dozens were on their knees, all praying aloud at the same time, I saw others talking to one another—their countenances occasionally exhibiting a smile, and their whole appearance and manner shewing that they were accustomed to such scenes, and looked upon them as a necessary conclusion to the services of the evening. I was struck with the almost careless tone in which some of the office-bearers spoke to one another about particular penitents.

We can give no more of it. Mrs Trollope has nothing to surpass this, in the worst of her American camp-meetings. Let us sweeten the reader's imagination with a very different exhibition.

MAGAZINE DAY.

The most remarkable feature in modern book-selling, is the trade in periodical literature. "Magazine Day" is a sort of monthly era in the history of a London bookseller. The orders for the forthcoming numbers of the various periodicals which he is in the habit of receiving for some days previously, keep it constantly in his mind's eye; and when it does arrive, the great contest among the trade is, who shall be able to supply their customers earliest. Magazine Day can only be said fairly to commence about half-past nine o'clock, and before twelve you will see the various periodicals in the windows of every retail bookseller throughout the length and breadth of the metropolis. Perhaps in no other instance, that of newspapers alone excepted, is an article so rapidly circulated over town, as is periodical literature on that day. The point from which the Magazines and other periodicals all start, when their distribution is about to take place, is, as in the case of larger works, Paternoster Row; which, with that fondness for brevity of expression, so characteristic of the people of London, is invariably called "the Row."

The actual publishers of periodicals have, properly speaking, nothing to do with the sale of their respective works on Magazine Day, and they seldom have even any idea of the actual number sold of their own publications on that day.

The quantity of business which some of the larger houses go through on Magazine Day, is immense. I know one house which draws, on an average, from £1200 to £1500. Only fancy the number of periodicals, varying from twopenny to three shillings and sixpence, which must be turned over from the shelves of this establishment to the hands of the purchasers, before such a sum of money could be taken!

The constant bustle kept up from morning till night, in these wholesale houses, exceeds anything of which a person who has not witnessed it, could form any conception. The premises are full of young men and boys, all struggling for a priority of "supply." I have often seen as many as fifty or sixty, wedged into a shop of the ordinary size.

To a person unacquainted with such matters, who chanced to spend a few minutes in a large house in the Row on Magazine Day, all that he heard would be quite unintelligible. The individuals ordering periodicals scarcely ever call the periodicals they wish to procure by their proper names. The love of brevity, to which I have already referred, is observable in every word they utter. The "Gentleman's Magazine" never gets any other name than the "Gent." "Tait's Magazine" is simply "Tait." The "New Monthly Magazine" is the "New Month." The "Metropolitan Magazine" is abbreviated to the first three letters, with the addition of an s. The "Encyclopædia Britannica" is the "Ency. Brit." The "Court Magazine" is the "Courts." The "Lady's Magazine and Museum" is reduced to the disyllable of "Ladies;" so that it is quite common to hear one personing out in one breath, "two Gents," "six Tait's," "four Blackwoods."

I have said that Magazine Day is a sort of era in the history of the bibliopolic trade; so it is also in that of another class of persons: I mean authors of books and contributors to periodicals. Every Magazine Day, by ten o'clock, authors are attracted to the Row from all parts of the metropolis, to see what is said of their productions in the literary notices; while contributors, or rather would-be contributors, are drawn to the same locality, to see whether their articles are inserted, or whether they can read their fate in the notices to correspondents. Neither authors who expect their books to be reviewed, nor candidates for admission into magazines, have resolution to wait till the periodicals are regularly published. Their anxiety to ascertain their doom is, in such cases, so intense, that they will rather walk from the most distant parts of London to the Row—the magazines being there first seen—than wait for two or three hours till brought to them. When the result is agreeable, they do not regret their early rising, or the distance they have walked; when it is otherwise, they reproach themselves with their folly, in having tormented themselves before the time.

Magazine Day is not confined to the metropolitan circulation of periodical literature. On that day, works of this class are collected for all parts of the country, and sent off in packages by the earliest conveyance. Since the late establishment of steam communication between London and almost every part of any importance in the kingdom, the periodicals which first see the light in the Row, on Magazine Day, are in the hands of readers, in the remotest parts of the country, in less than a week. The quantity of literature thus sent off, in monthly parcels, to the country is immense, and has been vastly increased since the introduction of cheap publications into the bibliopolic market.

Ancient Scottish Melodies; from a M.S. of the Reign of James VI.; with an Introductory Inquiry, Illustrative of the History of the Music of Scotland, by William Dauney, Esq. 4to. Edinburgh.

For this very interesting work, we are indebted to the Bannatyne and Maitland Clubs; two literary societies, whose prime object has been the publishing of works relating to the history and antiquities of Scotland, the limited demand for which would throw them beyond the pale of bookselling speculation. In this instance, as in many others, the patronage of these Clubs has been most laudably bestowed.

The most valuable portion of the volume, although not constituting a tenth of its bulk, and that to which all the other portions are subsidiary, is the collection of Scottish tunes, from the Skene M.S., as it is called. From external evidence, Mr Dauney is satisfied that this M.S. collection of music was made by Mr John Skene, of the family of Skene of Hallyards, somewhere between the years 1600 and 1620. The airs are adapted for the Mandolin, a species of lute; and are written on a stave of four lines, in an antique notation, perfectly different from that now in use; certain letters of the alphabet indicating the position of the note or half note, on the string; the particular string being distinguished by the space, (Mr Dauney says the line, inaccurately, we think, judging from the facsimile he has given of the M.S.;) and the duration of the note being marked by a common musical character above the stave. Eighty-five tunes are given, with their names, from the M.S. Several of these are favourite old Scottish airs; not previously known, however, to be so old as they are now proved to be, by a hundred years. Among these are—"John Anderson my Jo;" "Good Night and Joy [the M.S. has God] be with you;" "Sa mirrie as we [twa] hae been;" "The last time I cam owre the Muir" (M.S., "Alace! that I came over the Moor, and left," &c.); "Bonny Dundee" (M.S., "Adew, Dundee!") Several well-known tunes appear under different names from those by which they are now known : as, "Jo Janet" (Long or onie old man;) "Wae's my Heart that we should sunder" ("Alee! this Night, that we said sinder;") "Banks of Devon" ("Let never Crueltiedishenour Bewtie," in the major key, possibly an error of the M.S. or of the interpreter;) "Johnny Faa" ("Ladie Cassilles Lift; "Bab at the Bowster" ("Who learned yow to Dance and a Towdle?") "Steer her up and hand her Gain" (Scandastis;) "We be Three Poor Mariners," an English glee ("Brangill of Poictu.") Also several airs that are evidently the prototypes of known tunes—as "Peggie is over the Sie wi' the Souldier" (the original of "Hey, Jenny, come down to Jock;") "I Love my Love for Love again" ("Jenny Nettles;") "John Anderson my Jo" (original of the modern tune, and of "When she cam ben she bobbit;") "Prettie well began, Man" ("The Lee Rig," real set;) "Jennet drinks no Water" (the tune of that name, and "I'll mak you be fain;") "My Mistres Blush is bonie" ("The Braes o' Killiecrankie;") "Bonie Jean maks meikill of me" ("Somebody," old set;) "I serve a worthie Ladie" ("Dumbarton's Drums;") "Marie Me, Marie Me, quoth the Bonie Lass!" ("Saw ye nae my Faither?") "Shepherd, saw ye not?" ("Buy Brume Besoms;") "The Fourth Mesur of the Buffins, a fragment," ("Will ye go to Sherrie Muir?") To these we may add, "The Flowres of the Forest;" for the air given in the Skene M.S. under that title, although evidently the original of the common air of the same name, differs from it as much as the old tunes we have just mentioned do from those of which we have stated them to be the prototypes.

Besides these airs, and a considerable number of trashy pieces, which have none of the characteristics of the ancient Scottish music, this publication contains a number of tunes which carry the Scottish stamp broadly impressed on their front, and possess merit sufficient to give them a chance of popularity after their long slumber of two centuries. Among these are—"To Dance about the Bailieys Dubb;" "Kilt thy Coat, Maggie;" "My Love she winns not her away;" "I mett her in the Medowe;" "Alee, I lie my slon; I'm lik to die awld;" "Doun in yon banke;" "Omnia Vincit Amor;" and "Scullione." To these from the Skene M.S. may be added, "Honest Luckie," and "Jocky Drucken Babbie," given by Mr Dauneay from a M.S., of date 1692, belonging to Mr Blaikie of Paisley. Both of these tunes are strikingly Scottish in every feature; and so excellent in their way, that it seems strange that they should have been preserved only by the accident of their being found in an obscure old M.S., which not half a dozen musical people in the three kingdoms could decipher.

The contents of the Skene M.S. being such as we have described, its publication must be welcomed as a most precious revelation of what formed the delight of our ancestors.

In his preliminary Essay, Mr Dauneay has, with great industry, collected all the scattered allusions to Scottish songs which are to be found in the works of our ancient poets and historians; but beyond the mere names of a number of tunes, or rather of the songs to which they were united, nothing is known of the popular music of Scotland farther back than the date of the Skene M.S. The subject of the musical instruments used in Scotland, in ancient times, has been amply discussed by Mr Dauneay, and he has brought much learning to bear on it. Mr Phalay Durn, an accomplished musical professor of Edinburgh, has contributed an able Analysis of the Scottish music. He has noted its peculiarities with accuracy and clearness; but we can neither admit his theory of the connection between the Scottish tunes and the ancient canto fermo, or music of the church; nor accept his explanation of the difference between the style of Scottish music and that of modern composition. He ascribes to the Scottish music what he calls the ancient tonality; as if there were some mode other than the major and minor, and the Scottish music belonged to that ancient and now discontinued mode. There are few of the phrases of our national tunes that have not occasionally been used by musical composers; and those that have not been so used, might have been, had composers not chosen to abridge their natural liberty by rules which they ought to have known admitted an occasional exception which would produce an effect grateful to the ear. But a rigid observance of rule has long been on the decline. Musical liberty is in the ascendant, as well as civil and religious.

Great care has evidently been bestowed upon the translation of the tunes from the antiquated notation in the Skene M.S. into the modern. Many errors in the M.S. have been corrected. We observe a few which escaped Mr Dauneay; and, if we are not greatly mistaken, he has not always rightly interpreted the note forming the seventh of the scale. One of the most common peculiarities of Scottish music is the frequent use of the flat seventh, as a tonic, or fundamental note in the harmony. In the major key, these flat sevenths require an accidental natural or flat, not indicated by the stave. The sevenths, in several tunes, we believe, should have been so marked, where Mr Dauneay has omitted to do so; for instance, Nos. 10, 58, and 71. But the volume, on the whole, is highly creditable to the Editor, and deserves a place in the library of every person to whom the ancient music of the ancient history of Scotland presents a subject of interest.

Mr Dauneay has the natural prejudice of an editor and an antiquary, in favour of the ancient versions of the Scottish tunes, and even the ancient names. To us, "Bonny Dundee" is as acceptable a title as "Adew, Dundee;" and our national airs we maintain to have been purified and enriched, rather than corrupted, by the liberties taken with them by the generations whose solace they have been. Differing, however, from many of Mr Dauneay's musical criticisms, we admire the learning, taste, and sagacity displayed in his elaborate Preliminary Dissertation.—T.

A shrewd, sensible, knowing, and thoroughly selfish, though most respectable fellow, is the poor gentleman, who here favours his brethren with the lessons of his twenty years' experience in London. It is said that there is a large class of persons in Paris—poor gentlemen, poor men of pleasure—who make that capital their residence solely because they can there command the greatest quantity and variety of sensual enjoyments for their money, with the cheap addition of what are named pleasures—such as theatres, picture galleries, public promenades, gardens, and sights of all kinds. But, for solid enjoyments no enjoyment is considered by true-born Englishmen

* The airs from the Skene M.S. are declared to be copyright (page 216.) But they can be copyright no farther than they are original; i. e., varied from the M.S. So far as they are faithfully given, they cannot be copyright, until a copyright act be made to go back for 280 years, and the legal representatives of the authors of the tunes appear and claim a property in them.

London, properly known, infinitely surpasses Paris, even with a very small income. In what restaurant could a dinner (so an Englishman) be procured for a livre and a half, like that which the poor gentleman obtains here for 1s. 3d.?

The poor gentleman has a clear £100 a-year, and prefers living on his income to being employed in trade or business of any kind, save peddling a little in the penny-a-line way, to gain a few additional guineas for his pleasures. He is a bachelor, a lodger, and a breakfaster and diner at the coffee-shops and eating-houses. He never lends, he never borrows; he never gets into debt; he pays ready money; he makes good bargains; he has no friend, no confidant, no home, no hope; and, were he to fall into the river, or be Burked in going to his lodgings, no one would miss him, save his landlady, to whom he pays 8s. a-week for her rooms. His place at the coffee-shop and eating-house would speedily be filled up by some other customer. The loungers in the Parks, the bazaars, auctions, British Museum, National Gallery, &c., where he found his gratis amusements, would never miss his presence; and his seat in the various churches and chapels, where he finds an open door every morning and evening of the week, would be occupied by some other poor gentleman, or gentlewoman, who thinks the Gospel should be freely given.

But, if any small annuitant should make up his mind to the idle, "loveless, joyless, unendearing" life of the poor gentleman, and fix upon London as his headquarters, very good counsel and directions are given him, by an "old-used hand," how to get the most for his money. Lodgings are the first consideration; and these the poor gentleman may have as comfortable as at the West End, and much cheaper, by keeping to such localities as the Edgeware Road, City Road, Clapham, Brixton, &c.; and, as he has no particular business, a walk of a few miles will do him good, and kill an hour or two of those of which he has plenty to spare.

The necessity of going abroad to breakfast, soul day or fair day, seems severe to family-men; but then, for frugency, the poor gentleman may have a buttered roll and a cup of coffee, and plenty of newspapers, up stairs; or for threepence-halfpenny below; and one penny to the female waiter gives her full contentment with the gentleman customer. It will, however, be best to give part of his tables, which contain so important an error in arithmetic that many will doubt of the soundness of his economical knowledge, which, however, seems unimpeachable. His one dress-coat a-year, lasts the year out, and costs four guineas—last year's coat serves him for ordinary occasions; two pairs of trousers, three guineas; and one waistcoat, fifteen shillings; making, in all, £8 : 2s.; and, as £12 are to clothe the poor gentleman, £3 : 18s. remain for hats, boots, shoes, and gloves, and keeping up his dozen cotton shirts with "Irish fronts." His lodgings cost 8s., and two more to the maid-servant and for cleaning shoes, or £26 per annum. His dinners, averaging at 1s. 3d. a-day, afford a plate of the best meat, roast or boiled; pudding or tart, bread and vegetables, with 2d. for porter, and 1d. to the waiter. If he will have wine, he may want the porter and pudding, and have only a 5d. plate of meat, which will allow him occasionally a half-pint of wine. If he long for fish, he must go to the Billingsgate Tavern, and have the best fish-dinner for 1s.; if for soup, he may have it at 6d. a dish, "at the Cock, or any of the chop-shops near the Royal Exchange." The general account stands—

365 dinners, at 1s. 3d. each,	22	16	8
365 teas, at 6d.	9	2	6

There is still a surplus of £20 : 18 : 9 of the £100, applicable to the uses and pleasures of the poor gentleman—which, by an enormous blunder, he states as 15d. a-week—for coals, in the winter, washing, library, an occasional treat, and all the necessities and contingencies not specified in his table; while, in fact, it is but 8s., which makes an important difference. Although we cannot think the self-centred, cautious poor gentleman a model for any man, he gives excellent advice to those who choose to remain as poor, single gentlemen, instead of becoming hard-working, energetic men, and useful members of society; nor are his maxims or his small philosophy to be despised by those for whom he writes. The poor gentleman is directed—

Keep your circumstances to yourself. Never ask an important favour. Always pay ready money. Never claim acquaintance in the street with richer people: let them pass, do not see them, if they do not see you first.

Accept not every invitation, even from your best friends; it is making yourself too cheap.

Spend as little as possible in cabs or omnibusses.

Waste no money in purchasing trifles you do not want, always bearing in mind that £6 per year is only a groat a day.

Close your pockets against pastry-cooks' cakes and soups.

Never accept invitations from other young men to dine at hotels; for, if you do, courtesy requires that you invite in return, which is very expensive.

Never borrow of your rich friends. Pay cash to your tailor, for which he will give a liberal discount, which will bring the first-rate tradesman to a level with the bootmaker.

Never buy clothes of advertising puffing tailors, who always make up inferior materials.

Frequent not taverns and hotels, for they are very expensive; the waiters frequently expect half as much as will pay for a comfortable meal at an eating or coffee-house.

Let us, looking to wealth, take any one gentleman whom you so much envy, for instance, in his cab, or taking a canter at five or so in the Park. Where, in the twenty-four hours, shall we begin? He has, possibly £3000 a-year. The poverty of fashionable families, with a carriage, on £3000, is pitiable. Does this make him pass his time one bit more delightfully from its own weight? Not a jot, I suspect? He is tired of his cab, and heartily annoyed on seeing Booby Botherem with a more splendid turn-out than his; his reins were wrong, and his tiger was not so smart! He got home at seven to dress, tedious again; dines at home; they sit down very formally with some humble invite, as it is not one of their intimate days; how wearisome this formal politeness. He wishes the fellow (his wife's cousin, or some scribbling critic) at the devil: they fly for refuge to the opera; too late for Pasta, Grisi, Malibran, Tamburini; Taglioni still pleases for a moment, spite of the tedium of repetition. The charm has lost its spring from being over-stretched: he yawns; nods across, and is bored by lookers-in, in some way or other: or he goes round himself to say "How d'ye do?" to people he sees every hour! But suppose he passes a pleasing hour in a sly flirtation with a friend's young wife, or some girl, whose eagerness for admiration does not care for his being married, as she hates his wife—perhaps an old flirt: this ends, he put her in her carriage, and drops in at C——'s, St James's Street, where he loses a hundred, and goes home perhaps very philosophically, or swearing all the way; gets up next day at one or two, the weather heavenly; ay, but he knows nothing of the fresh mornings; all is now dusty, noise and bustle—the very thing for a town life. His wife persuades him to go and make a call or two with her; they see some pleasant people, and talk of music possibly, and get into a hot argument on Church Reform. Away he comes, and gives his wife the slip at Howell & James's, for a lounge at the Alfred or U. S. club; takes up the papers; sees himself quizzed, perhaps abused; goes home in a rage, resolves not to notice it; dresses for a large dinner-party without curiosity, interest, or appetite. And thus his days drag on. How are they better than yours? His wealth has done nothing whatever for him. Yes; it has made him thinner and paler; there is nothing new for him.

Certainly the rich poor gentleman is not to be envied.

We have said the poor gentleman is thoroughly selfish, or at best he is like the philosophic jolly miller, who—“lived on the river Dee,

Who cared for nobody, no not one;
So nobody cared for he.”

Only the jolly miller worked and sang all day, and was blithe as a lark.

The poor gentleman exhorts the idle hundred-pounders to be content. Although their incomes were doubled, they could command little more real enjoyment; and even on £300 a-year, they could cut no more figure than on £100. If the possession of £400 tempted them to a horse and groom, they would grow poorer still. And hereupon follows the very essence of the discreet, cautious, selfish, and respectable poor gentleman's philosophy:—

Do you long for two hundred pounds a-year? the pleasure of asking a few friends to a coffee-house dinner now and then; or a better room where you could ask them? and more cash in your pocket for cakes, jellies, and ices? All this would not increase your enjoyments one tittle; nor would I advise you to alter your rigid economy as to “food, fire, and clothes,” if you have two hundred. On three hundred you can make no appearance more than on one. On four hundred, if you kept a horse and groom, you would be still the poorer; and so on. Always, in short, say to yourself, this and that is, after all, a great plague to those who sport them; a servant's a plague, housekeeping's a plague; a carriage is a great plague, and looking after horses; a wife is (I'm afraid) often a plague; children another; many friends often a plague; parties (the greater number) plagues; and the jealous, shifts, envy, of those just above (on another thousand more!) and all the longing and heart-burnings for show in the fashionable world, the ne plus ultra of plagues in this life! compared with which, if you are still not content, wish yourself a Welsh curate on forty pounds a-year!—if this fails of making you comfortable, set yourself down as INCURABLE.”

Rules are given for living comfortably on £50 a-year in London, for prudent, cautious fellows, who dread the plagues of wife, children, and intimate friends, like the Enemy; care for nothing but their own dear selves; and yet are to be esteemed infinitely beyond those who have no enlightened care for anything, and, least of all, for paying their debts.

Price's History of Protestant Nonconformity.

The second volume of Dr Price's important work has appeared at so long an interval after the publication of the first, that we fear it comes forward under disadvantages. These, however, a little time will remove, though the History is cast upon so broad a scale that we regret to find Dr Price is not likely to bring his valuable labours to a conclusion until another long period shall have elapsed. The present volume is, however, complete in itself, as the history of Nonconformity in a most important time. It commences with the accession of Charles I. and ends with the death of Cromwell. The reverend author, like every other foreseeing, impartial historian, anticipates blame on all sides. By the zealots among the Dissenters, he expects to be suspected of lukewarmness and false candour; and from the zealots among Churchmen, or rather from all Churchmen, he may look for the condemnation which this one declaration renders unavoidable. It is, That the farther he has looked into history, the deeper has become his conviction that the alliance at present existing between Church and State is part of the grand apostasy—an unnatural and most pernicious association—which must be terminated before the ultimate triumphs of the Christian faith are achieved. “The essential spirit of Popery,” he says, “has been retained under a Protestant name; and the consequence has been distraction to the State, and formality and worldly-mindedness to the Church. To expect political men to administer ecclesiastical affairs with any other view than the advancement of their secular interests, is to look for grapes from thorns, and figs from thistles.” The author does not wish to be regarded as neutral on this cardinal point. His opinions have been maturely formed. As a specimen of the style of the work, we select the characters of Hampden and Pym:—

JOHN HAMPDEN was a private gentleman, of ancient family, and of large estate, in Buckinghamshire; a man of unblemished virtue; whose reputation speedily became the property of his country, as his spirited defence of its liberties constituted the redeeming feature of the period. He had hitherto been little known beyond his own county, where he was universally respected and beloved; but his fearless and high-minded patriotism now prompted him to oppose the illegal exactions of the crown, by requiring the payment of twenty shillings, in which amount he was assessed for an estate in the parish of Stoke Mandeville. The sum was insignificant, but the principle involved was all-important. A man of less decision and moral courage, would have shrunk from awakening the wrath of a court which knew no mercy; but Hampden united to great equanimity of temper and an entire self-command, a resolution which no threatenings or dangers could appal. . . . The patriotic object of Hampden was completely achieved. He succeeded in arousing his countrymen to a sense of their danger. Having broken up this false security, he well knew what must follow. . . . The death of Hampden was occasioned by a wound received on Chalgrove Field, June 18, (1643). He lingered a few days in extreme suffering, expressing an entire satisfaction in the course he had pursued, and commending his country to the protection of God. “O Lord,” said this dying patriot—“save my bleeding country! Have those realms in thy especial keeping! Confound and level in the dust those who would rob the people of their liberty and lawful prerogative! Let the King see his error, and turn the hearts of his wicked counsellors from the malice and wickedness of their designs! Lord Jesus, receive my soul!” Again recurring to his native land, he prayed—“O Lord, save my country! O Lord, be merciful to”—Here his speech failed him, and, falling back on his bed, he expired. The royalists exulted in his death, as a great deliverance to the nation, while the Parliament were filled with dismay.

Little need be said respecting the character of John Hampden. It is sufficiently apparent throughout his history, and has uniformly commanded the respect and admiration of impartial men. His fearless resistance of the tyranny of Charles, when that tyranny was both powerful and merciless; the calm and dignified tone in which he ruled the early deliberations of the Long Parliament; and the energy and decision with which he sought to bring the struggle to an issue when an appeal to arms was inevitable—all prove him to have been as consummate a statesman as he was an inflexibly upright man. Even Clarendon, while endeavouring to injure his reputation, is compelled to do homage to his transcendent abilities and surpassing prudence of address. “He was indeed,” remarks the party historian, “a very wise man, and of great parts; and possessed with the most absolute spirit of popularity, and the most absolute faculties to govern the people, I ever knew.” To a remarkably equable temper, he united a self-control and clearness of perception, which rendered him an eminently successful parliamentary speaker; while his unspotted integrity, and firm adherence to principle, constituted him the most formidable opponent of the Court. With the eye of a skillful tactician he surveyed the forces arrayed against him; allowed them to expend their strength, to pour forth the vials of their wrath, or to justify themselves behind the precedents of a former age; and then, when their victory was supposed to be won, and tokens of exultation were displayed, the matchless power of Hampden's eloquence was felt. “He had so subtle a way of interrogating, and, under the notion of doubts, insinuating his objections, that he infused his own opinions into those from whom he pretended to learn and receive them. And even with them who were able to preserve themselves from his infusions, and discerned these opinions to be fixed in him with which they could not comply, he always left the character of an ingenious and conscientious person." To his profound sagacity as a statesman, and his skill as a Parliamentary leader, he added an enlightened patriotism, and the sterling virtues of Christianity. On the whole, it may be pronounced with safety, that English history records no purer or brighter example of public virtue and of private excellence, than was exhibited in the character of John Hampden. Consistent from the first, that career was happily terminated before its lustre had been dimmed or its beauty impaired by the mists of human passion; and he now shines forth the idol and the pattern of all succeeding worthies.

PYM.

JOHN PYM, who died in the same year, was cast in a different mould from Hampden. He was more moderate in his ecclesiastical views, and would probably have preferred a reduced episcopacy, such as Usher advocated, to any other form of church government. But the efforts of the Bishops to widen the misunderstanding between the King and his Parliament, and their zeal in aiding the aims of the former, induced him to concur in the abolition of their functions, "which I conceive," he said, "may as well be done as the dissolution of the monasteries, monks, and friars, was in King Henry VIII.'s time." His intimate acquaintance with the forms of parliamentary procedure, combined with unwearied diligence, extensive research, matchless skill in the arrangement of public business, and an unspotted integrity, secured him great influence in the House. His style of oratory was masculine and nervous, and effected its purpose by a straight-forwardness and honesty, rather than by any brilliancy of conception, or loftiness of intellectual range. "He had a very comely and grave way of expressing himself," says Clarendon, "with great volubility of words, natural and proper; and understood the temper and affections of the kingdom as well as any man; and had observed the errors and mistakes in government, and knew well how to make them appear greater than they were."

Extracts might have been found which exhibit the original powers of the author to more advantage; but we select what is best adapted to the popular taste.

Sketches and Essays by Hazlitt.

Mr Hazlitt's son has collected, in a small volume, those essays of his eminent father, scattered through the various periodicals to which he contributed, and which have not before been published in a collected form. The essays are generally short or not long. If they are less brilliant and ambitious than many of Hazlitt's popular works, they bear the stamp of his mind, in all its vigour, sharpness, and elegance, and with less of either his harsh or fantastic peculiarities than is apparent in many of his more elaborated performances. There is one very beautiful paper on Taste, containing the germ of Hazlitt's more matured theory of the Beautiful in arts and literature, and the facility by which it is perceived and enjoyed. There is an acute paper on "Prejudice," teeming with practical wisdom; and another of the same character "On Knowledge of the World;" there is also a delightful sketch, entitled "Merry England;" and some lighter papers. From an admirable essay "On Cant and Hypocrisy," we feel pleasure in copying out a single paragraph.

Though I think there is very little downright hypocrisy in the world, I do think there is a great deal of cant—"cant religious, cant political, cant literary," as Lord Byron said. Though few people have the face to set up for the very thing they in their hearts despise, we almost all want to be thought better than we are, and affect a greater admiration or lesser of things than we really feel. Indeed, some degree of affectation is as necessary to the mind as dress is to the body; we must overact our parts, in some measure, in order to produce any effect at all. There was formerly the two hours' sermon, the long-windedness, the nasal drawl, the uplifted hands and eyes; all which, though accompanied with some corresponding emotion, expressed more than was really felt, and were, in fact, intended to make up for the conscious deficiency. As our interest in anything wears out with time and habit, we exaggerate the outward symptoms of zeal as mechanical helps to devotion; dwell the longer on our words as they are less felt—and hence the origin of the word cant. The cant of sentimentality* has succeeded that of religion. There is a cant of humanity, of patriotism, and loyalty—not that people do not feel these emotions, but they make too great a fuss about them, and draw out the expression of them till they tire themselves and others. There is a cant about Shakspeare—there is a cant about Political Economy just now. In short, there is and must be a cant about everything that excites a considerable deal of affection and interest; and that people would be thought to know and care rather more about than they actually do. Cant is the voluntary overcharging or prolongation of a real sentiment. Hypocrisy is the setting up a pretension to a feeling you never had, and have no wish for. There are people who are made up of cant—that is, mawkish affectation and sensibility—but who have not sincerity enough to be hypocrites; that is, have not hearty dislike or contempt enough for anything to give the lie to their puling professions, and admiration and esteem for it.

Letter to the Lord Chancellor on the Present State of the Law of Lunacy, &c. By a Barrister of the Inner Temple.

Any one who reads the newspapers, though his knowledge extended no further, must be aware of the necessity of the revision of the law of lunacy; nay, any one who has read the newspapers in former years, must be aware of the real—whether the intentional or the accidental—injustice and cruelty perpetrated under the existing law. The Barrister does not represent the evil in half its enormity; for he does not advert to the many motives which exist to excite interested and weak-principled, as well as unprincipled relatives, to take advantage of the law of lunacy for selfish ends. Neither does he notice the ignorance or the liability to bias of professional men. There are a set of mad-doctors and medical judges in lunatic cases, whom we should regard as little better than crimps for private lunatic asylums. The Barrister states his object to be simply this:—

My present object is simply this—to draw your Lordship's attention to the fact, that by the law as it now stands, an idiot—a monomaniac—the mere lonely and quiet sufferer from morbid feeling and imagination, is placed in a worse condition, and a more perilous situation with regard to his personal liberty, than the criminal, who by his delinquencies has rendered himself liable to punishment. The property of an actual or supposed lunatic is infinitely better guarded than his person—indeed, property receives all the protection which can be bestowed; but, let the individual himself be never so inoffensive, and sane upon every subject but one, his personal liberty can at all times be placed in jeopardy by the written order of a friend, when backed by the warrant of two physicians, surgeons, or apothecaries. This is indeed a startling anomaly in the jurisprudence of England. How little is it in accordance with our notions of that freedom which we pride ourselves upon!—how great is its opposition to the very principles of that constitution which we live under and are wont to admire!—Nevertheless, the case as stated is correct, and can be supported, not only by the evidence of facts, but by reference to the several Acts of Parliament which have been passed on the subject.

"It was the doctrine of our ancient law," says Blackstone, "that persons deprived of their reason might be confined, until they recovered their senses, without waiting for the forms of a commission or other authority from the crown." Is the law less barbarous in practice at the present day than it was at the time which the learned commentator referred to?—a question very easy of solution by reference to the statute books; and by their authority it would appear that such a question can only be answered in the negative.

* There has been another revolution in cant since Mr Hazlitt wrote this.

The Barrister examines the nature and provisions of the statute. The frequent cases of eccentricities, waywardness, singularity, and oddity which occur in society are noticed as described by an intelligent physician, Dr Prichard; cases which, if the persons possessed property to tempt the avarice of relatives, might lead two-thirds of society to consign the remaining third to mad-houses. 'But,' says the Barrister, in commenting on these cases—Does it accord with any principles of reason, of law or equity, that such individuals as are alluded to by the learned writer—and who compose by far the greater number of insane persons—should be treated in the same manner as the raving madman—that they should be torn from their associates and their homes, to be made the inmates of a licensed gaol! there to be goaded by all the horrors of their dreadful situation; and if reason has not quite deserted her citadel, there to be distracted by surrounding objects, and harassed into wretchedness, until the intellect is altogether dislodged from its seat.

The recent and startling case of Mr Paternoster, lately reported in the London newspapers, is noticed.

This gentleman was said to be insane, he was in fact certificated as such, and would, probably, have been incarcerated in a mad-house, without the public attention having been called to the fact; but for his appearance at the Marlborough Street Police Office, for the purpose of lodging a complaint against two men, who, armed with the certificate, had violently attempted to gain possession of his person. If the newspaper report of the proceedings was correct—and it is reasonable to suppose that it was so, from the fact of its never having been contradicted—sanity itself could not have suggested a more touching or rational appeal than was made on that occasion by Mr Paternoster to the Magistrates; but in the Police Office he found no security for his liberty, no protection for his person; the boon which every Englishman has a right to expect could not be granted to him; and why? because the order had been regularly signed, the certificate had been regularly filled up; and he was at last dragged away, almost frantic, by the minions of a mad-house. Let such a case speak for itself—it requires no comment.

This is horrible. But, were Mr Paternoster, and a lady, whose case has since been reported, as mad as they are made to appear by the doctors' certificates, is this enough to entitle their relatives wholly to disregard their feelings, and obliterate their free-will—to crush and torture? Is there no medium for the unhappy monomaniacs, whose disease is often inflamed by the treatment they receive, between entire freedom of purse and person and the common mad-house, with its cells, manacles, and obdurate keepers? The Barrister suggests some remedies; but he does not go far enough. Lunatic certificates are, we fear, too often the Lettres de Cachet of England. The mode in which they are given demands instant revision.

Moral Views of Commerce, Society, and Politics.

By the Rev. Orville Dewey.

This gentleman, if we mistake not, is the author of a book of travels in England and upon the Continent which was published a few years ago. He is an American, and a man of enlarged and sound views. His opinions are stated in a series of Lectures or Moral Discourses, actually preached in a pulpit, and upon Sunday evenings. We can safely recommend the Discourses, which are as religious in tone as many of Blair's Sermons, (that on Order for example,) and leave our readers to judge for themselves of an innovation which Mr Dewey vindicates very plausibly. If the popular work "Mammon" had been delivered from the pulpit, no one would have taken offence.

We shall give a brief specimen of Mr Dewey's Discourses, and ask if his opinions accord with the European reader's observation and experience. He is speaking of the revolution towards which not Britain, not France alone, but the whole civilized world, is steadily and grandly moving; and remarks:—

In former days, when power has been wrested from its despotic possessor, it has been done only by a violent and bloody hand. But now an influence, silent and irresistible, is rising up from the mass of the people, and is stealing, from thrones, and princedom, and hierarchies their unjust prerogatives; and, at the same time, as if by some wonder-working magic, is making their incumbents helpless to resist, and even willing to obey. Potentates are learning a new lesson, and so are the people too. Before, revolutions have been violent and bloody, from the very weakness of those who have carried them on, from the very uncertainty whether they should succeed. Now the People are reposing in calm security upon their undoubted strength. Assurance has made them moderate. Let no one mistake their moderation for apathy, or their quietness for defeat; for they are calm only as they are determined and sure. Such is undoubtedly the character of the present era, however we may regard the good or the evil involved in it. To me, I confess, it is by far the most momentous and sublime era in the history of the world. The introduction of Christianity and the discovery of printing—the two greatest events on record—are, in fact, now producing, for the first time, on the broad theatre of national fortunes, the very results which we are witnessing. They have given birth, if not to the free principles of modern times, at least to their free action. Like the sun and the moon in heaven, they have penetrated, by their influence, the great deep of society. The effect produced may well awaken that solemn and even religious emotion in the mind of which a late distinguished writer has spoken. What is now presented to the attention of the world is not, as formerly, kingdoms convulsed, or navies wrecked upon the shore, but that "tide in the affairs of men," that slow rising and gradual swelling of the whole ocean of society, which is to bear everything upon its bosom.

Mr Dewey, in a note connected with this passage, remarks:—

Nothing surprised me more, four years ago in England, than what appeared at first sight, this apathy, this moderate tone of the most Radical Reformers; but how much more was I struck to find, on closer observation, this deeper determination, this repose of conscious strength—the purpose to succeed not weakened, but only stronger in its calmness!

An Impartial Examination of all the Authors on Australia.

This is a small and cheap compilation, in which the author gives a decided preference to New South Wales over all the other colonies, Van Dieman's Land included. Of Van Dieman's Land, the older settlement seems, indeed, peculiarly jealous. Those who intend to emigrate should read everything, look to all sides, examine, compare, and by no means be hasty in coming to a judgment. This compilation gives a very bad account of South Australia, and one not much more flattering of the Swan River Settlement, or Western Australia. The New Zealand colony is also run down, though we believe no one is thinking much about it; and that the million acres which Lord Durham purchased from the natives for £40 or £50 will, after all, be a dear bargain before quiet possession is obtained. We should say to intending emigrants, Read this pamphlet; but remember that the writer is the advocate of New South Wales, though not an unfair one. He draws largely upon Dr Leng, and the other writers who laud that colony.

Letters to and from the Government of Madras, relative to the Disturbances in Canara in April 1837, &c., &c. By F. C. Brown, Esq.

In April 1837, there were alarming rumours of insurrection in the province of Canara. The British authorities, the servants of the Government, civil and military, were seized with panic, and fled as fast as possible from Mangalore; and when the rebels or invaders did appear, they were found not formidable, and were easily defeated, and the tumult put down. Martial law was proclaimed, and a commission subsequently appointed to try prisoners, traitors, and rebels; and, in all probability, in that country, and under these circumstances, harshness, and perhaps cruelty, was shewn to the natives in some or in numerous instances; and the forms of justice might not have been more strictly maintained than in any country in a state of disturbance and excitement, in which the few keep down the many. Mr Brown, the writer of the letters, who appears to have a considerable amount of landed and other property in the province, has been deeply injured in his fortune by these events. His estates will not sell, and he cannot realize his property. He is an earnest reformer of the wrongs inflicted on natives of India, and, in particular the sufferers in consequence of the late insurrection in Canara. He appealed to the Government of Madras, and obtained no redress; he has come to England, and appealed to the Board of Directors, and has not obtained even a hearing. He has therefore printed, to "shame the rogues;" and, perhaps, he has done well; though his personal case is so mixed up with that of "justice to Canara," that the latter, and the wrongs of native India in its breadth and length, may not, as they are represented, directly or indirectly, in these letters, obtain half the attention they deserve, and might more readily have obtained, had not Mr Brown been himself the principal personage of the piece.

Knight's Pictorial Edition of Shakspeare.

Mr Charles Knight is at the head of his profession, in producing illustrated and annotated editions of popular works. This work will be very cheap, considering its plan, though far from a low-priced edition; and it promises to contain numerous excellencies. Among these are—careful collation of the original text; a digest of whatever is found valuable in the numerous critics and commentators on Shakspeare; an amusing melange of antiquarian notes; and a prodigality of clever, and really illustrative wood-engravings. Each part contains one play, and is thus complete in itself. Those already published are—1st, The Two Gentlemen of Verona; 2d, King John. The editor assigns reasons for the adoption of this order, which we do not consider important. The choice has given facility for great variety in the embellishments, from the scene lying in two different kingdoms, widely dissimilar in costume and all those accessories of daily life which may be made the subject of picture. The work has started well, and with the promise of fair progress, which we shall have further opportunities of noting.

Exposition of the Peculiar Doctrines of the New Jerusalem Church.

The Rev. S. Noble, the pastor of the New Jerusalem Church, in Cross Street, London, and a devoted and enthusiastic follower of Swedenborg, has published an enlarged second edition of an appeal to the Christian World in behalf of the views which are held by his sect, or the Swedenborgians. Among other things, his bulky and weighty treatise displays much curious theological and controverted learning. He claims Wealey as, at one time, the half-convert of Swedenborg; and also other Dissenters of name. Mr Noble naturally displays a strong bias; but he has stripped away a great deal of the rubbish with which ignorance and prejudice have loaded the name of Swedenborg, which, probably, has enough to answer for without the imputation of gratuitous absurdities. This work appeared originally as an answer to the Rev. Mr Beaumont of Norwich, who wrote the "Anti-Swedenborg." The enlarged work is intended to stop the mouths of all gainsayers of the Baron's doctrine. It contains collections of instances of Swedenborg's alleged intercourse with the Spiritual World, which are very curious, and, at least, as well authenticated as many things of the same kind. From this book it would seem that Kant was at one time a believer in Swedenborg's supernatural faculties; thus furnishing another chapter to a work which ought to be written on the Credulity of Sceptics.

Life's Lessons.

A sensible, well-written tale, after the spirit and manner of Miss Edgeworth's "Moral Tales," forms the first of "Life's Lessons." It is the fictitious autobiography of a young lady, the daughter of a rich merchant, who grows up indulged and selfish, but not quite heartless; and upon whom adversity, time, example, and reflection work a saving change. These influences transform her into a useful, respectable, and happy young woman; although not one lover appears, and although no rich relation bequeaths her a large fortune or an estate. We see indeed no brighter prospect before her, than leaving her situation as a governess, and sinking gracefully into the condition of an old maid, the instructor of her little nieces and nephews, and the inmate of the family of her affectionate brother, and his kind and amiable wife.

Part IV. of Dr Ure's Dictionary

Contains elaborate articles on Distillation, Fermentation, Evaporation, and Dyeing, with many lesser, yet valuable articles, and a few that will be found curious even to general readers. Among these last, are Cutlery, and the new invention for embroidering. The machine is invented by a German, and enables one female to embroider any pattern with 80 or 140 needles, as accurately and expeditiously as she formerly did with one. Many of these machines are already introduced into the Manchester factories, where Dr Ure has seen them worked, and "doing beautiful work." Are these machines to supersede all the hand-workers of the beautiful Ayrshire and Moravian work throughout the three kingdoms? We trust not hastily. One of the machines, of 130 needles, costs £200; but it does as much work as fifteen hand-embroiderers, and requires only the care of one person and two children to assist. We must refer to the original work for the description of this ingenious machine.

Geraldine and other Poems.

It was either Sir Morgan O'Dogherty or some one of that order of knighthood, who, about a dozen or fifteen years since, vowed to complete Coleridge's "Christabel," Sir James Mackintosh's History, and a few other great literary undertakings, then in the dead-thrums. The gallant knight never redeemed his vow; and it has been left to Mr Tupper, the author of "Proverbial Philosophy," to compose, in a few days, the sequel to Coleridge's "wild, beautiful, and original poem," which the author never ventured to complete. How the ambitious task is accomplished, we leave to fame, oblivion, and the admiring critics. The remainder of the volume is occupied with a number of little domestic and other poems, all very kindly and amiable in spirit; and a few copies of verses displaying considerable vigour of thought. Those we mean are entitled "Contrasted Sonnets."

Motives to the Study of Biblical Literature.

By William Goodhugh.

The author of these Lectures is the writer of the "Critical Examination of Bellamy's Translation of the Bible," which appeared in the Quarterly Review. Hence his spirit and his bias may be surmised. He wishes to stir up a desire for the cultivation of Protestant biblical learning. The work is adapted chiefly to theologians and critical scholars; but it may also be read with advantage by such as have no intention of carrying their studies beyond its pages, as it contains a vast quantity of varied biblical knowledge.

Pearls of Great Price; or, Maxims, Reflections, Characters, and Thoughts, &c. &c.

Some skillful redacteur, or rather Literary Digester, has given the world the pith and essence of the works of Jeremy Collier, in one small volume. Collier, though rather a voluminous general writer, is best known by his "Short View of the Immorality of the English Stage;" a work which, in spite of some faults of spirit and of style, has been productive of incalculable good. In stringing his pearls, the Digester has followed an alphabetical arrangement; and in his hands the wit and wisdom of Jeremy Collier make a rather respectable addition to the number of this kind of books, though we must demur to placing this work, as he bids us, on a level with those of Montaigne and La Bruyere.

The Young Naturalist's Book of Birds.

The anecdotes and descriptions of the feathered race in this little volume are compiled by Mr Percy B. St. John; and the work is illustrated by dashing designs of birds of prey, by Landseer. Every work on birds must have some engaging features, and this one is no exception. The anecdotes are more recondite than those we are accustomed to see in such collections.

The London Flora. By Alexander Irvine.

The work so named comprehends the plants of all the home counties, extending to the Channel, and as far west as Southampton, and east as the Essex coast. It displays pains and industry; and the specified localities will give it value to metropolitan botanizers. The compiler seems to have had valuable assistance in the environs of London. Many localities are noticed far beyond his prescribed boundaries.

Schoolhouses.

This is the reprint of a Report made to the American Board of Education, by their Secretary, upon the form and arrangement of Schoolhouses best adapted to the comfort and improvement of children. It is a sensible little treatise, and deserves attention from those about to build schoolhouses, whether individuals or societies, and may be studied in connection with the Prussian and Dutch models.

An Examination of Phrenology. By Dr Thomas Sewall, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology, &c. &c.

This Examination is the substance of two lectures delivered to the students of the Columbian College, Columbia, and published, it is said, by request. In the first place, like the Treatise of Dr Roget, it gives an account of phrenology and of the older systems by which faculties have been located on the head; and then proceeds to refute the new doctrines, or that new arrangement of organs, which the Doctor does not consider one whit more tenable than those of the middle ages, which have been long forgotten. The "new science" is very fairly laid down, assuming the works of Gall, Spurzheim, and Combe as the received code of phrenological principles. There are some newer expounders of the science, such as Mr Sidney Smith, who differ from Spurzheim and Combe; but we presume they are not recognised by the great body of believers, though they may turn round on Dr Sewall, and say "This is not true phrenology. This is merely Dr Spurzheim or Mr Combe's version of a science, in which Gall only led the way in discovery." However, as all agree in the great principle, the existence of the organs, and on their position in the head, these objections are not material. The subject-matter of Dr Sewall's second Lecture is to shew how far the science is reconcilable with the anatomical structure and organization of the brain, the cranium, and other parts concerned. He adopts this course for two reasons—

1st, From a belief that the anatomy of the parts concerned, is the proper and only standard by which to ascertain its truth.

2d, That the metaphysical arguments on the subject, while they have been urged with great power, have too often been evaded, and the public mind has not been enlightened, as to the real merit of Phrenology, by the usual methods of investigation. Even the lash of ridicule, under which it has generally been left to wither, has done but little in arresting its progress, or exposing its errors.

The ground which Phrenologists assume the right to occupy is so extensive, and the outlets for retreat are so numerous, that it is difficult to present an objection to the science, which cannot, upon the common principles of reasoning, be plausibly evaded. A few examples will illustrate the idea which I wish to convey.

If an individual has a large head, and his mental manifestations are unusually powerful, the case is brought forward as a proof of the truth of Phrenology; but if the manifestations are feeble, it is said that the great size of the head is the result of disease, or that the brain is not well organized, or that other circumstances have exerted an influence in diminishing its power. If a small head is connected with a powerful intellect, it only proves that the brain, though small, is well organized, and acts with uncommon energy. If an individual has a particular propensity strongly marked in his character, and there is no corresponding development of the brain, it is said that the organ has not been thrown out by indulging its desires; but if there is a large development of an organ, and no corresponding propensity, then it is contended that the germ of the propensity is there, but that it has been repressed by education, or other circumstances; or it is found that some counteracting organ is fully developed which neutralizes the first. For example, if the organ of Covetousness is large, and the person has no uncommon love of gain, and the organ of Benevolence is also large, it is urged that the action of the one neutralizes that of the other.

I have already mentioned that the temperament also is supposed to perform an important part in modifying the action of the different organs, and for which all due allowance is to be made.

When all these fail in furnishing a satisfactory explanation, another method still more amusing is sometimes resorted to, in relieving Phrenology from embarrassment. It may be illustrated by the following facts:—

There is a celebrated divine now living, in Scotland, equally distinguished for his amiable disposition, his gigantic powers of mind, and the great moral influence which he exerts upon the Christian world. This individual, it is said, has the organ of Destructiveness very largely developed, and not having any counteracting organ very large, it is contended by those who are acquainted with the fact, that he manifests his inherent disposition to murder, by his mighty efforts to destroy vice and break down systems of error. In this way, he gratifies his propensity to shed blood.

By a recent examination of the skull of the celebrated infidel Voltaire, it is found that he had the organ of veneration developed to a very extraordinary degree. For him it is urged, that his veneration for the Deity was so great, his sensibility upon the subject of devotion so exquisite, that he became shocked and disgusted with the irreverence of even the most devout Christians, and that, out of pure respect and veneration for the Deity, he attempted to exterminate the Christian religion from the earth.

Thus, it is said the organ of Destructiveness, when ill-directed, makes maid-servants smash glass and china with little remorse, or positive pleasure; but if well disciplined, takes pleasure in eradicating dirt from tables, floors, &c., with the besom of Destruction.

It is laid down by all phrenologists that size of brain is the measure of intellectual power. "This inquiry," says Dr Sewall, "involves one of the fundamental principles of phrenology." He cites Mr Combe as to Size; and Mr Sidney Smith, the latest phrenological writer, though he differs from Mr Combe on many points, recognises the empire of "the big-headed men" to the fullest extent:—

"If," says Mr Combe, "we take two heads, in sound health, of similar age, in each of which several organs are similar in their proportions, but the one of which is large, and the other small, and if the preponderance of power of manifestation is not in favour of the first, then phrenology must be abandoned as destitute of foundation."

And here it is proper to inquire, whether in speaking of the volume of the brain, its absolute or relative size is to be understood. If the former, then men of small stature must rank as inferior in intellectual power, to men of large size; and phrenology has also to contend with the fact, that the whale, the elephant, and several other animals of the lower order, have a larger brain than man, while their intellect is inferior.

If the relative size of the brain be intended, then it is necessary to know with what it is to be compared; whether with the dimensions of the face, the size and length of the neck, with the size of the spinal marrow, the cerebral nerves, or with the volume of the whole body. Upon this point, phrenologists have not been explicit.

The difficulty of instituting an accurate comparison of the brain with the first four of them, seems likely to prevent either from becoming the standard; and the great variations to which the body is liable from different causes, being, as it sometimes does, nearly half its volume, while the brain remains the same, renders this not a more certain criterion. Some facts, however, seem to have afforded the inference, that the power of the intellect is in proportion to the volume of the brain, compared to that of the body; and that just as we descend in the scale of intellectual existence, from man through the various tribes of animals, the brain will be found to be diminished in size. But the investigations of Haller, Wrisberg, Soemmering, Blumenbach, Cuvier, and other anatomists, shew this conclusion to be erroneous, and prove by actual experiment, that it has no foundation in nature. A summary of the result of Cuvier's investigations upon this subject, is presented in the following table.

He considers the brain in man, in proportion to his body, as one to thirty; and though it might with more propriety have been calculated as one to forty or fifty, the relative proportion between man and the lower animals is no less certainly ascertained.

We cannot give the tabular statement, but quote the result:—

This table shews that four species of the monkey, the dolphin, and three kinds of birds, (the canary bird, sparrow, and cock,) exceed man in the proportion of the brain to the body, and that various other animals are nearly on a level with him.

Nor does the argument in favour of a regular gradation of intellect, according to the size of the brain, hold good in a comparison of the lower animals with each other, their intellectual capacities not being in proportion of the brain to the body. This fact is shewn by the table of Cuvier.

The doctrine, therefore, that man owes his intellectual superiority to an excess of brain, derives no support from his comparison with the lower animals; nor does it appear, from observation, that this is the source of the diversity of intellectual capacity which distinguishes individuals of the human species from each other.

Professor Warren of Boston, who has probably enjoyed as great opportunities for dissecting the brains of literary and intellectual men of high grade, and of comparing these with the brains of men in the lower walks of life, as any anatomist of our country, if not of the age, says, as the result of his experience on this subject, that, in some instances, it appeared that a large brain had been connected with superior mental powers, and that the reverse of this was true in about an equal number. One individual, who was most distinguished for the variety and extent of his native talent, says Dr Warren, had, it was ascertained after death, an uncommonly small brain. I might accumulate testimony of this description to an almost unlimited extent; but I will not detain you.

In the same summary way, must we deal with the demonstrations on the thickness of the skull, which are illustrated by plates. Of two of these plates, representing each a horizontal section of the skull, it is said:—

Plate II. represents, by a horizontal section, the skull of a sturdy, athletic waterman, who was drowned in the Potomac. It is scarcely the eighth of an inch in thickness, though it is firm, compact, and in every respect healthy, in its structure.

Plate III. represents, by a horizontal section, the skull of a young and once beautiful female, who came to this city from a neighbouring State, fell into bad company, abandoned the paths of virtue, and died in abject poverty. It is nearly twice the thickness of the former, and is well organized and healthy in its appearance.

Here we have two skulls from healthy individuals in the vigour of life, the one a male and the other a female; and, to render the contrast more striking, the skull of the female is twice the thickness of that of the male. Where is the phrenologist, however experienced, who, by the delicacy of his touch, the keenness of his eye, and those aided by his craniometer, could have pronounced, that the sturdy waterman had a skull scarcely the eighth, while that of the female was at least one-fourth of an inch in thickness, and been able to make due allowance, and to ascertain the relative volume of the brain in each.

The result of these and other experiments, entitles the lecturer to say:—

I hold it then to be clearly established, that no phrenologist, however experienced, can, by any inspection of the living head, ascertain whether an individual has a skull of one inch, or one-eighth of an inch in thickness, nor whether he has 56.22 ounces of brain in volume, or only 25.33 ounces.

With the result of these experiments before you, gentlemen, I leave you to estimate the value of phrenology as a practical science, in determining the powers of the human intellect. But we will pass on to inquire, &c.

This inquiry is about the frontal sinuses, that stumbling-block which Phrenologists usually clear by a bound, either forward or to one side. After describing these cavities, the lecturer proceeds:—

Plate VIII. represents, by a horizontal section, the skull of an individual whom I well knew. He was an athletic, labouring man, who became intemperate, and died at the age of thirty. During his life, I frequently remarked, that he had what would be called by Phrenologists, a fine head for the perceptive faculties. His eye was deeply ensconced under a full projecting brow, and the organs of Form, Size, Weight, Colour, Order, Number, Individuality, and Comparison, were uncommonly well developed. His Locality was enormous. We should, upon the principles of phrenology, have pronounced him a Rubens in painting, a Humboldt in arrangement, and in Form, Size, and Weight, a Wren, a Douglas, or a Simpson. The development of his Comparison and Individuality would have placed him by the side of Dean Swift and the Earl of Chatham; and his Locality represented him as quite equal to Columbus, Newton, Volney, and Sir Walter Scott.

But what do we find upon an examination after death? We discover the frontal sinuses to extend over the organs of Individuality, Form, Size, Weight, Colour, Locality, Order, Time, and Comparison; the two tables of bone, separated in some points at the distance of an inch, and the intervening cavities so capacious as to measure one and a half fluid ounces.

Plate VIII. shews the form, size, and situation of the frontal sinuses, by a horizontal section of the skull.

So far, then, from the great apparent development of these organs, being occasioned by a forward protrusion of the anterior lobes of the brain, the projection was caused by the receding of the inner from the outer table of the skull, in the formation of the frontal sinuses, and the brain is discovered to be actually very deficient in its anterior portion.

I need scarcely observe, that no one presumes to distinguish between that projection which is caused by the full development of the anterior lobes of the brain, and the existence of the frontal sinuses.

Here, then, are nine of the organs, of which no correct judgment can be formed, as to the degrees of their development in the living head. From the large frontal sinuses, delineated in this plate, I have skulls in which they are seen of almost every intermediate size, to those which measure only a few grains.

The temporal muscle presents the next difficulty, together with the ridges and grooves exhibited upon the internal surface of the cranium; the result being—

No Phrenologist, therefore, who discovers a protuberance on the skull, can determine whether it is caused by fullness of the brain, at that part, or an increased thickness of the bone.

How is the Phrenologist to know, when measuring the head, whether the skull is thick or thin; whether the frontal sinuses are large or small, and whether the protuberances which he finds on the head, represent corresponding developments of the brain, or are occasioned by an increased thickness of the skull, at the place where they exist?

I do not deny that there is a difference in the natural capacities of men, some individuals being endowed with stronger, quicker, and clearer minds than others; but I am far from admitting that this difference depends on the amount of brain, or that the development of the mind in the progress of life is to be determined by the increased size of the head. If we look round upon the intellectual world, we shall find as many men distinguished for intellectual power, with a head of a small or medium size, and as many with a large head possessing a feeble intellect, as the reverse of these; and had phrenology in its commencement received a different direction, and a small head, in conformity with the preference of Aristotle, been made the standard of perfection, it would, doubtless, have enlisted as many zealous and confident advocates as are now found in its ranks.

But enough of Dr Sewall, who probably entertains the common American and erroneous notion that phrenology is in general acceptance in its headquarters, Edinburgh.

Notes on Naples. By a Traveller.

This is a sprightly clever book, of the kind which may be termed occasional volumes, as we say occasional or fugitive poetry. The Traveller's wit, or rather smartness, is apt to diverge into flippancy sometimes; but, to make amends, he has a fine, or, if we may so speak, a rich eye for picture, for colour, and grouping. If his word-pictures do tend to the exuberant, they are, at the same time, vivid and flowing. We shall take but one example, which includes both the modes which especially characterise the Traveller. The scene is a rustic fete at Ischia.

Some time before reaching the inn on our return, we had heard

"The twanging of guitars; and, shortly after,
A most unoriental roar of laughter;"

and, drawing near, we saw, along the arches of its low porch, the curtain, which screens alike from heat and cold, loosened from its usual festoons, and drawn down, and lights glimmering from behind it. We could only enter our apartments by passing through the midst of the revellers; and, as we drew the curtain back with this intent, there stood disclosed to us one of those scenes which, in the general merging of customs and manners in the great commonwealth of modern nations, present, where you do meet with them, those peculiar marks of national physiognomy which, year by year, become rarer all over Europe. Around, upon bench or stool, or squatting on the ground, as chance or a softer power led, was every denizen of the establishment, from the high padrone in her festal cap, down to the very faccina of the kitchen, dog and cat, and all. Among them, too, we observed, and no insensible partakers in the fun either, the lady, a visiter here, of a grandee of Spain—such conjunctions do happen, and who's the worse?—accompanied by a very sweet-faced girl, her daughter, whose only regret seemed to be, that she was not more prominent still among the performers. Red caps and brown faces were poked through the curtains from time to time, belonging to the people, who had flocked, like bees to a bell, to the music of this bucolic congress; while sundry Indian-looking figures stood with their gules and asses in the dusk, at the further part of the hall.

"At one end of the open space, in the centre of the groups, sat a hero who had changed our platters at dinner, and with whom we had had some confabulation—not much, to be sure; but, upon the strength of this conference, such as it was, I could venture to predicate of him that not a mortal man in all Christendom, Naples included, could match him at an extemporaneous lie."

There he sat, this Scapin of Scapins, as though nothing had happened, thrumming away at the guitar, cleverly as he played the knave, yet out of tune too, his very music being a sort of untruth. Near this Corypheus of the company, the niece of the house, who was called thirteen, to magnify the miracle of her accomplishments, lolled, with languishing looks, behind a second guitar, doing all her little possible to earn the laudations we had, in the previous part of the day, heard paid to her in advance; while between the two was seated, with kerchiefed head and jewelled ears, an ancient dame they called old Ma, a term by which they contradistinguished, as it appears, the dowager mamma from the reigning mamma (the mother of the Queen, she was not the Queen-mother); there she sat, rubbing and grinding at that instrument of inoperation, the tambura di Basqua; and I can venture to say, that not one in all the rustic revel was so fresh, and hale, and buoyant of spirit, as this octogenarian. Well, in the midst of all these auxiliaries, satellites you may call them, were two small she-things, to whose celestial bodies, to pursue the figure, the faces of all around were turned—albeit, never planet that danced round the sun ever found such a centre of gravity. These were two young female Ischiotes, with ornamented heads and bare feet and arms, which, together with their faces, were as brown as working all day in field and orchard could render them, who were here in all the intoxication of tarantella. Neapolitans in general, but Ischiotes in particular, are sufficiently addicted to grimace and fracas. Rage or pleasure manifest themselves and evaporate in a shout or a squall; and a whirl in the air, as though they were beside themselves, seems the natural language of their emotion. The tarantella appears to me to embody and to poetise the spirit of all this.

To say that, as the measure quickened, they cried with a sharp, shrill cry, and then plied their castanets, and squealed, and whirled, and wheeled again, one should hazard the suggesting, except for the accompaniment, something of the clod-pole dance of Scotland, the rude vagaries of which are the mere romping of Esquimaux squads, compared with the national dance of Naples, which, in all its extravagance, is ever graceful and flowery, and harmonious as its own music. Its grace, too, untaught as it is inimitable, is one which seems like the natural birth of pleasure and sweet sounds. One could imagine the blithe young supple figure, overfraught with enjoyment, launched suddenly forth to music, as you would see in motion some cunning instrument, with which movement and sweet sounds were twin-born, and that the cessation of the one were the loss of both. This joyous sunny spirit of the South I remember but in Mercandotte and in Heberic, and in them only. Then another very singular effect in this dance arises from the perfect noiselessness which intermits between the delicious accres de joie, the cause being, that the dancers are unshod, so that their bare shoeless feet twinkle over the flat stones without a sound; and in twilight, as I have seen the dance, a busy fancy might half believe the fitting figures among the shadowy vines, moving, as spirits move, all soundlessly, to be some creatures of the elements—Naiads of the mountain stream, or unsphered Oreads of the star-lit hills. The tarantella is certainly the most inspiring dance in the world. It thrills even the spectators—so, at least, it did me. I only regret I cannot convey a better idea of it. But there is a monotony in the ever-recurring cadences of the music, and which, in the very gusto of contrast to the extreme animation of the movement, is no less singular than it is indescribable. And then, ever and anon in this case, the Momus of the party, the Scapin aforesaid, would interpose some odd laughable quatrains or other, while still wound on the measure, on and on, untiringly, enjoyment, frolic, life, and spirit, with a sort of under-current of plaintive feeling sporting through the whole. . . . Their dance seemed to permit a succession of performers, the dropped thread of the dance being taken up by one after another; an instance of which we were witness of, for one of the girls having slipped her foot aside, a substitute leapt into her place—and a substitute which it would be injustice to forget. This was an odd satyr-like fellow, with a shock ballet-shaped head, and a visage to match, on one side of it, incapable of anything but a laugh. I have seen many like him here. His only habiliments were a shirt, made perhaps before buttons were invented, for wholly buttonless it was, the arms of it rolled up to the shoulder, and the front open down to heaven knows where; and a wondrous strange pair of unutterables, of the same material as the shirt, which might perhaps have been trousers in the olden time; but they had been dooked and dooked until dooking could no farther go, since the number of inches of nutmeg coloured skin they betrayed was already somewhat alarming. As these two items comprised the whole of his wardrobe, the quantum of his orange-tawny person that was to be seen for nothing may be better imagined than described. This supernumerary mime threw a character, an expression upon the scene entirely different, although the movement seemed unchanged. I should give a better idea of this mirthful being by saying, that he was the Ac-smile of the Faun in the Florentine gallery, for such he was, and would certainly uphold the idea of Boll, that that celebrated antique antle was drunk, and that Michael Angelo had given a wrong character to it on restoration. This fellow was certainly drunk, and some of his unconscious gesticulations were exact as a toe to the statue. But indeed his attitudes were altogether most remarkable. Nothing ungainly or preposterous offended you; stultified with wine, and in all the luxury of fantastic frolic though he was, there was no superfluous flinging about of limbs; yet there was inconceivable variety too. He seemed in short a classic Bacchanalian, and wanted but thyrsus and vine leaves, and a cluster of black grapes in his clutch, dropping odours, dropping wine, to mark him of the jovial crew of Semel's great son. Behold here the mystery of the fine arts! Such was the feeling that occurred to me as this man leapt into the rustic arena; and such it is still. Where could a life of study do for the student—save in Greece indeed—what he has but to transcribe, so fair is Nature's autograph, to find in this fair time done for him? Take here the peasant from his vineyard, how him in marble or stamp him on ocumnes. Could the peasant of the North serve the artist thus? And not in fauns and satyrs only—for the chiefs and demi-gods that Art robes in heroic mould, would be little shamed in any of the half-naked forms you still may see in Italia's field, following their herds, or idling in the sun. This is aptitude for art.

Were the reader to peruse the entire body of Notes, he would not have a much better idea of the traveller's peculiar style, or of his mark and likelihood, than the above extract affords.

PAMPHLETS.

Sir William Molesworth has published an abridgement of the "Parliamentary Report of the Select Committee on Transportation." The labours and report of the Committee must, in the course of the next session, lead to some important change in the present system of secondary punishments. Sir William dedicates his pamphlet to his constituents in Leeds. We merely announce it, as it is our purpose fully to discuss the important subject on which it bears. It every day becomes more evident that it is far easier to fabricate a dozen very plausible constitutions, than to frame one really good Poor-Law Bill, or Education Bill, and, above all, a sound legislative scheme of Secondary Punishments.

OLIVER & BOYD have added to their series of useful CATECHISMS one on HEAT. It is written by a well-qualified popular instructor, Mr HUGO REID, Lecturer on Chemistry, teacher of the philosophical department in the High School of Glasgow, and the author of "The Steam-Engine," and several excellent popular scientific manuals.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

ENGLAND.

THE large meetings, by torch light, of the working classes, in the north of England, have at length excited the attention of Government, and a proclamation has been issued, "warning and commanding all persons to desist from such assemblies at their peril." The immediate cause of issuing this proclamation was a meeting, held at Bury, on the 8th December, at which, notwithstanding of a previous notice of its illegality by the magistrates, several thousands assembled, many of them armed and bearing torches, and pistols were discharged in the air. No disorder, however, appears to have occurred. The breaking of thrashing-machines has again become a common practice, and numerous incendiary fires, both of agricultural produce and of manufacturing establishments, have taken place. At the very time the meeting was holding at Bury, an extensive cotton-manufactory, at Ashton-under-Lyne, was set on fire and completely destroyed. Another large cotton-mill at Bulwell, near Nottingham, was destroyed by fire the same week, and several instances of stacks being found on fire have occurred during the month. There is little doubt that these fires have been the work of incendiaries. The high price of food, without any adequate rise of wages, the operation of the New Poor Law, and the inflammatory harangues of Stephens and others, operating upon the starving population, are, no doubt, the causes of the present state of matters. We fear that if the high price of provisions continue, it will be very difficult to preserve the peace during the winter.

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS are going on at all our principal ports. A great many ships of war are fitting out; contracts for military and naval stores have been submitted; sailors and marines are enlisting; and all the forts on the coasts have been examined, and placed on the war footing, in so far as the number of troops at the disposal of Government will permit. Surveys have been made for the purpose of erecting additional forts at the mouths of the Humber and Tees, and also at White-haven; for it is seen that the use of steam-vessels in warfare will render our coasts less secure than they have hitherto been. We hope, however, that peace will be preserved; for war would prove the death-blow of every internal improvement, and would accomplish what the Aristocracy so ardently desire—the finality of Reform.

THE CHURCH.—The proceedings of the English clergy, during the month, have been too remarkable to be passed over. In the Court of Queen's Bench, the Rev. A. M. Gathercole has been sentenced to three months' imprisonment, for a gross libel on the nunneries at Stockton and Darlington. The Rev. Ebenezer Morris, vicar of Llanelly, in Carmarthenshire, summoned John James, one of his parishioners, before the ecclesiastical court, for non-attendance at Church—he being a Dissenter, and attending his own place of worship. He was admonished by the Bishop for his "irreligion," and ordered to pay the expenses of the suit against him, being £7; but, being unable to comply, he has been sent to Carmarthen jail. The same clergyman has also imprisoned David Jones, another Dissenter, for not attending Church, and for not furnishing the communion elements at his own expense. Jones was a churchwarden, and, at the proper time, he summoned a meeting to obtain a Church-rate. The rate was refused. The expense of the prosecution against Jones came to £40. A clergyman in the Isle of Wight, whose name is Brecks, prosecuted a widow for putting on her late husband's tombstone an inscription calling on the passers by to pray for his soul; but the prosecution was dismissed by Sir Herbert Jenner, in the Court of Arches, and the clergyman ordered to pay the costs. Our own clergy in Edinburgh have been talking about stopping the running of the mail on Sundays. It would be much better to shut the toll at once.

SCOTLAND.

A dinner was given by the Liberal electors of Stirlingshire to their member, Colonel Abercromby, at Stirling, on the 7th December. It was, we believe, the most splendid and numerously attended dinner ever given in a Scottish provincial town, there being between 600 and 700 gentlemen present. Sir Michael Bruce of Stenhouse filled the chair. The principal speakers were Colonel Abercromby, Admiral Fleming, Lord Dalmeny, Mr Gillon of Wallhouse, and Mr Weir of The Glasgow Argus. Admiral Fleming defended the Ministry against the recent attacks on them on account of the navy, and maintained that it was in a most efficient state; and he held in derision the notion that we had anything to fear from an attack by Russia. Lord Dalmeny defended Lord Durham from the attacks of the Tories, and spoke strongly against additional endowments to the Church of Scotland. Mr Weir hoped that the time of Parliament during the ensuing Session would not be entirely devoted to the Canadian Question, for the concerns of millions at home were of far greater importance than of thousands on the other side of the Atlantic.

Sir James Graham has been elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, instead of Sir Robert Peel. The Duke of Sussex was set up in opposition to him; but his Grace only obtained 207 votes, while Sir James had 282. We cannot see what good the keeping up this absurd form of an election can possibly effect; while it must distract the attention of the students from their studies. The less political excitement there is within the walls of a university the better.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—INDELIBLE INK.—An ink which would not become paler by age, and which would resist the effect of acids, has long been a desideratum—as all the inks at present in use are very easily removable from the paper, and there is no doubt that numerous frauds have in consequence been committed. In France this fraud is carried to such an extent as seriously to injure the revenue of stamps; the writing being washed out of bill stamps, and other stamped paper, and the paper again used; and there is no doubt that the same stamped paper may in this way be used many different times. In Paris there are numerous persons who make a business of washing the ink out of stamped paper, for a small percentage on the value of the stamps. Several years ago, the French Government appointed a commission of the most able chemists in France, with the view of discovering how this fraud could be prevented; but the commission has failed in the attempt. Some time ago, Dr Traill announced that he had discovered an indelible ink; but, it turns out to be a mere pigment, like Indian ink; and, although it resists acids, it can be washed out by a camel-hair pencil and a little water, or, more easily, with soap and water. Strong alkalis have been proposed; but inks made with them will not resist for a moment the chloride of lime. At a meeting of the Society of Arts, on the 12th of December, a communication from Dr Veitch on the formation of an indelible ink was read, which excited considerable attention. The difficulty of making an indelible ink was shewn by the following facts:—

1st.—That no vegetable colour could be used, because all such colours were destroyed by acid.

2d.—That no soluble substances were applicable, because they could be washed off.

3d.—That no insoluble substances, such as lamp black, were applicable, as they were merely particles of matter adhering to the surface of the paper, through the medium of some mucilaginous body. In this last class, we apprehend we must rank the inks used by the ancients; for, though some of the members of the Society seemed to think the ancient inks of an indelible character, we believe they were not so, and that they (like Dr Traill's) could easily have been washed off when recent, and could, perhaps, even yet be removed. The plan fallen upon was, to obtain a substance alike indestructible by any chemical agent and the effect of time; a substance which is insoluble, and which cannot be removed by any means without making an erasure. For this purpose a mixture was used, containing a small quantity of sulphuric acid, which chars the paper on the application of heat, so that the paper itself furnishes the colouring matter. Dr D. B. Reid and others agreed in thinking, that this was the only plan left; though not free from objections—as, in so far as we decompose the paper, we necessarily weaken it. A discussion of an interesting nature took place after the communication was read, in which several of the leading members took a part, some of whom thought it would be necessary to attend to the composition of the paper as well as the ink. A committee of the society has been appointed to report on the subject.

THE CLERGY AND THEIR STIPENDS.—CORN LAWS.

—It has often appeared to us to be a remarkable circumstance that, now that the Established Clergy have awakened out of what they themselves admit to have been a lengthened and lethargic slumber, they have not called public attention to the faulty manner in which their stipends are paid—viz., by drawing a certain portion of it from each landed proprietor in the parish—and the troublesome, expensive, and tedious process by which alone they can obtain any augmentation. Nothing irritates and provokes a body of men whom it ought to be their chief aim to conciliate more than these processes of augmentation. In former times, these processes were certainly more frequent than they are now; for the landowners were so annoyed with applications for augmentation of stipend, and by the serious litigations which arose among them in the allocation of the proportion of the augmentation payable by each, that, in 1808, the legislature was forced to interfere, and to declare that, in future, no application of a clergyman should be afterwards received, if he or any of his predecessors in the same cure had obtained an augmentation within twenty years previously. This is, perhaps, the only instance in which the legislature has been compelled to prohibit a body of men from stating their claims in a court of law. By the provisions of this act, the landed interest resorted to a very ingenious device for identifying the interest of the clergy with their own. At that time, much discontent existed in Scotland, occasioned by the yearly-accumulating burdens of the war, and exasperated by the high price of provisions, especially as wages had not risen in proportion. The act converted the money stipends of the ministers into grain; and thus the established clergy have the same interest with the landowners that grain should be dear. For example, in augmenting a minister's stipend, he is not allowed a fixed sum of money, but a certain number of quarters of grain. The actual grain is not delivered to him; but, calculating the value at the market price of the year—for ascertaining which a method has been long practised in Scotland—the clergyman receives that value from the land proprietors of his parish, in proportion to the extent of their estates. The clergy were easily induced to go into this scheme, as, for a great number of years previously, grain had been constantly rising in price. This accounts for the General Assembly having, more than once since the date of the act, petitioned Parliament against the repeal of the Corn-Laws—a circumstance that must be inexplicable to those who are not aware how stipends are paid.

But this mode of payment is attended with the following evils. The slightest augmentation sets all the proprietors of the parish into a series of the most expensive and tedious litigations; for the most difficult points of law often arise in ascertaining in what proportion the augmentation is to be paid by the different heritors. Farther, the stipend has to be collected, in many parishes, from thirty, forty, or even a hundred individuals, some of the payments being only a few pence. The payment from each varies every year; and, especially since the change of measures, the conversion of the old measures in which most of the stipends were modified into new, and the calculation of so many payments, are very troublesome; besides, where there are many small proprietors, a great part of the stipend is never paid at all; and when the minister resorts to compulsory means, he is brought into unseemly collision with the landowners. It, therefore, appears to us, that it would be much better to fix permanently the proportion of stipend payable by each land-proprietor, to collect it along with the land-tax of the county, and to pay it into exchequer, whence the clergy would draw their stipends quarterly, instead of once a-year, as at present. Another strong reason for change is, that it must have an injurious effect, with such of the parishioners as do not derive their means of subsistence from the soil, to have it believed, truly or falsely, that their pastor has an interest in bad crops, disastrous harvests, and high prices; for by these means alone can he obtain a high money stipend; and that, in this way, his spiritual duties and temporal welfare are at variance.

LOCAL LEGISLATION.—During last Session, 329 Acts were added to the Statute-book, of which only about one-third—120—are public Acts, an equal number being placed under the head “Local and Personal,” (under which is included all Road, Bridge, Canal, and Railway Bills, and others of the like nature;) thirty-five “Private Acts,” printed by the King’s printer; and fifty private Acts not so printed. These last are generally Acts of Naturalization and Divorce. Several of the local, and personal, and private Acts have, unquestionably, occupied more time in their discussion and adjustment than many of the public statutes; and, indeed, under the title of Public, are to be found numerous statutes strictly of a local nature—for example, that for settling the affairs of the City of Edinburgh, passed last Session, c. 55. We, therefore, are certainly far from exaggerating, when we assert, that one-half of the time of Parliament is spent in business which could be much more easily, cheaply, and expeditiously conducted by local legislatures. Even the statutes strictly public, such as those for reforming the law of Scotland, could surely be much better carried through in Edinburgh than in London; for all the information necessary to prepare them must be procured in Scotland, and constant intercourse must be had with persons there, during the progress of the bills through Parliament. The separation of public from personal, and local, and private legislation—using the terms in a still broader sense than is done in the present heads of the Statute-book—would, we are convinced, be attended with incalculable benefit, not only to the country generally, but also to those individuals who have occasion to obtain statutes for the arrangement of their private affairs, or for establishing mercantile or banking companies; and we beg to direct public attention to the mode proposed for its attainment, explained in last Register.

LEGISLATION AFFECTING SCOTLAND IN SESSION 1838.

The first Statute of the 1st and 2d Victoria, affecting Scotland, along, however, with England and Wales, is c. 44, for the purpose of consolidating the laws relative to the manufacture of glass, and for the collection of the duties payable on that manufacture.—The benefit of international copyright is attempted to be secured, under certain conditions, by c. 60.—An Act of the 6th and 7th William IV. increased the powers of heirs of entail, in granting tacks and making excambions—that is, in exchanging parts of their lands for others with greater facility than previously. This Act is extended, by c. 70, to those cases which had been overlooked in framing the former act.—Several statutes were, in this Session, passed, relative to the taking of oaths, some of which seem to apply to England alone; but the following are of general application. By a preceding statute, Quakers and Moravians were entitled to make an affirmation, in a prescribed form, instead of taking an oath; this permission is now extended to persons who have been Quakers or Moravians, but who have renounced the peculiar tenets of these sects—c. 77; and, by another statute, (c. 105,) it is declared, that all persons are to be bound by the oath administered in the form they themselves declare binding. This applies to criminal cases as well as to civil, to every court in the kingdom, and to oaths taken on the entering upon offices, or on other occasions. False affirming, or false swearing, though the oath be out of the usual form, is declared punishable with the pain of perjury. The time appears now fast approaching, when all oaths or appeals to a Deity and a future state should be repealed, and a solemn affirmation substituted in their stead.—In consequence of the disturbances which the great concourse of labourers to public works sometimes occasions, a provision has been made for the payment of constables for keeping the peace near railways, canals, and other public works.—As to the revenue, there is enacted (c. 85) a provision allowing stamps, denoting the duties payable in one part of the United Kingdom, to be used in other parts; and there is also a Customs’ Amendment Act, making a variety of alterations of the existing law on that branch of the Revenue, and containing a new Table of Duties, applicable to twenty or thirty articles of merchandise.—The establishment of additional schools in Scotland, is provided for by c. 86; and the conveyance of the mail on railways, by c. 98.—The law relative to legal proceedings by joint-stock banking companies against their own members, and by members against the company, is amended by c. 96.—In Scottish law exclusively, we have c. 86 relative to advocations and suspensions, by which the judgments of inferior courts may be brought under the review of the Court of Session in a more cheap and speedy manner than at present; chap. 114, by which those diligences, or modes of execution called letters of horning, poiding, arrestment, and caption, are abolished, and the decree itself made the warrant for charging a debtor to pay, and for execution against his debts, movables, and person, in case of failure. The necessity of applying to the Court of Session to enforce the decree of a sheriff, when the debtor’s goods or person are beyond the county, is also removed; the sheriff of the county in which the debtor is resident being authorized to grant his concurrence for the enforcement of the warrant. A power of restricting arrestments, which are often used in a very oppressive manner, is also given to sheriffs; and, instead of being in force for five years, as at present, they are declared to fall in three years, except where the debt is future or contingent. A great alteration is made in the duties of Lords Ordinary and Clerks in the Court of Session, by c. 118. At present, there is a certain rotation, so that it is a matter of uncertainty before which of the Judges a case brought into Court may come to be decided; but now the suitor may choose by which of the Outer-House Judges his case is to be determined. We fear the effect of this regulation will be, to create an immense accumulation of business before one or two judges, and hence great delay; while one or two others will be reduced almost to a state of idleness. Each clerk is to be attached to a particular judge, and will not henceforth be necessitated to run from one to another, as at present. There will also be a considerable saving in fees to the public, as all the officers of Court are henceforth to be paid by salaries. It is to be regretted, however, that the fee-fund has only been reduced, instead of being abolished, and that no provision has been made for diminishing the great, and, in many cases, useless expense of printing incurred at present. What is the use, for instance, of keeping up, as an imperative rule, the printing of all defences, and of almost all summonses, at the very outset of a suit, when, as often occurs, a single copy of them is all that is ever required? What is to prevent the judge perusing the original manuscripts? Neither do we think that there would have been any great difficulty in abolishing the Bill Chamber, which has long been felt to be a nuisance. The Sheriff-Courts have not been overlooked (c. 119,) though we have some doubt of the propriety of the provision relieving the sheriff-deputes of their obligation to reside four months within their counties annually, and substituting for that obligation the holding of eight courts yearly. Under this provision, the Sheriff will be enabled to visit his county twice a-year, remaining there four days each time at the longest. The ground alleged for allowing the sheriffs to be absent from their counties—viz., that they may be enabled to keep up their knowledge of law by attending the Court of Session—is a mere pretext, which we have repeatedly exposed. It ought not to be forgotten, that that Court sits only 114 days in the year; so that there is not the slightest difficulty in combining four months’ residence of the sheriffs in their counties, with constant attendance on the sittings of the Court. The sheriff-substitutes, however, having fewer friends at Court, are to be kept strictly to their duty. They are not to be absent from their counties more than fourteen days at a time, nor more than six weeks in all; and they are not to act as conveyancers, factors, or agents for banks; but, on the other hand, they are no longer removable at the pleasure of the deputies; and a provision is made for giving them superannuation allowances. It would have been advisable to have increased the salaries of some of them at the same time; its £150 a-year is too little for a judge having so important duties to perform, and so extensive a jurisdiction. There are a variety of other important provisions in the statute, which we can scarcely enumerate—viz., for a summary mode of removing tenants for a less period than a year, whose rents do not exceed £30; allowing sheriffs to recall extracted decrees in absence; to suspend diligence where the sum is under £25; explaining and regulating their maritime jurisdiction; permitting criminal and de medietate regis warrants, to be executed beyond the county where they have been issued, without the indorsement of a magistrate of the county in which the criminal is found; a provision for remedying the inconvenience of bringing jurymen from distant parts of the county, and another for cutting down the emoluments of the grossly overpaid, and, in many instances, all but sinecure office of sheriff-clerk. In the next Parliament we hope that Mr Wallace of Kelly, or some of the other law-reforming Members, will turn his attention to the state of the Law of Evidence in Scotland, and bring in a Bill to assimilate it with that of England, so far as to allow the evidence of near relations to be received for each other. The present state of the law is attended with great hardship in numerous cases; and the feeling of the judges is not to exclude evidence; but the rule against the reception of the evidence of near relations in favour of each other, is too firmly fixed to be broken through without legislative authority.

IRELAND.

The accounts of the progress of the Precursor Society are so contradictory that it is impossible to discover whether it is likely to become the formidable association O'Connell expected, or whether it is about to die a natural death. The Pilot boasts of the accession of tens of thousands; but, if this be true, the members must be almost entirely of the less influential classes, for a great proportion of the Irish Liberal Members of Parliament has refused to join it. The O'Connell Tribute in Dublin already exceeds the collection of last year. By the 11th December, it had reached £1680, and contributions were daily coming in; while last year £1339 was the total amount collected in Dublin. A proposal has been made to collect £100,000, to purchase an estate for O'Connell, and discontinue the Tribute; but we suspect that such an effort is beyond the means of the Precursors. Mr John Ponsonby, son of Lord Duncannon, having expressed his disapproval of the Precursors, and of the Anti-Tithe agitation, has, in consequence, been severely taken to task by O'Connell, who asserts that "the present Ministry cannot stand without the Precursors; and that, if he gets two millions of Precursors, the Ministry is secure, and justice would be done to Ireland." He says that the Precursors' Society was formed to strengthen the hands of Ministers; and that, if he is to be told that the Precursors are to be thrown overboard, the Ministry must be thrown overboard also.

CANADA.

As had been anticipated, another attempt has been made to establish a Republic in Canada—but without success. The arrangements appear to have been as defective as those of last year; and, indeed, the great military force in the Colony renders all attempts at insurrection hopeless. It appears that since June preparations for a rising have been going on; and a secret oath had been taken by a great number of the habitans during the autumn. The movement took place on the night of the 3d November, in the district of Montreal, and neighbourhood; but, though many thousands assembled at first, the great proportion of them dispersed on finding that no arms had been provided for them. The insurgents took the village of Beauharnois, and made Mr Ellice, jun., Member for the Cupar district of burghs, and his lady, prisoners. They were headed by Dr Robert Nelson, who, in the assumed character of "President of the Provisional Government," issued a declaration, enumerating the grievances of the Canadians, and proclaiming a Republic. In the course of a week, the rebels in Lower Canada were completely dispersed, and the insurrection put down. The jails have been filled with prisoners, and the most savage retaliation has been resorted to by the victors. Over a large extent of country, it is said that "not a single rebel house has been left standing," and the miserable habitans have been left to starve by hundreds in the woods. In Upper Canada, the British settlers remained perfectly quiet; but, on the night of the 8th November, several hundreds of armed Americans sailed from Ogdensburg, and made an attack on Prescott, a small town in Upper Canada, fifty miles east from Kingston. They took possession of a windmill and some other buildings, about a mile from Prescott, and maintained their position for three days against all the efforts of the militia. On the 15th, four companies of the 83d regiment, with two eighteen pounders and a howitzer, having come up, and also two gunboats, with two more eighteen pounders, the Sympathizers were unable to stand the fire, and surrendered at discretion—102 in all, of whom sixteen were wounded. The exasperation of feeling on the American and Canadian frontier is represented to be very great; and retaliation, on the part of the Canadians, for the attack made upon them, was feared. It is strongly suspected that the Russian Government has been actively fomenting the discontent in Canada; and that even the American Government is not sincere in its professions of neutrality. It is plain that, henceforth, Canada can only be kept down by a great military force; and whether it is worth the expense of keeping—probably two millions a-year, drawn from the over-taxed people of Britain—may well be doubted.

COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES.

A considerable rise has of late taken place in many articles, which has been attributed to an increase of the issues of the joint-stock banks. For some time past, there has been a speculative spirit afloat, as evinced by the formation of banking and other joint-stock companies, and by the rise of the price of the stock of many of them. The stock of nearly all the newly projected Scottish banks is at a considerable premium; and many persons have had the good sense to realize the profit, and retire from the companies, being fearful that there are more banks in existence, and in course of formation, than there is business for. An important commercial treaty between England and Turkey has been finally ratified, by which our trade with Turkey will be, in future, free from invidious distinctions and exclusions of particular articles, which have been felt to be so annoying. Our vessels are to be exempted from all taxes and charges in passing the Dardanelles or Bosporus, and our merchants are placed on the same footing as the most favoured subjects of Turkey itself. A commercial treaty has been concluded between Holland and the Prussian Commercial League. The corn and timber of the Baltic are to be admitted into Holland at diminished duties, and the League is to allow the importation of sugar from Holland on equally favourable terms.

AGRICULTURE.

The price of the best wheat has now risen to the war price of 85s. a-quarter; and, the average having reached 73s., the duty on importation is again reduced to 1s. There is every reason, however, to believe that there is no great quantity of foreign wheat to be entered for home consumption; the operation of our Corn-Laws of late years having had the effect, not merely of preventing the importation, but also the growth of foreign corn. The duty on all other kinds of grain, except wheat, still continues prohibitory; so that no relief can be obtained by the consumption of foreign barley or oats. All the accounts appear to shew that the late crop throughout the three kingdoms was greatly below an average. In the higher and later districts, indeed, it was a complete failure, many of the hill farmers not having enough of grain to keep their horses till next crop. In Aberdeenshire, great distress prevails, in consequence of the failure in the crops. In the east of Ireland, the high price of provisions, particularly of oatmeal and potatoes, has excited some alarm; and a meeting of the magistrates of the districts around Dublin has been held for the purpose of devising means to relieve the distress of the poor.

LORD DURHAM AND THE REFORMERS.

THE New Year opens gloomily, whether we regard the political or social aspects of the times, whether the domestic or foreign prospects of the country : our young Sovereign, egregiously misled ; her Ministers universally hated, despised, or distrusted ; the nation split into factions ; and the lower orders either actually starving, or upon the eve of starvation, and in a more inflammatory state than we can remember, even in the worst periods of popular discontent. That we are on the verge of some change, no one doubts, though nothing certain can be predicted, save that the Duke of Wellington may now have the Whig Ministry dirt-cheap—i. e., at salary-price—if he is willing to strike the bargain ; and that the Radicals may gain Lord Durham for a feather to the cap of liberty, if they will only be more prompt in their flattery, and strike while his Lordship's wrath is hot. The moment the Whig Government took courage to slam the doors of the Court and the Cabinet in his face, and to withhold that Plymouth salute—pitifully to withhold it—Lord Durham's course might have been foretold. There is now for him no alternative between sullen silence, and that high part for which his haughty temper, his aristocratic prejudices, and family connexions would render him inept, although he did possess those commanding qualities of intellect, and the various talents necessary to the leader of a great party in times like the present. Heaven knows, however, that the Whig swindling system has brought the cause of Reform, in its practical working, to a condition in which Reformers cannot afford to throw away one atom of strength. If the Earl of Durham be, as his adulators allege, willing to confess his errors, or even to be silent about them—to refrain from injudiciously vindicating his Canadian policy, and from claiming merit and triumph from it—the Reformers, having security for the future, may probably grant him indemnity for the past.

Notwithstanding the zeal and industry of the precarary, Mr Wakefield, and the tact and address of the "re-Durhamizing" journals, the Radical Reformers are anything but alert in hailing as one of their leaders the man who, upon the small capital of three speeches, gained a great reputation for stanch and sterling Liberalism ; and, the moment that his supposed influence at Court gave him the means of performing or of attempting some real service, insolently turned his back upon them, and, by a gratuitous blunder, a piece of inconceivable folly, wrote the memorable epistle to that Mr Bowlby who is now very characteristically employed in getting up addresses of confidence, and "Durham Demonstrations." Those Reformers are worse than besotted who degrade themselves and their cause in this way. Let Lord Durham now Demonstrate. It is his turn. We trusted him, and have been wofully deceived. Let him express his regret and penitence, and he will be forgiven and restored, and taken back at his real value, which we apprehend the world now sees to be something considerably less than that at which he rates himself. We claim to have equally good, or better opportunities of knowing the state of public feeling than those who, in interested newspapers, and at abortive meetings, would represent the people as in a state of idiotic excitement and enthusiasm, about Lord Durham, the ex-Radical, ex-Ambassador, ex-Dictator. It is a palpable mistake. The people are not such gulls. Russia, Canada, and the Bowlby manifesto, are not so easily forgotten. If Sir William Molesworth, a young and amiable man, but an inexperienced politician, has been influenced to compromise his reputation in one rash letter, the acuteness of Colonel Thompson, of whose truth and earnestness no man doubts, furnishes the antidote. The Reformers will not precipitate themselves into another snare, even before the former Whig swindle is fairly consummated.

What have the few Reformers who have been congregated about Lord Durham by his precursors yet gained ? The noble Earl, most unguarded in the expression of personal resentment, has been studiously cautious not to commit himself to the cause of reform, in his late progress. The pointed insult of refusing the ex-Dictator gunpowder at Plymouth, did produce a faint reverberation of his great Glasgow guns, along with those strains of self-laudation which so well became him, immediately on his landing ; and a clap-trap about "ships, colonies, and commerce," which shewed his high opinion of the understanding of the parties whom he addressed ; or else, incredible ignorance of the feelings of the Reformers on his Canadian policy and conduct.

It is the more needful to warn a handful of heedless Radicals against degrading themselves to gain Lord Durham, that we are assured, by a very competent authority in this case, that his Lordship utterly despises us ; and that, as he cut us dead when we courted him on his hasty return from St Petersburg in 1837, so will he again upon his equally abrupt return from Canada. The Examiner, long Lord Durham's vassal, and now the vassal of Lord Melbourne, assures us that he understands his former patron better than the pitiful Radicals can do ; and that what his Lordship told Mr Bowlby then, he is ready to say again. This may be true, and it may not. Lord Durham in his present trim may be obtainable ; but the question becomes, on what terms is he worth having ? Is he not likely to be more a hindrance than a help ? This discussion may, however, be very safely deferred until it is seen what he will do. He is in the use of issuing Bowlby manifestoes and Canadian proclamations : let him issue one now, telling us what he will do for us ; on what terms he will negotiate ; on what principle—not to be abandoned when it becomes convenient to his Lordship to make his peace with the Court—he is willing to take his stand among our leaders, with or under the Broughams, Humes, O'Connells, Wards, Leaders, Roebucks, Thompsons, Attwoods, Harveys, Wakleys ; and, in brief, every able public man who is willing to forget the past, to make manly and magnanimous sacrifices of small objects, and unite for the energetic promotion of the common cause.

To close this subject : If Lord Durham, without requiring farther cajolery and flattery, choose to come manfully forward, and declare for Household Suffrage, Triennial Parliaments, and the Ballot—his principles avowed at Glasgow—we shall be content, in the meanwhile, with earnest efforts to procure so valuable an instalment, and not press him hard on the question of the Church, Hereditary Legislators, Primogeniture, or even the Corn-Laws. But “the Durham policy” must be immediate. For all that his Lordship has ever volunteered, the country is now more than ripe—it is impatient. The toes of the Universal Suffrage multitudes already gall the kibes of the more cautious Reformers. We give his Lordship one more month of grace, and pray him to make good use of it in redeeming himself and serving his country. He has tried the Whigs ; he has tried the Court. If he choose frankly to throw himself upon the rational Reformers with repentance and earnest endeavour, we give him a cordial welcome back ; and promise that all that is past shall be buried in oblivion.

Waiving our doubts and fears, and assuming that Lord Durham is the high-minded patriot which his friends and his Tail represent him, he will come promptly forward, in the face of an imminent and inevitable crisis, and, sinking all merely personal resentments and grievances, remembering that it is his own Whig allies and his own political blunders that have injured him, cordially co-operate with the other Reform leaders. Acting in this spirit, we should deem Lord Durham a valuable accession to the national cause—a cause most hopeful, even at this its seemingly lowest ebb, could its true friends be fused into one compact body. The imminent danger of the immediate accession of the Tories, must alarm the Irish Members, who should either at once leave the British Parliament, or, in future sessions, be less exclusively Irish, and more wise and liberal in their policy, viewing the interests of the empire as indivisible.

Before the imbecile and dishonest Whigs shall have finished their four years' swindle, and evacuated on terms—handing over Court and country to the Tories, when no longer able to keep them for themselves—there is time for the Reform leaders, now divided into twenty jealous carping factions, to throw their pitiful quarrels, and more pitiful personal objects, hostilities, and hobbies, to the winds. It is still quite practicable, that a powerful, because united, phalanx might, on the meeting of Parliament, oppose a front before which the insidious enemy would quail. It is evident that the Tories are by no means easy—the thing is not yet quite ripe. The Registration Courts have not been sufficiently worked, and there is a wild spirit abroad, and an up-heaving under-current, the force of which is not easily calculated. The real reforming party has nothing whatever to lose by the accession of the Tories, and much to gain from the adherence of a great number of the present ministerialists in the cities and boroughs. The Tories will scarcely hazard a dissolution ; they will prefer to experiment with the Whig-Melbourne Parliament, if they must prematurely come forward, lest better men step in. Already the Reform leaders possess every element necessary to carry on the government of the country, save one, union ; and, we sadly fear, those magnanimous qualities necessary to insure union :—a pure and elevated patriotism—a proud and generous humility—that hearty good-will which would make each man cheerfully carry a halbert, if there be no truncheon for him. Without union and harmonious action among themselves, how can they obtain either respect or confidence from the nation ? How should the Tories be asked to place faith in men whom their own friends distrust ? Not the vainglorious personage who, like Alexander, if he reign, must reign alone, and suffer no rival near him—not the self-seeker—not the merely ambitious man—not the pragmatist doctrinaire, is the Man for the Time.

In confessing to this want of union and concentration of purpose among our so-called leaders, we make a sweeping abatement from their capacities, either for carrying forward the Government efficiently, or constituting a formidable Opposition. Place and power, once attained, of themselves form, no doubt, a powerfully coherent principle ; but not such a one as it is desirable to see forming the cement of a Reform Ministry ; and the country has a right to see how the new order of men can bear themselves in a properly disciplined Opposition, before they obtain rule. Will they justify the faith which Reformers place in them, by exhibiting, in the coming session, the spectacle of a hearty, generous, and wise co-operation ? If they shall, they may defy the Tories, as they have demolished the Whigs.

MRS JAMESON'S WINTER STUDIES AND SUMMER RAMBLES IN CANADA.*

POLITICIANS, and those who expect to peruse a history of the discontents and troubles in Canada, from the pen of an intelligent eye-witness, may be disappointed in this work; but to every other class of readers, five minutes will dispel the illusory notion conveyed by the title; and they will find that, if not what they expected, they have stumbled upon a lively, graceful, and picturesque book of random sketches, interspersed with gems of feminine wisdom, coloured by womanly sensibility. The present work proves, as we think, that the authoress has gained a much more wide and commanding range of observation and reflection, than was indicated by any of her former elegant performances. Yet, happily, she is not didactic; she does not preach, nor philosophize, nor tire, nor bore her readers with self-consequence, and solemn consciousness of some vast mission to humanity, committed to the special care of Mrs Jameson. One brief and pregnant paragraph, or a single incidental sentence, will open up a train of thought, on subjects influencing and tainting society to its core; subjects upon which men who can think and feel, will not speak; and from which nearly all women, shutting their eyes in disgust, turn away shuddering and loathing; hastily covering the foul and noisome eating cancer, which they would fain forget, as they have neither hope to effect its cure, nor courage to make the attempt. What a dismal picture does this lady give of the condition of all women in civilized life, and of their sexual relations, whether legitimate or illegitimate! The condition of her Indian squaws seems enviable in the comparison. In one place, she says—"I have not often in my life met with contented and cheerful-minded women; but I never met with so many repining and discontented women as in Canada. I never met with one woman recently settled here, who considered herself happy in her new home and country. I heard of one, and, doubtless, there are others; but they are exceptions to the general rule." Mrs Jameson herself is, we fear, no exception. She does not pretend it. She states her grievances frequently and piteously; and really interests the sympathies of her readers, were it but by the frankness of her murmurings. Though she dwells much on her personal sufferings, from the extreme rigour of the climate, and the social and physical discomforts of a new and ill-concocted society, she seldom adverts to personal history. Her husband, it is known, obtained an appointment in Upper Canada; and his accomplished lady, an Irishwoman by birth and by character, appears to have followed him, about the close of 1836. Dates are not given of any year; though the months are noted. She travelled alone, in the very heart of a severe winter, from New York to Toronto, suffering much from the cold, but more from the roads, during six days and three nights; and, in the last days of December, was flung, half dead, into a steamer at Queenston, making a last trip to the capital, Toronto.

How long I slept I knew not: they roused me suddenly to tell me we were at Toronto; and, not very well able to stand, I hurried on deck. The wharf was utterly deserted, the arrival of the steam-boat being accidental and unexpected; and as I stepped out of the boat, I sank ankle-deep into mud and ice. The day was intensely cold and damp; the sky lowered sulkily, laden with snow, which was just beginning to fall. Half-blinded by the sleet driven into my face and the tears which filled my eyes, I walked about a mile through a quarter of the town mean in appearance, not thickly inhabited, and to me, as yet, an unknown wilderness; and through dreary, miry ways, never much thronged, and now, by reason of the impending snow-storm, nearly solitary. I heard no voices, no quick footsteps of men or children; I met no familiar face, no look of welcome. I was sad at heart as a woman could be—and these were the impressions, the feelings, with which I entered the house which was to be called my home!

These are chilling and melancholy first impressions; and we see nothing save the influences of time which could materially soften them. The excessive cold alone must have been dreadful to a woman of delicate habits. She says, with vivacity which mocks her complaints—

I could almost wish myself a dormouse, or a she-bear, to sleep away the rest of this cold, cold winter, and wake only with the first green leaves, the first warm breath of the summer wind. I shiver through the day and through the night; and, like poor Harry Gill, "my teeth they chatter, chatter still;" and then at intervals I am burned up with a dry hot fever: this is what my maid, a good little Oxfordshire girl, calls the hager, (the ague) more properly the lake fever, or cold fever. From the particular situation of Toronto, the disorder is very prevalent here in the spring: being a stranger, and not yet acclimatée, it has attacked me thus unseasonably. Bark is the general and unfailing remedy.

The cold is at this time so intense that the ink freezes while I write, and my fingers stiffen round the pen; a glass of water by my bed-side, within a few feet of the hearth, (heaped with logs of oak and maple kept burning all night long,) is a solid mass of ice in the morning. God help the poor emigrants who are yet unprepared against the rigour of the season!—yet this is nothing to the climate of the lower province, where, as we hear, the thermometer has been thirty degrees below zero. I lose all heart to write home.

The Assembly was then sitting, discussing, among lesser matters, one branch of that plague of the whole world in one form or another, the Church Question—the appropriation of the clergy reserves, for which, in Canada, Episcopalians and Presbyterians, Catholics and Methodists, are scrambling; while the Liberal and rational party would leave the clergy to Voluntary support, as in the United States, and devote the entire produce of the appropriated lands to education. Though all the members of Assembly are not accomplished readers and spellers themselves, they wish, it would appear, to secure a good education to their children—certainly no proof of their ignorance, however slender may be their scholarship.

A great part of this work is filled with reminiscences of Germany, criticism, and speculation on German dramas, and other matters quite foreign to Canada, though perhaps bearing closely on the means of filling three volumes. These matters we lay aside, though they make pleasant literary readings. One of the first excursions made by the authoress was to the Falls of Niagara, and in January. She wished that she had left the cataract to imagination. She was frozen, chilled in fancy, disappointed. The country was a wide snowy waste—the parlour of her little shabby inn heated like an oven—and that New Amadis, "Don Juan," lying open on its face, for the winter entertainment of the inmates of "Oakville House Hotel."

In a few weeks, the stranger began to look more calmly around her, and to be more reasonable in her expectations. A city forty years since a swamp, and which only took form after the last American war, could not be expected to possess the accommodations and agrémens of London; though it is accused of possessing all the evils, with few of the advantages, of the home-system of town life.

It is curious enough to see how quickly a new fashion, or a new folly, is imported from the old country, and with what difficulty and delay a new idea finds its way into the heads of the people, or a new book into their hands. Yet, in the midst of all this, I cannot but see that good spirits and corrective principles are at work; that progress is making: though the march of intellect be not here in double quick time, as in Europe, it does not absolutely stand stock-still.

There reigns here a hateful factious spirit in political matters, but for the present no public or patriotic feeling, no recognition of general or generous principles of policy: as yet I have met with none of these. Canada is a colony, not a country; it is not yet identified with the dearest affections and associations, remembrances and hopes of its inhabitants: it is to them an adopted, not a real mother. Their love, their pride, are not for poor Canada, but for high and happy England; but a few more generations must change all this.

Canada will never be prosperous and peaceful until it be a country. The effects of colonial government in a province seem as ruinous as the management of middle-men on an absentee's estate. Mrs Jameson describes the Tories as the ascendancy party, who enjoy all the power and patronage; the Whigs as their rivals; and the Radicals—but we shall give them at first-hand.—"Another set are the Radicals, whom I generally hear mentioned as 'those scoundrels,' or 'those rascals,' or with some epithet expressive of the utmost contempt and disgust. They are those who wish to see this country erected into a republic, like the United States. A few among them are men of talent and education; but at present they are neither influential nor formidable." The immense inferiority of the colony to the opposite frontier, in enterprise, improvement, and prosperity, visible at a glance to every traveller, is dwelt upon at some length by Mrs Jameson. But the cause? That must not be investigated. It cannot be because Canada is a distant colony? The morale of the population seems as inferior as the cultivation of the soil, when compared with the United States. Drunkenness is a more general vice in Canada than in the States, and, where indulged, is carried to far greater excess. Toronto is the polished capital of Upper Canada, and morals and manners would seem there equally low.

With the interminable forests within half a mile of us—the haunt of the red man, the wolf, the bear—with an absolute want of the means of the most ordinary mental and moral development, we have here conventionalism in its most oppressive and ridiculous forms. If I should say, that at present the people here want cultivation, want polish, and the means of acquiring either, that is natural—is intelligible—and it were unreasonable to expect it could be otherwise; but if I say they want honesty, you would understand me, they would not; they would imagine that I accused them of false weights and cheating at cards. So far they are certainly "indifferent honest" after a fashion; but never did I hear so little truth, nor find so little mutual benevolence. And why is it so?—because in this place, as in other small provincial towns, they live under the principle of fear—they are all afraid of each other, afraid to be themselves; and where there is much fear, there is little love, and less truth.

Is there no one who will bring a few grains of truth to Toronto?

We have noticed that insulated thoughts and passages on social morals, and the condition and relations of woman, legitimate and illegitimate, form the gems of this work. In one place, when speculating upon the doctrine of expediency, or acquiescence in a small injustice to attain an imagined general good, the authoress remarks:—

We women have especial reason to exclaim against this principle. We are told openly by moralists and politicians, that it is for the general good of society, nay, an absolute necessity, that one-fifth part of our sex should be condemned as the legitimate prey of the other, pre-doomed to die in reprobation, in the streets, in hospitals, that the virtue of the rest may be preserved, and the pride and the passions of men both gratified. But I have a bitter pleasure in thinking that this most base, most cruel conventional law is avenged upon those who made and uphold it; that here the sacrifice of a certain number of one sex to the permitted license of the other is no general good, but a general curse—a very ulcer in the bosom of society.

The subject is a hateful one—more hateful is it to hear it sometimes alluded to with sneering levity, and sometimes waved aside with a fastidious or arrogant prudery. Unless we women take some courage to look upon the evil, and find some help, some remedy within ourselves, I know not where it is to come from.

A common story of seduction follows; such a story as may, in every year and month, find hundreds of parallels. The close of it is deeply tragic. An English officer, whose companion told Mrs Jameson the tale, seduced a girl from her family in Lower Canada. She passed from one keeper to another, and, finally, the wretched creature came to London, where her original seducer, who had left the army, also was.

While he was roaming about London, amusing himself as young men are wont to do after a long absence from the central mart of pleasure and dissipation, he betook himself one evening, after a tavern dinner, to some house of infamous resort, and one of the wretched women of the establishment was sent to him as a companion. As she entered the room, S. started from the sofa to encounter, in the impudent, degraded, haggard, tawdry thing before him, the poor child who had been his victim in Canada. But long years of vice and misery had not yet utterly hardened her. They stood face to face for a few seconds, and looked in silence upon each other, (and who can tell what in those few seconds may have passed through the minds of each?) and then the miserable girl fell senseless on the floor.

He raised her up, and, in the remorse and agony of the moment, offered her all he had in the world;—poor, poor compensation! He urged her return to Canada:—he would pay all her expenses—place her beyond the reach of want—but it was all in vain.

After the first burst of feeling was over, the wretched girl shook him from her with sullen scorn and despair, and not only refused to return to the home she had disgraced, but even to accept from him anything whatever—and thus she left him. He it was—himself—who described the scene to F.

"Poor fellow!" said F., in conclusion, "he did not recover it for a long time—he felt it very much!"

Poor fellow!—and yet he was to be pitied; he did not make the system under which he was educated.

"What became of Captain S.?" I asked.

"Oh, he married well; he is now a very respectable and excellent man—father of a family."

"He has children, then?"

"Yes; several."

"Daughters?"

"Yes."

"No doubt," thought I, "he will take care of them."

No; there is no salvation for women but in ourselves: in self-knowledge, self-reliance, self-respect, and in mutual help and pity; no good is done by a smiling abuse of the "wicked courses" of men, while we trample into irrecoverable perdition the weak and erring of our own sex.

The sum of Mrs Jameson's demands, as a "first instalment" of the Rights of Women, is that "they shall be left, in all cases, responsible for their own actions and their own debts," having also, we presume, first obtained power and independence commensurate with that of their present masters and legislatures. She approves and eulogizes that provision of the Poor-Law Act which makes women the sole guardians of their own honour and chastity, and, she might have added, of the virtue of the nobler sex also—a provision which leaves this unmitigated responsibility, not alone upon women like the well-protected daughters of such persons as Captain S.—triple fenced by education, custom, the experience and vigilance of their friends, and the usages of society—but upon the whole lower order of uninstructed and unprotected females, maid-servants, parish girls, and factory girls, upon creatures vain and ignorant, exposed to temptation in every form, and unguarded by opinion, if not rather deemed the natural prey of licentiousness. Mrs Jameson indeed laments that the legal liabilities should fall on the least guilty, and shews her courageous good feeling, by affirming that it will be the duty of those women who take a generous and extended view of the whole question, to soften the horrors that will ensue, by individual acts of mercy, "for the next few years," until all comes right, and the elevation of the one sex, we presume, shall regenerate both. Let it be so, and we shall rejoice. It is not a little singular that this discussion in Mrs Jameson's book arises from a bill then before the Assembly, for the provision for natural children by their supposed fathers, and that it originated in that Legislative Council where Sir Francis Head was endeavouring to enact a law which he had shortly before openly condemned in the mother country, in his flippant writings, and as a poor-law commissioner. Having by this new and satisfactory English law provided for one of the many evils to which society is heir, and of which women are the especial victims, another almost equally appalling and universal mischief remains, which Mrs Jameson states strongly, without, however, openly suggesting a remedy. This is matrimonial infelicity. In travelling with the Bishop of Michigan, a young prelate of the United States, with a diocese of 800 miles in length, and 400 in breadth, and probably a very narrow revenue, the conversation took a turn which brought out facts that struck the authoress very much.

In conversing with him and the missionaries on the spiritual and moral condition of his diocese, and these newly settled regions in general, I learned many things which interested me very much; and there was one thing discussed which especially surprised me. It was said that two-thirds of the misery which came under the immediate notice of a popular clergyman, and to which he was called to minister, arose from the infelicity of the conjugal relations; there was no question here of open immorality and discord, but simply of infelicity and unfitness. The same thing has been brought before me in every country, every society in which I have been a sojourner and an observer; but I did not look to find it so broadly placed before me here in America, where the state of morals, as regards the two sexes, is comparatively pure; where the marriages are early, where conditions are equal, where the means of subsistence are abundant, where the women are much petted and considered by the men—too much so.

For a result then so universal, there must be a cause or causes as universal, not depending on any particular customs, manners, or religion, or political institutions. And what are these causes? Many things do puzzle me in this strange world of ours—many things in which the new world and the old world are equally incomprehensible. I cannot understand why an evil everywhere acknowledge and felt is not remedied somewhere, or discussed by some one, with a view to a remedy; but no—it is like putting one's hand into the fire, only to touch upon it; it is the universal bruise, the putrefying sore, on which you must not lay a finger, or your patient (that is, society) cries out and resists, and, like a sick baby, scratches and kicks its physician.

Strange, and passing strange, that the relation between the two sexes, the passion of love in short, should not be taken into deeper consideration by our teachers and our legislators. People educate and legislate as if there was no such thing in the world; but ask the priest, ask the physician, let them reveal the amount of moral and physical results from this one cause. Must love be always discussed in blank verse, as if it were a thing to be played in tragedies or sung in songs—a subject for pretty poems and wicked novels, and had nothing to do with the prosaic current of our every-day existence, our moral welfare, and eternal salvation? Must love be ever treated with profaneness, as a mere illusion? or with coarseness, as a mere impulse? or with fear, as a mere disease? or with shame, as a mere weakness? or with levity, as a mere accident? Whereas, it is a great mystery and a great necessity, lying at the foundation of human existence, morality, and happiness; mysterious, universal, inevitable as death. Why then should love be treated less seriously than death? It is as serious a thing. Love and death, the alpha and omega of human life, the author and finisher of existence, the two points on which God's universe turns; which He, our Father and Creator, has placed beyond our arbitration—beyond the reach of that election and free will which He has left us in all other things! Death must come, and love must come—but the state in which they find us, whether blinded, astonished, and frightened, and ignorant, or, like reasonable creatures, guarded, prepared, and fit to manage our own feelings?—this, I suppose, depends on ourselves; and for want of such self-management and self-knowledge, look at the evils that ensue!—hasty, improvident, unsuitable marriages; repining, diseased, or vicious celibacy; irretrievable infamy; cureless insanity.

Mrs Jameson would seem to be a fatalist in love. A man can, it is very true, meet death but once; but there may be, we cannot presume to guess how many “real true loves” in most men's lives; and, we suspect, in some women's too. Could we be once quite assured as to the genuine symptoms of the one real love, of the grand passion, which is as sure to come as death itself, it would be more easy to legislate on this delicate subject.

We doubt the true love of the foolish and enthusiastic girl mentioned by Mrs Jameson—who some years ago made so great a sensation by bestowing her hand and fortune on the Red Indian missionary, Peter Jones, and devoting herself to love in a wigwam—has not been the one love which comes as certainly as death; for it has not, even with the fear of the laugh against her, enabled Mrs Jones to act her part as a squaw, although she became such of her own free choice. “She has quitted her village, to return to Europe.” Nor are we surprised. Mrs Jameson saw the station which Mrs Jones had abandoned, when on a visit to an interesting family of settlers, of whom the father had named his romantic residence Erindale, from fond recollection of his native country. It is situated on the Credit River. Few Canadian scenes are so rationally pleasing as this:—

Mr M——* is the clergyman and magistrate of the district, beside being the principal farmer and land proprietor. His wife, sprung from a noble and historical race, blended much sweetness and frankheartedness, with more of courtesy and manner than I expected to find. My reception was most cordial, though the whole house was in unusual bustle, for it was the 4th of June, parade day, when the district militia were to be turned out; and two of the young men of the family were buckling on swords and accoutrements, and furnishing up helmets, while the sister was officiating with a sister's pride at this military toilette, tying on sashes and arranging epaulettes; and certainly, when they appeared—one in the pretty green costume of a rifleman, the other all covered with embroidery as a captain of lancers—I thought I had seldom seen two finer-looking men. After taking coffee and refreshments, we drove down to the scene of action.

On a rising ground above the river which ran gurgling and sparkling through the green ravine beneath, the motley troops, about three or four hundred men, were marshalled—no, not marshalled, but scattered in a far more picturesque fashion hither and thither: a few log-houses and a saw-mill on the river-bank, and a little wooden church crowning the opposite height, formed the chief features of the scene.

Some had firelocks; some had old swords, suspended in belts, or stuck in their waistbands; but the greater number shouldered sticks or umbrellas. Mrs M—— told us that on a former parade day she had heard the word of command given thus—“Gentlemen with the umbrellas, take ground to the right! Gentlemen with the walking-sticks, take ground to the left!” Now they ran after each other, elbowed and kicked each other, straddled, stooped, chattered; and if the commanding officer turned his back for a moment, very coolly sat down on the bank to rest. Not to laugh was impossible, and defied all power of face. Charles M. made himself hoarse with shouting out orders which no one obeyed, except, perhaps, two or three men in the front; and James, with his horsemen, flourished their lances, and galloped, and capered, and curveted to admiration. James is the popular storekeeper and postmaster of the village, and when, after the show, we went into his warehouse to rest, I was not a little amused to see our captain of lancers come in, and, taking off his plumed helmet, jump over the counter to serve one customer to a “penny-worth of tobacco,” and another to a “yard of check.” Willy, the younger brother, a fine young man, who had been our cavalier on the field, assisted; and, half in jest, half in earnest, I gravely presented myself as the purchaser of something or other, which Willy served out with a laughing gaiety and unembarrassed simplicity quite delightful. We returned to sit down to a plain, plentiful, and excellent dinner; every thing on the table, the wine excepted, was the produce of their own farm. Our wine, water, and butter were iced, and everything was the best of its kind.

The next morning I looked out from my window upon a scene of wild yet tranquil loveliness. The house is built on the edge of a steep bank, (what in Scotland they term a scour,) perhaps a hundred feet high, and descending precipitously to the rapid river. The banks on either side were clothed with overhanging woods of the sumach, maple, tamarack, birch, in all the rich yet delicate array of the fresh opening year. Beyond, as usual, lay the dark pine-forest; and near to the house there were several groups of lofty pines, the original giant-brood of the soil; beyond these again lay the “clearing.” The sky was without a cloud, and the heat intense. I found breakfast laid in the verandah: excellent tea and coffee, rich cream, delicious hot cakes, new-laid eggs—a banquet for a king! The young men and their labourers had been out since sunrise, and the younger ladies of the house were busied in domestic affairs; the rest of us sat lounging all the morning in the verandah; and in the intervals of sketching and reading, my kind host and hostess gave me an account of their emigration to this country ten years ago.

Mr M. was a Protestant clergyman of good family, and had held a considerable living in Ireland; but such was the disturbed state of the country in which he resided, that he was not only unable to collect his tithes, but for several years neither his own life nor that of any of his family was safe. They never went out unarmed, and never went to rest at night without having barricaded their house like a fortress. The health of his wife began to fail under this anxiety, and, at length, after a severe struggle with old feelings and old habits, he came to the determination to convert his Irish property into ready money, and emigrate to Canada, with four fine sons from seven to seventeen years old, and one little daughter. Thus you see that Canada has become an asylum, not only for those who cannot pay tithes, but for those who cannot get them.

Soon after his arrival, he purchased eight hundred acres of land along the banks of the Credit. With the assistance of his sons and a few labourers, he soon cleared a space of ground for a house, in a situation of great natural beauty, but then a perfect wilderness; and with no other aid designed and built it in very pretty taste. Being thus secure of lodging and shelter, they proceeded in their toilsome work—toilsome, most laborious, he allowed it to be, but not unrewarded; and they have now one hundred and fifty acres of land cleared and in cultivation; a noble barn, entirely constructed by his sons, measuring sixty feet long by forty in width; a carpenter's shop, a turning-lathe, in the use of which the old gentleman and one of his sons are very ingenious and effective, a forge, extensive outhouses, a farmyard well stocked, and a house comfortably furnished, much of the ornamental furniture being contrived, carved, turned, by the father and his sons. These young men, who had received in Ireland the rudiments of a classical education, had all a mechanical genius, and here, with all their energies awakened, and all their physical and mental powers in full occupation, they are a striking example of what may be done by activity and perseverance; they are their own architects, masons, smiths, carpenters, farmers, gardeners; they are, moreover, bold and keen hunters, quick in resource, intelligent, cheerful, united by strong affection, and doting on their gentle sister, who has grown up among these four tall, manly brothers, like a beautiful azalia under the towering and sheltering pines. Then I should add, that one of the young men knows something of surgery, can bleed or set a broken limb in case of necessity; while another knows as much of law as enables him to draw up an agreement, and settle the quarrels, and arrange the little difficulties of their poorer neighbours, without having recourse to the "attorney."

The whole family appear to have a lively feeling for natural beauty, and a taste for natural history; they know the habits and the haunts of the wild animals which people their forest domain; they have made collections of minerals and insects, and have "traced each herb and flower that sips the silvery dew." Not only the stout servant girl, (whom I met running about with a sucking-pig in her arms, looking for its mother,) and the little black boy Alick, but the animals in the farmyard, the old favourite mare, the fowls which come trooping round the benignant old gentleman, or are the peculiar pets of the ladies of the family,—the very dogs and cats appear to me, each and all, the most enviable of their species.

Mr M. told me that for the first seven or eight years they had all lived and worked together on his farm; but lately he had reflected that though the proceeds of the farm afforded a subsistence, it did not furnish the means of independence for his sons, so as to enable them to marry and settle in the world. He has therefore established two of his sons as storekeepers, the one in Springfield, the other at Streetsville, both within a short distance of his own residence; and they have already, by their intelligence, activity, and popular manners, succeeded beyond his hopes.

This sensible resolution galled the pride of the well-born Irish gentleman, and some lingering of "the old Adam," made him attempt excuses for the degradation of his boys selling out groceries in a Canadian village. His sensible country-woman sympathized, not with his national prejudices, but with his good sense, in providing for the future independence of his sons.

Happily for the reading world and herself, Mrs Jameson formed the design of going farther west than ever white woman did before who has the same power of telling the tale of her adventures. She has performed another feat, which beats all former fair travellers: she passed over the falls of St. Mary in an Indian canoe, and has been adopted into the Chippewa tribe in consequence of her heroism. Dr Johnson has somewhere said that travelling in France or Italy was nothing, as these countries were but a worse sort of England; but that in the Hebrides, he had got many new ideas of life. So has Mrs Jameson among the Indians. On this tour she was quite alone. In reaching the steamer, Michigan, she visited Buffalo, in which she found several good booksellers' shops, filled with cheap editions of English publications, "generally of a trashy kind." Like most professional authors, she is a warm friend to the authors' monopoly; and would settle the matter at once, by a sweeping international act.

In travelling from the Falls of Niagara to Hamilton by the stage-coach, she had the misfortune to have, for a companion, a young and uncommonly handsome man, "beastly drunk." The adventure was not pleasant, though, we fear, that the same thing might have happened in "the old country," once or oftener in the course of the life of those who travel by the stage-coach. Many pleasing little snatches of manners and sketches of scenery occur as the route is pursued to the far-famed Talbot Settlement, the adventurous lady having resolved to beard the old lion, Colonel Talbot, in his den. At one place, an Irish farmer, dining at the inn where she halted, offered her a glass, from his travelling store of genuine potheen, which "had never seen God's beautiful world nor the blessed day, since it was bottled in ould Ireland." The traveller passed through the Oxford of the new world; a little village, with the usual saw-mill, grocery-store, and tavern, and a dozen Shanties, congregated on the banks of the stream. Of London, the site of which was once fixed upon for the capital of the province, the first house was built in 1827. Its central position in the midst of the three lakes, Erie, Ontario, and Lake Huron, presents many advantages. The Thames, on which it stands, is navigable for boats and barges, and London already contains 1300 inhabitants. It boasts a jail and court-house, five churches, three schools, and seven taverns. The population is chiefly artisans; and the traveller fears that there is a good deal of drunkenness and profligacy. Besides the supply of spirits in the taverns, the grocery stores elude the law against selling whisky. Mrs Jameson saw a district magistrate carried off the pavement dead drunk. Here women of the better class bitterly lament the want of respectable society; and those in the interior are condemned to entire solitude, and generally spend their lives in discontent, from, as it appears to us, sheer idleness. Mrs Jameson says truly, that "a woman who cannot perform for herself and others all household offices, has no business here," in the bush; and, in effect, that a healthy, reasonable woman, who brings cheerful good-will to the discharge of her duties, may be as happy in Canada as anywhere in the world.

After remaining a short time at London, the tourist pushed on to Talbot country, which stretches along the shores of Lake Erie.

Towards the end of the last century, Colonel Talbot, then a very young man, was aid-de-camp to Governor Simcoe, whom he accompanied on surveying expeditions of a country which then contained not one white inhabitant, except along the borders, and on the shores opposite Detroit. The Six Nations were then settled on the Grand River, with a few wandering tribes of Hurons and Chippewas. Here Colonel Talbot resolved to form a colony; and he accordingly obtained a grant of 100,000 acres on the shores of Lake Erie, on condition of planting a settler on every 200 acres. He subsequently was appointed sole commissioner in colonizing a large tract of country. He has effected wonders in colonizing; but his life has been no child's play. He has himself put his shoulder to the wheel; and he has also demonstrated what may be done by energy, unremitting perseverance, and wholesome discipline. Let us cite Mrs Jameson's report of the "eccentric" Colonel Talbot, a high-born Irish gentleman—who, more flattering still, "must have been very handsome when young," and who is remarkable for his resemblance to the royal family, and, in particular, to the late King William. Well, it is a matter of taste this same personal beauty, and we defer to the lady; who, by the way, in another well-turned compliment, appropriates to Dick Talbot, (Duke of Tyrconnel,) a repartee on the subject of royal resemblances, which is usually attributed to the Earl of Stair.

Of the life he led for the first sixteen years, and the difficulties and obstacles he encountered, he drew, in his discourse with me, a strong, I might say a terrible picture: and observed that it was not a life of wild wandering freedom—the life of an Indian hunter, which Dr Dunlop says, is so fascinating, that "no man who has followed it for any length of time, ever voluntarily returns to civilized society!" Colonel Talbot's life has been one of persevering, heroic self-devotion to the completion of a magnificent plan, laid down in the first instance, and followed up with unflinching tenacity of purpose. For sixteen years he saw scarce a human being, except the few bores and blacks employed in clearing and logging his land: he himself assumed the blanket-coat and axe, slept upon the bare earth, cooked three meals a day for twenty woodmen, cleaned his own boots, washed his own linen, milked his cows, churned the butter, and made and baked the bread. In this latter branch of household economy he became very expert, and still piques himself on it.

To all these heterogeneous functions of sowing and reaping, felling and planting, frying, boiling, washing, wringing, brewing, and baking, he added another, even more extraordinary;—for many years he solemnised all the marriages in his district!

His continual quarrels with the successive governors, who were jealous of the independent power he exercised in his own territory, are humorously alluded to by Dr Dunlop.

"After fifteen years of unremitting labour and privation," says the Doctor, "it became so notorious in the province, that even the executive government at Toronto became aware that there was such a place as the Talbot Settlement, where roads were cut and farms in progress; and hereupon they rejoiced, for it held out to them just what they had long felt the want of—a well-settled, opened, and cultivated country, wherein to obtain estates for themselves, their children, born and unborn, and their whole kith, kin, and allies. When this idea, so creditable to the paternal feelings of these worthy gentlemen, was intimated to the Colonel, he could not be brought to see the fitness of things in an arrangement which would confer on the next generation, or the next again, the fruits of the labour of the present; and accordingly, though his answer to the proposal was not couched in terms quite so diplomatic as might have been wished, it was brief, soldier-like, and not easily capable of misconstruction; it was in these words—"I'll be d—d if you get one foot of land here;" and thereupon the parties joined issue."

Colonel Talbot has fought a tough battle, but he has conquered. His homestead or chateau is picturesque, and, in one sense, patriarchal. Colonel Talbot is a generous despot, but still a despot. He likes no gentlemen settlers, nor will he permit any settlements within a certain distance of himself. As his power is absolute, he compels conformity with his regulations.

The land under his superintendence is divided into lots of 200 acres, 150 sold at three dollars per acre, and 50 given gratis. Each settler must clear and sow ten acres, build a log-house, and form one chain of road in front of his house in three years, on pain of forfeiture. "He never associates with the people except on one grand occasion, the anniversary of the foundation of his settlement. This is celebrated at St Thomas by a festive meeting of the most respectable settlers, and the Colonel himself opens the ball with one of the ladies, generally shewing his taste by selecting the youngest and prettiest." So many stories are circulated about the woman-hating, or woman-shunning Colonel, who, for many years, had permitted no female near his dwelling, that poor Mrs Jameson, who was not sure of her welcome, began to lose heart; altogether, as, after a weary day's jolting in a cart—which sort of vehicle was often the only conveyance she could obtain—darkness and the dwelling of the man of the woods came together. Fortunately, a person was met near the house, who informed her that the Colonel expected a lady "who had come over the sea to visit him." She was at once relieved. Lights were gleaming in the distant windows, and, as her carriage drew up, the gallant and much belied Colonel sallied out to receive her. She says—"My welcome was not only cordial, but courtly. The Colonel, taking me under his arm, and ordering the boy and his horses to be well taken care of, handed me into the hall or vestibule, where sacks of wheat and piles of sheep-skins lay heaped in primitive fashion; thence into a room, the walls of which were formed of naked logs." Her conversations with this eccentric recluse, if not important, are entertaining. Most she marvelled at his stoical indifference to those mighty events which had shaken Europe, and the whole world, since he had betaken himself to the wilderness. Though vowed, like St Kevin or St Oran, we presume, against the womankind, they have been too many for him. His favourite servant, after enduring celibacy for twenty-five years, married at last; and there is now his wife, and a little child also, running about at its pleasure.

The Colonel has made different trips to England during his long period of sequestration, to bombard the Colonial Office; and has generally carried his points.

Mrs Jameson departed as she came, in a cart. Her postilion, with a nate Kerry brogue, had not one Irish feature in his face; and it was found that his grandfather had been a Frenchman. What an endless variety of cross-breeds are and will be in America! The driver and owner of the cart, had a farm of a hundred and sixty acres, and has cleared one hundred of it; for which, together with a log-house and barn, he had paid about £200. It was a grazing farm, which is rare in those parts, and his wife sold a good deal of butter and cheese at Port Stanley, one of Colonel Talbot's towns. We have this passing glimpse of the condition of Scottish Highland emigrants—

The road continued very tolerable during the greater part of this day, running due west, at a distance of about six or ten miles from the shore of Lake Erie. On either side I met a constant succession of farms partially cleared, and in cultivation; but no village, town, or hamlet. One part of the country through which I passed to-day is settled chiefly by Highlanders, who bring hither all their clanish attachments, and their thrifty, dirty habits—add also their pride and their honesty. We stopped about noon at one of these Highland settlements, to rest the horses and procure refreshments. The house was called Campbell's Inn, and consisted of a log-hut and a cattle-shed. A long pole, stuck into the decayed stump of a tree in front of the hut, served for a sign. The family spoke nothing but Gaelic; a brood of children, ragged, dirty, and without shoes or stockings, (which latter I found hanging against the wall of the best room, as if for a show,) were running about—and all stared upon me with a sort of half-scared, uncouth curiosity, which was quite savage. With some difficulty I made my wants understood, and procured some milk and Indian corn cakes. This family, notwithstanding their wretched appearance, might be considered prosperous. They have a property of two hundred acres of excellent land, of which sixty acres are cleared, and in cultivation; five cows, and forty sheep. They have been settled here sixteen years,—had come out destitute, and obtained their land gratis. For them, what a change from abject poverty and want, to independence and plenty! But the advantages are all outward; if there be any inward change, it is apparently retrogradation, not advancement.

The cart driver had thirty cows and eighty sheep. The wolves commit depredations on the flocks during winter; they appear almost the same animal as the Australian dog, and hunt in packs. Bears are hunted; and deer are still so plentiful in Upper Canada, that venison is common food in cottages and farm houses, and sells cheaply in the towns. Some of the inhabitants of the forest are even in a worse condition than these dirty inmates of Campbell's Inn, who yet probably call cousins with Maccaillain More. After having read the following passage, we begin to understand the advantages, so apt to be forgotten, of manufacturing towns:—

Here, where a small population is scattered over a wide extent of fruitful country, where there is not a village or a hamlet for twenty, or thirty, or forty miles together—where there are no manufactories—where there is almost entire equality of condition—where the means of subsistence are abundant—where there is no landed aristocracy—no poor laws, nor poor rates, to grind the souls and the substance of the people between them, till nothing remains but chaff,—to what shall we attribute the gross vices, the profligacy, the stupidity, and basely vulgar habits of a great part of the people, who know not even how to enjoy or to turn to profit the inestimable advantages around them?—And, alas for them! there seems to be no one as yet, to take an interest about them, or at least infuse a new spirit into the next generation. In one log-hut in the very heart of the wilderness, where I might well have expected primitive manners and simplicity, I found vulgar finery, vanity, affectation, under the most absurd and disgusting forms, combined with a want of the commonest physical comforts of life, and the total absence of even elementary knowledge. In another I have seen drunkenness, profligacy, stolid indifference to all religion; and in another, the most senseless fanaticism. There are people, I know, who think—who fear, that the advancement of knowledge and civilisation must be the increase of vice and insubordination; who deem that a scattered agricultural population, where there is a sufficiency of daily food for the body; where no schoolmaster interferes to infuse ambition and discontent into the abject, self-satisfied mind; where the labourer reads not, writes not, thinks not—only loves, hates, prays, and toils—that such a state must be a sort of Arcadia. Let them come here!—there is no march of intellect here!—there is no "Schoolmaster abroad" here! And what are the consequences? Not the most agreeable to contemplate, believe me.

I passed in these journeys some school-houses built by the wayside: of these several were shut up for want of schoolmasters; and who that could earn a subsistence in any other way, would be a schoolmaster in the wilds of Upper Canada? Ill fed, ill clothed, ill paid, or not paid at all—boarded at the houses of the different farmers in turn, I found indeed some few men, poor creatures! always either Scotch or Americans, and totally unfit for the office they had undertaken.

She calls for missionaries of education and religion; and for social amusements, and innocent excitement, in place of whisky and camp meetings. With all its drawbacks, the country is advancing. The post-mistress of Howard township, who six years ago drew only ten dollars a quarter, now draws above forty; and yet postage is so high that poor emigrants are often unable to redeem their letters.

Mrs Jameson spent some time in conversing with the Moravian Missionary, settled among the tribe of Delaware, located near Chatham on the river Thames. The tribe had about 100,000 acres of the richest soil in the province ceded to them, of which the Lieutenant-Governor has lately purchased 25,000, for the very reasonable quit-rent of £150 a-year for ever. The tribe were not unanimous in this bargain. One hundred and fifty Delaware were in the minority. The forever is likely to be of short duration, as the Delaware are expected to move on before the inroads of civilization, and some have already gone off far west. How does the Government permit such acts in its functionaries? Those Delaware who objected to the sale (as it is called) of their hunting grounds, are also about to move westward, accompanied by some of their missionaries. It is painful as hopeless to contemplate the condition and prospects of the Indian tribes throughout Canada; and humiliating, indeed, to think that their moral degradation is principally owing to their intercourse with the Whites, as their total extinction will be at last.

With shame and pain may we all read this sentence:—"Wherever the Christian comes, he brings the Bible in one hand, disease, corruption, and the accursed fire-water, in the other; or, flinging down the book of peace, he boldly and openly proclaims that might gives right, and substitutes the sabre and the rifle for the slower desolation of starvation and whisky."

We cannot be satisfied with the grounds upon which Mrs Jameson grounds her fanciful opinion of the Indians being an untameable race. The same thing has been said of the painted Britons, more recently of the wild Irish and the wilder Highlanders; but all were found perfectly tameable where there were time, motive, and fair play. These requisites will never be found for Indians in Canada. One of her own notes is the best refutation of her opinion which can be given:—

When General Wayne (1794) destroyed the settlements of the Wyandots and Miamis along the Miami river, and on the south shores of Lake Erie, he wrote thus in his official despatch:—"The very extensive and cultivated fields and gardens shew the work of many hands. The margins of those beautiful rivers, the Miami of the lake and Au Glaize, appear like one continued village for a number of miles, both above and below this place. Nor have I ever beheld such immense fields of corn in any part of America, from Canada to Florida." And all this fair scene was devastated and laid waste! and we complain that the Indians make no advance in civilisation!

Mrs Jameson proceeded to Detroit in one of the small lake steamers. She was accompanied by the Moravian missionaries and their families, who were about to emigrate with the Delewares beyond the Missouri. They are descended of the early German Moravians, but appear to be natives of the country. They were not prepossessing companions. In the steerage were some Scotch and Irish emigrants of the lowest grade, and a patriarchal family of Vermonters on their way to the Illinois, and already eleven weeks on the route. They had two covered waggons, a yoke of oxen, and a pair of horses. The patriarch from Vermont led out into the wilderness fifteen children, by three wives. The group is cleverly painted. All attempts at conversation with them were unsuccessful. The father was rude, the children shy, and the third wife sickly and melancholy. The following sketch is in a happier tone—and why force those gay Habitans to become sulky Vermonters?—

The banks of the Thames are studded with a succession of farms, cultivated by the descendants of the early French settlers—precisely the same class of people as the Habitans in Lower Canada. They go on exactly as their ancestors did a century ago, raising on their rich fertile lands just sufficient for a subsistence, wholly uneducated, speaking only a French patois, without an idea of advance or improvement of any kind; submissive to their priests, gay, contented, courteous, and apparently retaining their ancestral tastes for dancing, singing, and flowers.

In the midst of half-dilapidated, old-fashioned farm-houses, you could always distinguish the priest's dwelling, with a flower-garden in front, and the little chapel or church, surmounted by a cross,—both being generally neat, clean, fresh-painted, and forming a strange contrast with the neglect and slovenliness around.

We stopped half way down the river to take in wood. Opposite to the landing-place stood an extensive farm-house, in better condition than any I had yet seen: and under the boughs of an enormous tree, which threw an ample and grateful shade around, our boat was moored. Two Indian boys, about seven or eight years old, were shooting with bow and arrows at a mark stuck up against the huge trunk of the tree. They wore cotton shirts, with a crimson belt round the waist ornamented with beads, such as is commonly worn by the Canadian Indians; one had a gay handkerchief knotted round his head, from beneath which his long black hair hung in matted elf locks on his shoulders. The elegant forms, free movements, and haughty indifference of these Indian boys were contrasted with the figures of some little dirty, ragged Canadians, who stood staring upon us with their hands in their pockets, or importunately begging for cents. An Indian hunter and his wife, the father and mother of the boys, were standing by, and at the feet of the man a dead deer lay on the grass. The steward of the boat was bargaining with the squaw for some venison, while the hunter stood leaning on his rifle, haughty and silent. At the window of the farmhouse sat a well-dressed female, engaged in needlework. After looking up at me once or twice as I stood upon the deck gazing on this picture—just such a one as Edwin Landseer would have delighted to paint—the lady invited me into her house; an invitation I most gladly accepted. Everything within it and around it spoke riches and substantial plenty; she shewed me her garden, abounding in roses, and an extensive orchard, in which stood two Indian wigwams. She told me that every year families of Chippewa hunters came down from the shore of Lake Huron, and encamped in her orchard, and those of her neighbours, without asking permission. They were perfectly inoffensive, and had never been known to meddle with her poultry, or injure her trees. "They are," said she, "an honest, excellent people; but I must shut the gates of my orchard on them to-night—for this bargain with your steward will not conclude without whisky, and I shall have them all ivres mort before to-morrow morning. I passed half-an-hour in pleasant conversation with this lady, who had been born, educated, and married in the very house in which she now resided. She spoke English well and fluently, but with a foreign accent, and her deportment was frank and easy, with that sort of graceful courtesy which seems inherent in the French manner, or used to be so. On parting, she presented me with a large bouquet of roses, which has proved a great delight, and served all the purposes of a fan. Nor should I forget that in her garden I saw the only humming birds I have yet seen in Canada: there were two lovely little gem-like creatures disporting among the blossoms of the scarlet-bean. They have been this year less numerous than usual, owing to the lateness and severity of the spring. The day has been most intolerably hot; even on the lake there was not a breath of air. But as the sun went down in his glory, the breeze freshened, and the spires and towers of the city of Detroit were seen against the western sky. The schooners at anchor, or dropping into the river—the little canoes flitting across from side to side—the lofty buildings—the enormous steamers—the noisy port, and busy streets, all bathed in the light of a sunset such as I had never seen, not even in Italy—almost turned me giddy with excitement.

In rambling about Detroit, the traveller saw more of the Habitans. One day she was sitting under a tree, speculating upon the causes of the evident superiority visible in all things on the American side of the river—

When an old French Canadian stopped near me to arrange something about his cart. We entered forthwith into conversation; and, though I had some difficulty in making out his patois, he understood my French, and we got on very well. If you would see the two extremes of manner brought into near comparison, you should turn from a Yankee storekeeper to a French Canadian; it was quite curious to find in this remote region such a perfect specimen of an old-fashioned Norman peasant—all bows, courtesy, and good-humour. He was carrying a cart-load of cherries to Sandwich; and when I begged for a ride, the little old man bowed and smiled, and poured forth a voluble speech, in which the words enfant! honneur! and madame! were all I could understand; but these were enough. I mounted the cart, seated myself in an old chair surrounded with baskets heaped with ripe cherries. After permission asked, and greeted with a pleasant smile and a hundredth removal of the ragged hat, I failed not to profit by my situation, and dipped my hand pretty frequently into these tempting baskets. When the French penetrated into these regions a century ago, they brought with them, not only their national courtesies, but some of their finest national fruits—plums, cherries, apples, pears, of the best quality—excellent grapes too, I am told—and all these are now grown in such abundance as to be almost valueless. For his cart-load of cherries my old man expected a sum not exceeding two shillings.

The traveller was charmed with Detroit, which is, comparatively, an ancient and venerable city, that has suffered many of the vicissitudes of war in its time. Five or six newspapers are published in Detroit alone, and forty-two steamers touch at it. At the library Mrs Jameson borrowed some books; and though the "gentleman" who kept it neither moved his hat from his head, nor bowed at her entrance, he would receive no remuneration for the use of his books from "a lady and a stranger." Every country has its own way of expressing civility, and this was no doubt meant for high courtesy, and accordingly accepted as such. At Detroit Mrs Jameson heard the Baptist preacher, after praying for all men of all conditions, including the King of Great Britain, manage most adroitly with the President:—"The suppliant besought the Almighty, that 'if Mr Van Buren were a good man, he might be made better, and if a bad man, he might be speedily regenerated.'"

Mrs Jameson had previously made a hasty but delightful acquaintance with a very interesting woman, a half-blood Indian, the wife of Mr MacMurray, a missionary to the Chippewas, settled at Sault Ste. Marie. She had been invited to visit them at their far distant station, on the River St Mary, between Lake Huron and Lake Superior; and had conceived so strong a desire to move westward, and see wild Indians in their primitive condition, that she resolved to proceed, and get, at all events, as near them as possible. Her chosen companion and guide was the Travels of Henry, who had, seventy years before, when the Red Man was more in his primeval state, been a fur trader on the Lakes. In steaming along to St Clair River, she had the gratification of seeing groups of Hurons and Saginaws; and, after a night of deadly seasickness, if we may call it so, at dawn opened her eyes on that exquisitely lovely island of Mackinaw, which so enraptures poetical travellers. Here we have a sun-rise which may almost rival Byron's Italian sun-set, when

"The moon is up, and yet it is not night."

We were lying in a tiny bay, crescent-shaped, of which the two horns or extremities were formed by long narrow promontories projecting into the lake. On the east, the whole sky was flushed with a deep amber glow, flickered with softest shades of rose-colour—the same intense splendour being reflected in the lake; and upon the extremity of the point, between the glory above and the glory below, stood the little missionary church, its light spire and belfry defined against the sky. On the opposite side of the heavens hung the moon, waxing paler and paler, and melting away, as it seemed, before the splendour of the rising day. Immediately in front rose the abrupt and picturesque heights of the island, robed in richest foliage, and crowned by the lines of the little fortress, snow-white, and gleaming in the morning light. At the base of these cliffs, all along the shore, immediately on the edge of the lake, which, transparent and unruffled, reflected every form as in a mirror, an encampment of Indian wigwams extended far as my eye could reach on either side. Even while I looked, the inmates were beginning to bestir themselves, and dusky figures were seen emerging into sight from their picturesque dormitories, and stood gazing on us with folded arms, or were busied about their canoes, of which some hundreds lay along the beach.

There was not a breath of air; and while heaven and earth were glowing with light, and colour, and life, an elysian stillness, a delicious balmy serenity, wrapt and interfused the whole. Oh, how passing lovely it was! how wondrously beautiful and strange! I cannot tell how long I may have stood, lost, absolutely lost, and fearing even to wink my eyes, lest the spell should dissolve, and all should vanish away like some air-wrought phantasy.

The more mundane and solid affair of breakfast which follows, is equally good in its way. At Mackinaw, the Indian agent of the United States is Mr Schoolcraft, the author of a well-known book of travels in these regions. He is married to an elder sister of Mrs MacMurray. Mrs Jameson, who, luckily for her readers, is more enterprising than timidly considerate, knew nothing of this family, and was afraid that the MacMurrays, on their way to the Far West, might not even have mentioned her—that she might, in short, be an intruder, de trop, especially as the lady to whom she came a volunteer guest, was indisposed. She was, however, very kindly received, became much attached to her interesting hostess, and diligently cultivated an intimate acquaintance with the Indians then at Mackinaw. This portion of her book is exceedingly interesting, from the artistical style in which the Red Men are represented, though much information is not longer to be expected from such accidental or flying guests to wigwams, as English ladies must, of necessity, be. Mrs Jameson had, however, the advantage of being present at "a talk" between the Indians and Mr Schoolcraft, at which the brother of Mrs Schoolcraft acted as interpreter.

About twenty of their principal men, including a venerable old chief, were present; the rest stood outside, crowding the doors and windows, but never attempting to enter, nor causing the slightest interruption. The old chief wore a quantity of wampum, but was otherwise undistinguished, except by his fine head and acute features. His grey hair was drawn back, and tied on the top of his head with a single feather. All, as they entered, took me by the hand with a quiet smile and a "bojou," to which I replied as I had been instructed, "Bojou, neje!" (good-day, friend!)

After some whispering among themselves, an orator of the party addressed Mr Schoolcraft with great emphasis. Extending his hand, and raising his voice, he began: "Father, I am come to tell you a piece of my mind." But when he had uttered a few sentences, Mr Schoolcraft desired the interpreter to tell him that it was useless to speak farther on that subject, (I understood it to relate to some land-payments.) The orator stopped immediately, and then, after a pause, he went up and took Mr Schoolcraft's hand with a friendly air, as if to shew he was not offended. Another orator then arose, and proceeded to the object of the visit, which was to ask an allowance of corn, salt, and tobacco, while they remained on the island—a request which I presume was granted, as they departed with much apparent satisfaction.

There was not a figure among them that was not a study for a painter; and how I wished that my hand had been readier with the pencil to snatch some of those picturesque heads and attitudes!

Of another "talk" she says—

There were fifty-four of their chiefs, or rather chief men, present, and not less than two hundred Indians round the house; their dark, eager faces filling up the windows and doorways; but they were silent, quiet, and none but those first admitted attempted to enter. All as they came up, took my hand: some I had seen before, and some were entire strangers; but there was no look of surprise, and all was ease and grave self-possession: a set of more perfect gentlemen, in manner, I never met with.

Fresh parties of Indians, of different tribes, were arriving at this island every day. It seems to have been a rendezvous for them on their route to the Manitoolin Islands, to receive the presents annually distributed by the British Government to those tribes who had been our "allies" during the American war. Some of them make a voyage of 500 miles to receive a few blankets and kettles. They paddle all day, and at night "camp out" on the shores, subsisting on the parched Indian corn and bear's fat which they bring along with them, and the fish and game they can find. This annual expedition occupies from six weeks to two months of what to civilized men is the busiest season of the year. It may be doubted whether the gratuities received prove benefits.

Mrs Schoolcraft was proud of her Indian origin, and took an enthusiastic and enlightened interest in the improvement of her race; yet she spoke of them in a melancholy spirit, as if she considered them a doomed race. Many beautiful traits of character are related of these noble savages—of their high sense of personal dignity, and the strength of their domestic affections. It has often been said that the Indians are insensible to the romance, the enthusiasm—shall we say, the virtue?—of the passion of love. The following little anecdote, while it exhibits the actual condition of the squaws to be one of greater comparative social elevation than is generally imagined, proves that there may be red, as well as black and white Sapphos.

Some time ago, a young Chippewa girl conceived a violent passion for a hunter of a different tribe, and followed him from his winter hunting-ground to his own village. He was already married, and the wife, not being inclined to admit a rival, drove this love-sick damsel away, and treated her with the utmost indignity. The girl, in desperation, offered herself as a slave to the wife, to carry wood and water, and lie at her feet—anything to be admitted within the same lodge, and only look upon the object of her affection. She prevailed at length. Now, the mere circumstance of her residing within the same wigwam made her also the wife of the man, according to the Indian custom; but apparently she was content to forego all the privileges and honours of a wife. She endured, for several months, with uncomplaining resignation, every species of ill usage and cruelty on the part of the first wife, till at length this woman, unable any longer to suffer even the presence of a rival, watched an opportunity as the other entered the wigwam with a load of fire-wood, and cleft her skull with the husband's tomahawk.

"And did the man permit all this?" was the natural question.

The answer was remarkable. "What could he do? He could not help it: a woman is always absolute mistress in her own wigwam!"

Mrs Jameson's greatest feat in voyaging was still to be performed. She set off one day impromptu for Sault Ste. Marie in a little Canadian bateau; and, all at once, her friend Mrs Schoolcraft resolved to accompany her on a visit to her Indian mother. At night they "camped out," and by day rowed on, exactly as in the ante-steam]age of the Canadian lakes. The mosquitoes bear a peculiar spite to Mrs Jameson; and we have never seen those minute tormentors more feelingly described. She becomes ashamed of so often reverting to this petty but most irritating plague, and breaks off—"Enough of mosquitoes—I will never again do more than allude to them; only they are enough to make Philosophy go hang herself, and Patience swear like a Turk or a trooper." On one side of the river Saint Mary was the mission station of Mr MacMurray; opposite it, the curious homestead of his Indian mother-in-law, O,shah,gush,ko,da,na,qua, alias Mrs Johnston. The strongest inducement which the fair voyager had to come so very far West, was to see in the mother of her two friends a woman of pure Indian blood, and of a race celebrated as warriors and chiefs from generation to generation.

Some forty or more years previously, a young Irishman, in the fur-trade, named Johnston, fell deeply in love with the daughter of the chief Waub Ojeeg.

"White man!" said the chief with dignity, "your customs are not our customs! You white men desire our women, you marry them, and when they cease to please your eye, you say they are not your wives, and you forsake them. Return, young friend, with your load of skins to Montreal, and if there the women with the pale faces do not put my child out of your mind, return hither in the spring, and we will talk farther—she is young, and can wait."

The fairbrown O,shah,gush,ko,da,na,qua meanwhile dreamed that a white man was to be her future husband, and that she was to become a very great woman;—yet, during the negotiation for her hand, reluctance, aversion, and terror at the connexion, were the very natural sentiments of the Chippewa maiden.

On being carried with the usual ceremonies to her husband's lodge, she fled into a dark corner, rolled herself up in her blanket, and would not be comforted, nor even looked upon. It is to the honour of Johnston, that he took no cruel advantage of their mutual position, and that she remained in his lodge ten days, during which he treated her with the utmost tenderness and respect, and sought by every gentle means to overcome her fear and gain her affection; and it was touching to see how tenderly and gratefully this was remembered by his wife after a lapse of thirty-six years. On the tenth day, however, she ran away from him in a paroxysm of terror, and, after fasting in the woods for four days, reached her grandfather's wigwam. Meantime her father, Waub Ojeeg, who was far off in his hunting-camp, dreamed that his daughter had not conducted herself according to his advice, with proper wife-like docility, and he returned in haste two days' journey to see after her; and finding all things according to his dream, he gave her a good beating with a stick, and threatened to cut off both her ears. He then took her back to her husband, with a propitiatory present of furs and Indian corn, and many apologies and exculpations of his own honour. Johnston succeeded at length in taming this shy wild fawn, and took her to his house at the Sault Ste Marie. When she had been there some time, she was seized with a longing once more to behold her mother's face, and revisit her people. Her husband had lately purchased a small schooner to trade upon the lake; this he fitted out, and sent her, with a retinue of his clerks and retainers, and in such state as became the wife of the "great Englishman," to her home at La Pointe, loaded with magnificent presents for all her family. He did not go with her himself, apparently from motives of delicacy, and that he might be no constraint upon her feelings or movements. A few months' residence amid comparative splendour and luxury, with a man who treated her with respect and tenderness, enabled the fair Oshahgush, ko, da, na, qua to contrast her former with her present home. She soon returned to her husband, and we do not hear of any more languishing after her father's wigwam. She lived most happily with Johnston for thirty-six years, till his death, which occurred in 1828; and is the mother of eight children, four boys and four girls.

She shewed me her husband's picture, which he brought to her from Montreal; the features are very gentleman-like. He has been described to me by some of my Canadian friends, who knew him well, as a very clever, lively, and eccentric man, and a little of the bon vivant. Owing to his independent fortune, his talents, his long acquaintance with the country, and his connexion by marriage with the native blood, he had much influence in the country.

This Indian lady inherits the poetical talent of her father Waub-Ojeeg, though we must say that an allegory of hers, translated to Mrs Jameson by her daughter, so closely resembles Mrs Barbauld's allegory of the Seasons, that the coincidence could hardly be accidental. A large tract of Sugar Island is her property, and she manufactures maple sugar upon a scale which astonishes us. "Three thousand five hundred cwt. of sugar of excellent quality," manufactured in the season when Mrs Jameson visited her, must render the chieftainess the very Mrs Coutts of the Indians—though it is probable there is some mistake as to the quantity.

In the fall, she goes up with her people in canoes to the entrance of Lake Superior, to fish in the bays and creeks for a fortnight, and comes back with a load of fish cured for the winter's consumption. In her youth she hunted, and was accounted the surest eye and fleetest foot among the women of her tribe. Her talents, energy, activity, and strength of mind, and her skill in all the domestic avocations of the Indian women, have maintained comfort and plenty within her dwelling in spite of the losses sustained by her husband, while her descent from the blood of their ancient chiefs renders her an object of great veneration among the Indians around, who, in all their miseries, maladies, and difficulties, apply to her for aid or for counsel.

Some Chippewa songs and legends are introduced, from the free translations of Mrs Jameson's amiable semi-Indian female friends; and many fine traits of native character are noticed. Mr Schoolcraft, who has been twenty-five years an agent to the Indians from the States, said, that he had never known them break a promise or violate a treaty; which is pretty considerably more than, in relation to Indians, can be averred of the Government for which he acts.

Mrs Jameson, we have intimated,

"Has some stout notions on the marrying score."

She considers the condition of the squaws, relatively to the state of the society in which they live, as better than that of her own fair countrywomen; and goes far to make out her case. The Indian girl would, in the first place, seem to have the sole power of accepting or rejecting her lover. If she or her relations are propitious, all that remains is to carry her home to his lodge. "He neither swears before God to love her till death—an oath which it depends not on his own will to keep, even if it be not perjury in the moment it is pronounced—nor to endow her with all his worldly goods and chattels, when even by the act of union she loses all right of property; but apparently the arrangements answer all purposes, to their mutual satisfaction." She denies that the men treat the women as "slaves," "drudges," or "beasts of burthen," or that they are so further than the true and natural position of women in such a state of society makes them. The next argument is of larger scope, and equally cogent:—

When we speak of the drudgery of the women; we must note the equal division of labour; there is no class of women privileged to sit still while others work. Every squaw makes the clothing, mats, moccasins, and boils the kettle for her own family. Compare her life with the refined leisure of an elegant woman in the higher classes of our society, and it is wretched and abject; but compare her life with that of a servant-maid of all work, or a factory girl—I do say that the condition of the squaw is gracious in comparison, dignified by domestic feelings, and by equality with all around her. If women are to be exempted from toil in reverence to the sex, and as women, I can understand this, though I think it unreasonable; but if it be merely a privilege of station, and confined to a certain set, while the great primeval penalty is doubled on the rest, then I do not see where is the great gallantry and consistency of this our Christendom, nor what right we have to look down upon the barbarism of the Indian savages who make drudges of their women.

I will just mention here the extreme delicacy and personal modesty of the women of these tribes, which may seem strange when we see them brought up and living in crowded wigwams, where a whole family is herded within the space of a few yards; but the lower classes of the Irish, brought up in their cabins, are remarkable for the same feminine characteristic: it is as if true modesty were from within, and could hardly be outwardly defiled.

But to return. Another boast over the Indian savages in this respect is, that we set a much higher value on the chastity of women. We are told (with horror) that among some of the north-west tribes the man offers his wife or sister, nothing loath, to his guest, as a part of the duty of hospitality; and this is, in truth, barbarism!—the heartless brutality on one side, and the shameless indifference on the other, may well make a woman's heart shrink within her. But what right have civilised men to exclaim, and look sublime and self-complacent about the matter? If they do not exactly imitate this fashion of the Indians, their exceeding and jealous reverence for the virtue of women is really indulged at a very cheap rate to themselves. If the chastity of women be a virtue, and respectable in the eyes of the community for its own sake, well and good; if it be a mere matter of expediency, and valuable only as it affects property, guarded by men just as far as it concerns their honour—as far as regards ours, a jest—if this be the masculine creed of right and wrong—the fiat promulgated by our lords and masters, then I should be inclined to answer, as the French girl answered the Prince de Conti, "Pour Dieu! monseigneur, votre altesse royale est par trop insolente!" There is no woman, worthy the name, whose cheek does not burn in shame and indignation at the thought.

Such women as those poor, perverted, sacrificed creatures who haunt our streets, or lead as guilty lives in lavish splendour, are unknown among the Indians.

With regard to female right of property, there is no such thing as real property among them, except the hunting-grounds or territory which are the possession of the tribe. The personal property, as the clothing, mats, cooking and hunting apparatus—all the interior of the wigwam, in short—seems to be under the control of the woman; and, on the death of her husband, the woman remains in possession of the lodge, and all it contains, except the medal, flag, or other insignia of dignity, which go to his son or male relatives. The corn she raises, and the maple sugar she makes, she can always dispose of as she thinks fit—they are hers.

Here is matter to give us pause. The ladies are getting too many for us. They seem determined that, since we must needs be the lords, they shall be the ladies of the creation, every inch of it. They claim no privileges—they stand on right. Whatever judgment may be formed of the bold opinions we have just quoted, Samuel Johnson's ghost, we believe, would give it wholly against Mrs Jameson. What follows is worthy of earnest consideration :—

Until of late years there was no occupation for women by which a subsistence could be gained, except servitude in some shape or other. The change which has taken place in this respect is one of the most striking and interesting signs of the times in which we live. I must stop here : but do you not think, from the hints I have rather illogically and incoherently thrown together, that we may assume as a general principle, that the true importance and real dignity of woman is everywhere, in savage and civilised communities, regulated by her capacity of being useful; or, in other words, that her condition is decided by the share she takes in providing for her own subsistence and the well-being of society as a productive labourer? Where she is idle and useless by privilege of sex, a divinity and an idol, a victim or a toy, is not her position quite as lamentable, as false, as injurious to herself and all social progress, as where she is the drudge, slave, and possession of the man?

The two extremes in this way are the Indian squaw and the Turkish sultana; and I would rather be born the first than the last; and to carry out the idea, I would rather, on the same principle, be an Englishwoman or a Frenchwoman, than an American or a German woman—supposing that the state of feeling as regards women were to remain stationary in the two last countries—which I trust it will not.

Mrs Jameson left the Sault Ste. Marie and her Chippewa mother's house in sadness. She went to the Manitoolin Islands with Mr and Mrs MacMurray, for the purpose of observing more of Indian life and manners. They made the voyage of 170 miles in a bateau, "camping out" as before. The crew were admirably assorted. "They were all Canadian voyageurs of the true breed—that is, half-breed—showing the Indian blood as strongly as the French. Pierrot, worthy his name, was a most comical fellow; Masta, a great talker, amused me exceedingly; Content was our steersman and captain; and Le Blanc, who was the best singer, generally led the song, to which the others responded in chorus."

The voyage was full of stirring incident, and is most picturesque in all its details. On the first night forty-five miles had been made.

In the evening we came to an island consisting of a flat ledge of rock, on which were the remains of a former camp-fire, surrounded by tall trees and bushes: here we pitched our little marquée, and boiled our kettle. We made our beds by spreading mats and blankets under us; and then, closing the curtain of the tent, Mr MacMurray began a very effective slaughter and expulsion of the mosquitoes. We laid ourselves down, Mrs MacMurray in the middle, with her child in her bosom; Mr MacMurray on one side, myself at the other, and the two Indian girls at our feet; the voyageurs, rolled in their blankets, lay upon the naked rock round the fire we had built, and thus we all slept. I must needs confess that I found my rocky bed rather uneasy, and my bones ached as I turned from side to side; but this was only a beginning. The night was close and sultry, and just before dawn I was awakened by a tremendous clap of thunder.

The next morning was beautiful; the sun shone brightly, though the lake was yet heaving and swelling from the recent storm—altogether it was like the laughing eyes and pouting lips of a half-appeased beauty. About nine o'clock we ran down into a lovely bay, and landed to breakfast on a little lawn surrounded by high trees and a thick wood, abounding in rattlesnakes and squirrels. Luckily for us, the storm had dispersed the mosquitoes.

Keeping clear of the covert, to avoid these fearful snakes, I strayed down by the edge of the lake, and found a tiny creek, which answered all purposes, both of bath and mirror, and there I arranged my toilette in peace and security. Returning to our breakfast-fire, I stood some moments to admire the group around it—it was a perfect picture: there lay the little boat rocking on the shining waves, and near it Content was washing plates and dishes; Pierrot and Masta were cooking; the two Indian girls were spreading the tablecloth on the turf. Mrs MacMurray and her baby—looking like the Madonna and child in the "Repose in Egypt"—were seated under a tree; while Mr MacMurray, having suspended his shaving-glass against the trunk of a pine, was shaving himself with infinite gravity and sang-froid. Never, I think, were the graceful, the wild, the comic, so strangely combined!—add the rich background of mingled foliage, the murmur of leaves and water, and all the glory of a summer morning!—it was very beautiful!

We breakfasted in much mirth, and then we set off again.

This was a voyage worth making. Who would voyage by steamers or Indiamen with such a mode of conveyance in their power? At another halting-place, they came upon the wrecks of an Indian tribe.

A number of little Red-aksins were running about, half, or rather indeed wholly naked—happy, healthy, active, dirty little urchins, resembling, except in colour, those you may see awarming in an Irish cabin. Poor Ireland! The worst Indian wigwam is not worse than some of her dwellings; and the most miserable of these Indians would spurn the destiny of an Irish poor-slave—for he is at least lord o'er himself. . . . While they pitched the marquee, I stood for some time looking at a little Indian boy, who, in a canoe about eight feet in length, was playing the most extraordinary gambols in the water; the buoyant thing seemed alive beneath him, and to obey every movement of his paddle. He shot backwards and forwards, described circles, whirled himself round and round, made pirouettes, exhibited, in short, as many tricks as I have seen played by a spirited English boy on a thorough-bred pony.

The mosquitoes were in great force, but we began by sweeping them out of the tent with boughs, and then closing the curtain, we executed judgment on the remainder by wholesale. We then lay down in the same order as last night; and Mrs MacMurray sang her little boy to sleep with a beautiful hymn. I felt all the luxury of having the turf under me instead of the rock.

From a schooner on the lake they demanded news, and learned that William the Fourth was dead, and that Queen Victoria reigned in his stead! Of that Princess the voyager says—"And what a fair heritage is this which has fallen to her! A land young like herself—a land of hopes—and fair, most fair! Does she know—does she care anything about it?"

while hearts are beating warm for her, and voices bless her—and hands are stretched out to tend her, even from these wild lake shores!”

The Manitoolin islands are to the Indians sacred places. The name signifies “the dwelling of spirits.” Three thousand seven hundred persons had assembled there to receive the annual gift of their “Great Mother, across the Salt Lake,” to her red children. Mingled with the Indians was an Englishman of family, settled up the lake, who had brought down his brace of Indian mistresses to receive their share of the presents, to which he might fancy them doubly entitled, in virtue of his aristocratic blood.

There is a man here, an Englishman, settled up the lake somewhere, who has a couple of Indian mistresses, and has brought them down to receive their presents. He is a man of noble family, and writes honourable before his name. He swaggers about in a pair of canvas trousers and moccasins, a check shirt with the collar open, no cravat, a straw hat stuck on the side of his head, and a dirty pipe in his mouth. He had a good fortune, and an honourable station in society; the one was wasted in excesses, and the other he has disgraced and abandoned. His countenance and his whole deportment conveyed an impression of reckless profligacy, of folly, weakness, and depravity, inexpressibly disgusting. There is no ruffian like the ruffian of civilised life. I turned from this man to my painted, half-naked Pottowatomies with a sense of relief.

She had in her lake voyage passed the Island of St Joseph, in the interior of which is an English settlement, and a village of Indians. Here the principal proprietor, a patriarchal “Major R—,” a magistrate and justice of the peace, has two Indian women, sisters, living with him, and a family by each.

Seeing so much of missionaries, the Canadian traveller naturally inquired into the practical results of their labours.

“The English Church,” said one of our most intelligent Indian agents, “either cannot or will not, certainly does not, sow, therefore cannot expect to reap.” The zeal, activity, and benevolence of the travelling missionary Elliott are beyond all praise; but his ministry is devoted to the back settlers more than to the Indians. The Roman Catholic missions have been, of all, the most active and persevering; next to these the Methodists. The Presbyterian and the English Churches have been hitherto comparatively indifferent and negligent.”

Father Crue is a Roman Catholic missionary, stationed at Manitoolin Island; but, as Major Anderson, the Indian agent there, observed, he was “always on the go, up the lakes and down, wherever he had hope of being useful.” He is a zealous, active man, of whose interference the Churchmen and Methodists complain; but of whom, if Mrs Jameson’s information be correct, true Christians cannot complain.

One thing is most visible, certain and undeniable, that the Roman Catholic converts are, in appearance, dress, intelligence, industry, and general civilization, superior to all the others.

A band of Ottawas, under the particular care of Father Crue, have settled on the Manitoolin, about six miles to the south. They have large plantations of corn and potatoes, and they have built log-huts, a chapel for their religious services, and a house for their priest. I asked him distinctly whether they had erected these buildings themselves: he said they had.

The voyage down the lake, in a birch-bark canoe, after Mrs Jameson had parted from her returning friends, and was again alone among men and strangers, is, if possible, more beautiful and picturesque than her previous voyage. Well is she entitled to say, that the Roman Emperor, who proclaimed a reward for a new pleasure, should have made a voyage down Lake Huron in a birch-bark canoe. She wonders that the gentry in London, looking as if they would give an empire for a sensation, do not go there. If epicures, they could eat white fish and beaver tails; if sportsmen, it is the sportsman’s paradise. This same white fish, found in its full perfection in Lake St Clair, would seem to drive Mr Stuart’s and Captain Hamilton’s canvass-back ducks fairly out of the market. Mrs Jameson is inapproachable in novel luxuries and dainties, as in everything else.

A painful account is given of the condition of the commuted pensioners, of whom eight hundred reached Upper Canada, though only one hundred and fifty are now living, some of them begging their bread, or living on public charity.

A few more days restored the adventurous lady safely to her home in Toronto, after spending exactly two months in what she terms her “wild expedition.” It is, however, one on which she must long look back with delight. How much freshness and animation—what an accumulation of new and vivid images—of romance and savagery—does it present, even to the tame fireside reader, five thousand miles away from the scene of her travels! Next to being with Rosalind in the forest of Arden, or with Miranda in her enchanted island, is, for an hour or two, to accompany this imaginative rambler along those wild western lakes, and among those everlasting woods and their ancient Red inhabitants.

“NOT RIPE FOR POLITICAL POWER.”

THE men whose minds move faster than their age,
And faster than society’s dull fight,
You hear the ribald railings and the rage
Of those who lag behind it. As the light
Flies on the horizon’s verge before its might
Can penetrate life’s dark and murky stage;
As the swift Herodias on his pilgrimage
Happily, the source, the fountain bubbling bright;

As the sweet smiles of infants promise youth,
And martyr-sufferings herald sacred truth—

So Thought flung forward is the prophecy
Of Truth’s majestic march, and shews the way
Where future time shall lead the proud array
Of peace, of power, and love of liberty.

JOHN BOWLING.

WAR IN INDIA.

By late accounts from India, we are informed that the utmost alarm prevailed there, and that preparations were being made at all the Presidencies to place the army in a proper state to resist a threatened invasion of the Russians, and also to keep in check the Nepaulese and the Burmese, who were simultaneously preparing to attack our possessions on the east and south-east frontiers. Unfavourable as these accounts are, there is another of a still more gloomy character; it is, that the tributary and dependent states of India, between thirty and forty of which are bound to furnish military aid whenever called upon by the British Government, are conspiring against us, and are prepared to second the designs of Russia, being resolved to seize every chance of freeing themselves from British control, though they should eventually fall under the yoke of Russia. Amongst these, the Rajah of Satarah is particularly mentioned, as being devoted to the interests of Russia. He was formerly the acknowledged legitimate head of the Mahrattas, and, although the other Mahratta chiefs have been compelled to renounce their allegiance to him, it is not unlikely that a common interest will lead them again to unite round him, should the opportunity present itself. But the design of re-establishing the Mahratta power is too hopeless an enterprise to allow us to suppose that the Rajah has been induced, by mere ambitious views, to renounce his allegiance to the British Government. He seems to have been actuated by deadly hatred to the English, to risk his own destruction; and we may imagine how prevalent this feeling is, when it is thus evinced by one who is under peculiar obligations to the British Government. For a long period, the supreme authority of the Mahratta state had been usurped by the Peishwa or Prime Minister, and the Rajah was kept a state-prisoner, and allowed to appear in public only on special occasions. In 1817, the Peishwa organized a confederacy of the Mahratta powers, and, having assembled his troops professedly to assist us in putting down the Pindarries, he treacherously fell upon a small body of the British troops; he then quitted his capital, and carried on a desultory war for several months, taking with him the Rajah of Satarah, and giving orders to put him to death, should there be any danger of his falling into the hands of the English. The Rajah was, however, rescued, and the territories of the Peishwa having been conquered and taken from him, a part thereof, yielding about £200,000 per annum, was conferred upon the Rajah of Satarah. Whether the Rajah has since that time suffered wrongs and indignities which, in his eyes, may amount to a cancelment of former obligations, it is not our object to inquire. Without attempting a justification of his conduct, the inference we would draw from it is, that, if this man, notwithstanding all his obligations, is disaffected to the British Government, how much more likely is that to be the case with others who have not received the same favours? The thralldom in which the native princes are held; the degradation of their authority in the eyes of their subjects; the intermeddling of the British residents in the internal affairs of these states—overruling and opposing the constituted authorities; and the alacrity with which they sacrifice the dearest interests of these states to promote the views of the British Government—are all calculated to render the British hateful both to prince and people.

We need only refer to the opium monopoly, which, about 1820, was established in Malwa; and, although Sir John Malcolm warned the Government, in the following year, that it had “already made an impression not favourable to our interests,” instead of being relinquished, it was extended, and made infinitely more rigorous and oppressive than before. The native princes were compelled to enter into engagements to restrict the cultivation of the poppy in their territories, and to sell the entire produce, at a stipulated price, to the British Government. This price was less than half what might have been obtained for the opium in the open market. The landholder suffered in his rents, the cultivator in his profits, and the merchant in being prohibited from engaging in a lucrative branch of trade, which, instead of enriching the country where it was carried on, was appropriated to the service of a foreign state. But this was not all: in order to maintain the monopoly, to prevent smuggling and illicit cultivation, swarms of British agents and spies were spread over the states, who harassed all classes of the people with their vexatious inquisitions; yet smuggling was carried on to a great extent, and sometimes under the protection of bands of armed men, who set the authorities at defiance, and engaged the Government troops. This oppressive monopoly was persevered in till 1829, when it was perceived by Government that the states affected by it were so greatly exasperated, and the country becoming so disorganized, that it was considered dangerous to prolong it. When we add that the India Government has been blamed for its tenderness to the native states, and its neglect of British interests, by abolishing the monopoly, some idea may be formed of the general nature of our proceedings regarding them. Mr Mill of the India House, in his evidence on the subject, said—“These treaties it has been since thought expedient to give up, on account of a supposed harshness in their operation; a supposition in which I never was able to concur.” Surely all sense of justice must be lost, when acts of such enormous tyranny can be defended, and their supposed harshness denied. This judgment, however, no less than the case to which it refers, will serve in some degree to explain how it is that, in the hour of danger, our allies and dependents are turning against us. It is a melancholy and humiliating reflection that the dominion of England should be thus universally detested by the native powers of India. Often before has the fact been declared ; but while all remained tranquil, while no actual revolt took place or was in preparation, the fact was doubted or disregarded. The system of the home authorities has ever been to stifle inquiry, and to keep the affairs of India in profound obscurity, in order to induce the belief that everything is going on well. We are told of our mild and benevolent government of India scattering benefits on all within its influence ; but, when the hour of danger arrives, when the empire is threatened on all sides by foreign enemies, it can no longer be concealed that our chief danger is from within. And how are we prepared to meet all these difficulties ? Through a short-sighted economy, the army of India has been reduced to an extent which scarce allows it to perform the ordinary duties in the time of peace ; promotion has been stopped, and the European officers rendered discontented and irritated by a reduction of their former allowances ; yet these savings, effected at the hazard of the security of India, have been shamelessly squandered away at home, amongst the jobbers in East India stock and the friends and dependents of the Directors.*

So greatly has the Indian army been reduced, that it is stated, in an Indian newspaper, that the largest force we could now collect for frontier service from Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, could not exceed 60,000 natives, 16,000 Europeans, and 100 guns ; a force quite sufficient, it is added, to beat all our enemies, were they collected in one body, for a regular "stand-up fight," but utterly inadequate to meet the attacks of numerous bodies of light troops, invading, at uncertain intervals, a frontier of many hundred miles in extent. It has been considered necessary to march 30,000 of these troops immediately to the northern frontier, part of whom will enter Cabul or Afghanistan, to secure the country from the Shah of Persia, who has been instigated by Russia to attack it. As this country will soon become the theatre of important events, and many very erroneous accounts have appeared concerning it, we shall give a few particulars, to explain the state of parties there. About the time that the English became masters of Bengal, Ahmed Shah Abdallee, the King of the Affghans, overran the north of India, took possession of Delhi, and almost annihilated the Mahratta army at the celebrated battle of Paniput, in 1761, after which he withdrew to his own country. His grandson, Zemaun Shah, threatening to invade India for several years previous to 1800, Sir John Malcolm was sent to Persia, and he prevailed on the Shah to attack Cabul, which called home Zemaun to protect his own dominions. Soon after his return, a conspiracy was formed against Zemaun Shah, who fell into the hands of his enemies, had his eyes put out, and his brother, Mahmoud, mounted the throne. The latter was opposed by

Shah Soojah, another brother, who also proclaimed himself king ; but he was at last obliged to take refuge with Runjeet Sing ; and eventually both the deposed monarchs, Zemaun and Soojah, retired into the British territories, and for many years received pensions for their support from the British Government. In the meantime, Mahmoud, having put to death his vizier, the chief of a powerful family who had been instrumental to his elevation to the throne, a rebellion was raised. Mahmoud was compelled to fly to Herat, where he became a tributary to Persia, and the rest of the country was split into small principalities and divided amongst the brothers of the murdered vizier. Since that period, the country has been in a very distracted state ; the chiefs have been constantly at variance amongst themselves ; and Runjeet Sing has taken advantage of their weakness to subdue a great part of the country—having acquired Cashmere, Moulton, Peshawur, and other districts. At Mahmoud's death, his son, Prince Kamram, succeeded him at Herat, which is now the only place in Afghanistan in the possession of any branch of the royal family. In 1809, Mr Elphinstone was sent to Cabul, in order to secure the co-operation of that state in repelling a threatened invasion of India by the French. At that time, Shah Soojah was on the throne, and a treaty was entered into with him. Shah Zemaun having been deprived of sight, was thenceforth incapable of reigning ; and Soojah being next in succession, must be considered the legitimate king. He has made two attempts to recover the throne ; at the last, in 1833, Soojah was encouraged by Runjeet Sing, and he accordingly collected a considerable, but very inefficient and disorderly body of troops, with which he entered the country ; but, being defeated at Candahar, he again retired into the British territory. He is now about to be restored to his dominions by the British, who will, no doubt, enter into the same engagements with him as are usual with the other protected states—viz., that a body of British troops shall be permanently stationed in his territories, the expense of whose maintenance shall be provided for by him. It is understood that the rebellious chiefs, and particularly Dost Mahomed Khan, the ruler of Cabul, would willingly have entered into treaties with the English to oppose the Persian army ; but, as this could not be done without giving umbrage to our ally, Runjeet Sing, they joined the Persians in their attempt to reduce Herat. We may hope that, through the mediation of the English, these chiefs may be induced to submit to Shah Soojah, without resorting to hostilities ; and, in that case, the whole force will be directed against Prince Kamram, who, having some pretensions to the throne, a considerable army under his command, and being elated with his late success, is less likely to yield without a struggle. With regard to a Russian invasion of India, though by no means an impossible event, we cannot believe it to be so near at hand as has been represented. It would be a great and hazardous enterprise for any European nation. Russia is proverbially

slow in all her movements, and her preparations must be known long before they could be completed on a scale of any magnitude to promise success; but, besides this, Russia could never expect to derive any advantage from the success of her armies in India, adequate to her loss and expenditure in a protracted war, at so vast a distance from her own frontier. Her chief motive for undertaking such an enterprise, would be to injure England, by depriving us of this source of our power, or by weakening us in our attempts to maintain it. "It must be obvious," says the Marquis of Hastings, "that should any European potentate aim at the subversion of the British establishment in India, it would not be with so absurdly extravagant a hope as the succeeding to a similar domination. To reduce Britain's strength by depriving her of such sinews as India affords, would be the purpose; and the course which would suggest itself for effecting it, would be the exciting some powerful sentiment in India against us." It is perfectly in accordance with these views that Russia, without having any present design of marching an army to India, should threaten us with invasion; that she should even prepare the way, and, by her emissaries, involve us in difficulties, internal and external, that she may impress upon us a sense of our insecurity in India, and render us fearful of thwarting her in her other schemes of aggrandisement. In the event of an invasion, it has been generally supposed that the Russian army will proceed from the Caspian Sea along the valley of the Oxus, and through the fertile countries of Bokhara and Balk. It has been well known that Russian agents have been dispersed over all the neighbouring countries; but it is only within a few years that any attempts have been made by the British Government to inquire into the nature of their proceedings, or to ascertain how far the march of an army by that route was practicable. The result of Lieutenant Burnes' journey to Bokhara in 1831, at length called the attention of Government to this subject, since which time various measures have been adopted to extend our influence to the countries north of the Indus. By treaty with the Government of Sind, a trade has been opened through the whole line of the Indus. Sir J. Burnes has been again sent to the north: a few months ago he was at Cabul, where he found a Russian agent negotiating with Dost Mahomed the ruler. The Russian endeavoured to prejudice Dost Mahomed against the British agent, and obtain his dismissal; but, after some hesitation, the latter was received with favour. Of Runjeet Sing, the ruler of the Punjab, it may be briefly stated, that he is master of a large army, great part of which has been disciplined under French officers: From the station of a petty Sikh chief, he has raised himself to supreme power, and has also made many foreign conquests: he has never been at war with the English, with whom, for some years past, he has been, to all appearance, on a very friendly footing, though it is believed that he regards them secretly with great jealousy. Runjeet Sing occupies the passes through which an invading army would most probably penetrate into India—a circumstance which renders his alliance of the utmost importance to us.

A pamphlet, under the title of "India, Great Britain, and Russia," having appeared just before the news arrived of the probability of our being involved in hostilities in Afghanistan, has excited much attention, from the circumstance of the author having recommended that line of policy which the Indian Government has actually adopted—viz, "to assume the part of a mediator between the different rulers whose dissensions now distract the Afghan territory;" but although the Indian Government has resolved to pursue this course, it has been with views and under circumstances very different from those contemplated by the writer in question: the latter seems inclined to provoke a war with Russia, while the Indian Government has judiciously refrained from any interference in the affairs of Afghanistan, until such a step could be fully justified to all the powers of India, as a measure of strict self-defence against threatened invasion. This pamphlet has been written under great misconception of our actual position in India. For many years past we have been assuring the native powers that we had no wish whatever to extend the British territories—an assertion in which they do not place too much confidence, and which they would wholly disregard, if we were to send our troops into countries beyond the Indus, except under circumstances of the most evident necessity for the defence of India. Sir John Malcolm relates, that when endeavouring to convince the minister of a native prince of our fixed determination not to extend the British territories beyond their present limits, the reply was—"You are no doubt sincere in your professions; but, however, the time will come when there will be but one coinage for all India." We must also refer to our relations with Runjeet Sing, who has been forbidden by us from extending his authority over the Sikh or other chieftains south of the Sutlege, but was, at the same time, allowed, by a tacit or implied agreement, to extend his conquests on the north: for many years he has been appropriating to himself parts of the Afghan territory, taking advantage of the dissensions in that country, and he would not have consented to see it placed under British protection, unless convinced that such a step was requisite to preserve him from some impending danger.

From the north of India we have now to direct our attention to the south, where, at a distance of 1500 miles, another war is impending with the Burmese, while the Ghoorkas of Nepaul are arming themselves as if preparatory to a similar outbreak. The first indication of a rupture with the Burmese was manifested more than a year ago; a revolution took place at Ava, in which the King was deposed and his brother mounted the throne: the usurper promised to spare the lives of his enemies, but he soon began to wreak his vengeance on them, putting them to death with the most horrid barbarity, and doing the same to others, merely for the purpose of extorting their wealth. We have before us a letter from an English merchant, residing at Rangoon, dated July 1837, which says—"The new King has advisers or has sentiments inimical to our prosperity; he disapproves of our resident, Colonel Burney, being at Ava, except on his sufferance, and I have no doubt but we shall find it the best policy to take this country under our protection. Whether or not we merchants will be placed in jeopardy by any premature act of our Government, remains to be proved; the idea of being sawn in two, or tortured to extort money in ways which we daily hear of, has made my blood run cold, and convinced me that it would be an act of mercy to take this country." Though the new King professed a desire to remain at peace with the English, he refused to recognise Colonel Burney, or to receive a British Resident; our military force on the coast was accordingly increased, and Colonel Burney found it necessary to quit the Burmese territory. It has since been discovered, or at least strongly suspected, that a secret correspondence has been carrying on between the Burmese monarch and the Rajah of Nepal; and troops have been marched to those parts of Assam, through which it was suspected the envoys would pass, with a view to intercept them. Both of these states have the same grounds for hostility against the British; they have both suffered defeat and lost territory, and they are both warlike, having overcome all their neighbours till they came in contact with the British; it took two campaigns to subdue the Ghorkas, and there was much hard fighting with them, which was not the case with the Burmese.

On a full consideration of all the circumstances, it can scarcely be denied that the situation of India is alarming, if not perilous, and that we are more dependent than ever on the fidelity of the native troops. It happens, fortunately for us, that this part of the Indian population may be depended on more than any other class; but even with regard to them we must not be too secure; for where there is a general spirit of disaffection throughout the country, it cannot have failed to make some impression on the troops. One of the strongest holds we have on them is the consideration of their own individual interests, and the punctuality with which their pay is distributed. Now it is said that the revenues of India will be reduced six millions sterling, in consequence of the famine which has prevailed in the western provinces; and when we remember that the last Burmese war cost fifteen millions, it may be apprehended that the Indian treasury may be exhausted if another war should occur at the present moment. The native troops are the only part of the population whose interests have been cared for, and even they have their grievances to complain of. Witness the massacre at Barrackpore, at the commencement of the Burmese war—an event which has never yet been properly investigated, and which, we will venture to say, has not been forgotten by the Sepoys. That these men are not always inclined to be the passive instruments of their European officers, has been proved by many facts. And we are informed, that, so recently as July last, when a party of Sepoys were warned for the execution of a prisoner, their comrade, whom a general court-martial had sentenced to be shot to death by musketry, four or five of the men positively refused the duty; and, though they subsequently undertook it to the extent of forming a part of the detail to whom the execution was assigned, they intentionally and openly fired clear of the convict, who was, in consequence, obliged to be dispatched by the provost sergeant. We trust that the present critical state of our India possessions will arouse the attention of this country to the subject before it is too late, before an outbreak shall have occurred such as that in Canada, which will render it next to impossible to restore order, and that a strict inquiry will be instituted into that system of government, which, while it provokes the hostility of all surrounding states, has neither secured the attachment of our own fellow-subjects, nor the fidelity of our allies. Among the numerous grievances of British India, we may specify the intolerable pressure of taxation, which deprives the mass of the people of all the fruits of their labour, except a bare maintenance; to this we may attribute the dreadful sufferings, and the loss of many thousand lives in the late famine in the north-west provinces—a famine it has been called, though it now appears that the calamity was rather excessive poverty, from which the inhabitants were unable to purchase the means of support, than a scarcity of food itself. What tenderness has been shewn to the natives of India, let the dreadful mortality in the Indian jails proclaim, or the facilities granted for shipping them off to the slave colonies, and the continuation of slavery in India. The courts of justice are so venal and dilatory that no one can enter them without bribery, or expect a decision in a civil case under seven or ten years. Such was the case at least within a very few years; and we have lately seen the East India Company conferring a grant of £5000 on the heirs of a judge who was murdered at Delhi, while the act of assassination was one so highly applauded by the inhabitants, that a tumult was apprehended; and although the design of rescuing the murderer was baffled, his grave was adorned with garlands, and prayers were addressed to him as a saint and a martyr in the cause of his country. This is not a solitary instance of revenge for real or supposed injuries; several other cases have lately occurred, in which the lives of European officers, civil and military, have been sacrificed, and attempts have been made upon a larger scale to provoke the Sepoys to mutiny, and to murder their officers.

In a recent work on India,* by Captain West-

macott, late assistant to the political agent on the north-east frontier, the author, who has visited nearly all the cities of importance in Northern, Western, and Central India, affirms, that "the laws we have given to the East have made it necessary to erect prisons which overflow with debtors and felons; while in the native states there is scarcely a prison to be seen." In December 1837 there were upwards of 1250 prisoners in the criminal jail of Bareilly. We have overturned the most valued and useful institutions of the natives, and seized upon the funds which from time immemorial have been devoted to religious and benevolent purposes, and for the improvement of the country. Formerly every village had its own municipality, by which its affairs were conducted, the public taxes apportioned, order preserved, and disputes settled: these municipalities have been abolished, to make way for our corrupt, dilatory, and incomprehensible judicial system, and a rapacious and tyrannical body of policemen, whose extortions are unbounded. "The waste lands belonging to villages, and reserved by the inhabitants to meet the wants of their increasing populations, and to support schools, charities, and caravanseries, have been appropriated by Government." "Religious endowments have been sequestrated, and the reservoirs and aqueducts that fertilized the country are gone to decay. The charitable institutions, the asylums for the poor, the sick, and the maimed, splendid and useful public works, are crumbling to dust, and the wells and resting places in the desert, built and endowed by princes, and the wealthy and benevolent, as a refuge for the traveller under an eastern sun, are neglected, and fallen to ruin." Since the decay of the caravanseries, merchants and caravans are obliged to seek an asylum in the villages, or to encamp in the open plain, exposed to depredations; and it is now dangerous to travel through a country where formerly there was as complete security as in England. By a combination of the judicial and financial functions, the tax-collectors are enabled to inflict penal law on those who disobey their authority, a system which "has covered India with disaffection, poverty, and crime." Insurrections are continually breaking out, in one part or other of the British territories, and the tributary states "entertain towards us no friendly feeling." "There are few of our allies and tributaries who bear towards us a friendly feeling, and few who could resist the temptation of securing an accession of territory by conspiring to effect our ruin." "Were the Muscovite hordes to cross the Attock, all our allies and tributaries would probably be in arms; it would be a signal for the Sikhs, the Rajpoots, the Mahrattas, the Rohillas, and the warriors of Oude, to fling away their scabbards." Such is the description given by Captain Westmacott, of the effects of British rule in India; and yet he would have us to extend our empire to Attock, which would call forth hosts of new enemies, in order to prepare against the problematic danger of a Russian invasion. But, though the possibility of such an event is not to be overlooked, our real danger in India is from within, and our chief efforts should be directed to correct the manifold evils of misgovernment: the best security against foreign invasion is the affection of our native subjects and allies.

THE VALUE OF "THE WISDOM OF OUR ANCESTORS."

BEFORE the rise of the Utilitarian Philosophy, the friends of reform were too timid to adopt a foundation of their own for the doctrines they reared, and merely attempted to shew a preferable right to that on which their adversaries had erected the stately structure of despotic and unequal government. Thus, honest Cartwright, when he felt himself called upon to strike a blow in the cause of freedom, must needs write an octavo volume, to prove that Vote by Ballot, Annual Parliaments, and Universal Suffrage, were legacies left to us by our Saxon ancestors—a project in which he signally failed. This practice has been now, with a better judgment, abandoned. The enemy had a mighty advantage in it. The history of all ages affords too many illustrations of successful depravity, to be safely appealed to as a line of precedent for just measures. When the slender foundation, too, was occasionally formed, it was easily removed by the enemy. Perhaps a franchise having been founded on the laws of Edward the Confessor, or the declaration of King John, the whole theory of its formation might be undermined by a new interpretation of a Saxon word, or by the perverse diligence of some prerogative antiquary, whose superior accuracy enabled him to determine that what appeared to his Liberal brother the letter n, was undoubtedly the letter u, in virtue of a small waving line thrown over it, plainly distinguishable by the assistance of the microscope.

If we look back, indeed, upon the early history of some of the "bulwarks of our constitution," we will not find much to gratify our vanity. It is quite true that the suffrage in counties, before the restriction to forty-shilling freeholders, seems to have been something very nearly approaching to universal: but the privilege of choosing a person to tax them, was not much valued by the electors; nor was the task of attending at Westminster, to drive the bargain, much coveted by the elected. "The man of their choice" sometimes fortified himself from the returning officers, by a formidable array of cross-bows and mangonels displayed on his battlements, and sometimes betook himself to flight, or hid himself among the Chiltern Hundreds, where the King's writ could not be used. Let us just take a momentary glance of Sir Francis

Palgrave's picture of a county election, in that amusing and too much neglected little work, "The Merchant and the Friar."

"During the confabulation, several nods and winks of intelligence passed between Trafford and a well-mounted knight: and, while the former appeared to be settling the business with the suitors, the latter, who had been close to Sir Giles, continued gradually backing and sidelining away through the group of shiresmen; and, just as he had got clear out of the ring, John Trafford declared, in a most sonorous voice, that the suitors had chosen Sir Richard de Pogeys as one of their representatives.

"The sheriff, who, keeping his eye fixed upon Sir Richard as he receded, had evidently suspected some manoeuvre, instantly ordered his bailiffs to secure the body of the member—this is rather an Hibernian phrase, but, as I cannot depart from my authorities, I do not know how it can be amended—'and,' continued he, with much vehemence, 'Sir Richard must be forthwith committed to custody, unless he gives good bail—two substantial freeholders—that he will duly attend in his place among the Commons, on the first day of the Session, according to the laws and usage of Parliament.'

"All this, however, was more easily said than done; for, before the verbal precept had proceeded from the lips of the Sheriff, Sir Richard was galloping away at full speed across the fields; off dashed the bailiffs after the member, amidst the shouts of the surrounding crowd, who forgot all their grievances in the stimulus of the chase, which they contemplated with the perfect certainty of receiving some satisfaction from its termination—whether by the escape of the fugitive, in which case the common enemy, the Sheriff, would be liable to a heavy amercement; or by the capture of the knight, a result which would give them almost equal delight, by imposing a disagreeable and irksome duty upon an individual who was universally disliked, in consequence of his overbearing harshness and domestic tyranny."

Of the rough-handed class of men who were thus sent along to grant aids and tallages, and demand redress of grievances, and of the respect paid to them, we may form some estimate from an anecdote of the 14th century. The Parliament had no particular place of meeting; and never objected to any castle, jail, church, abbey, palace, or other sufficiently large building that chance threw in the way. Once on a time, having got the use of the chapter-house in Westminster Abbey, the members created so mighty a disturbance that the stout abbot, growing indignant, collected a sufficient force, and drove out the representatives of the people, pell-mell, protesting he would never let his house be entered by such guests again. "This was called the Parliament of Battes," says Stowe, of the Parliament of 1426, "because men being forbidden to bring swords or other weapons, brought great battes and staves on their necks; and when those weapons were inhibited them, they took stones and plomets of lead." Such is a characteristic specimen of the legislative wisdom of our ancestors.

It is not to be supposed that all the sport was reserved for the poor Commons. Not only the Lords Temporal, but the Lords Spiritual, had their share and more. Each of the archbishops had a massive silver cross borne before him; and when the two crosses, at any time, came in each other's way, then, to be sure, it was—

"As rolls the river into ocean,
In sable torrent wildly streaming;
As the sea tide's opposing motion,
In azure column proudly gleaming,
Beats back the torrent many a rood,
In curling foam and mingling flood;
While eddying whirl, and breaking wave,
Roused by the blast of winter, rave;
Through sparkling spray, in thundering clash,
The lightnings of the waters flash,
In awful whiteness, o'er the shore,
That shines and shakes beneath the roar.
Thus—as the stream and ocean greet,
With waves that madden as they meet—
Thus join the bands whom mutual wrong,
And fate, and fury, drive along."

The Parliament, of course, met within one of the provinces—generally Canterbury. If the two archbishops met each other, there was nothing but to fight for it; and occasionally his one Grace would lie in wait for his other Grace, who, having been thrashed once or twice before, would increase his retinue with the intention of doing a final and decided thing. Spiritual weapons—the usual recourse, when a poor king or baron was to be humbled—were here of no use; the primates knew that, and took more applicable measures. But, in illustration of this, let us draw another slight sketch from Sir Francis Palgrave:—

At the beck of the clerk, the door unclosed, and the strangers had scarcely entered the chamber, when Bar-dolph du Tyl, the Gascon, the King's pursuivant, rushed into the room, exclaiming, in tones of horror—"Murder, murder! My Lord, the Archbishop of York, is murdered by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, in his way to the Parliament House." The whole assembly was astounded. "The road by the side of the river, along the Strand, as your Majesty well knoweth, is but a perilous slough, and my Lord of York's mule, sure-footed as she is, could scarcely pick her way amidst the ruts and mire. Just as my Lord of York was in that solitary spot, not far from the pound, over against the church of Saint Martin, my Lord of Canterbury, who had stationed himself in the adjacent fields, with a large body of forces, suddenly rushed upon the flank of the procession. At the same moment, my Lord of York was furiously attacked in front by the Prior of St Bartholomew's, who had been warily lying in ambush behind Charing Cross. My Lord attempted to retreat to York House; but my Lord of Canterbury furiously pursued his brother prelate, and with one fell stroke brought him to the ground."

We believe it is not to be found in history that any Archbishop of York was slain by an Archbishop of Canterbury; and the spirited sketch of Sir Francis, merges into the individuality of incident with which rumour has been pleased to adorn the fury of the fight. The two archbishops appear scowling at each other, and the blood lost has been found to be only that of their followers. Ere we leave Sir Francis Palgrave, let us observe that his little book, containing so much spirited information on the habits of our ancestors—with whom he is far better acquainted than he is with the men of the present day—would have been one of the most popular works of the period, had he not mixed it up with much absurd politics and stupid philosophy. Our ancestors he understands, because he has studied them. The men of the present day he knows nothing about, for the converse reason; and Cartwright did not make a more ludicrous mistake, when he supposed that, under the title "Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva," Prynne pleaded for the restoration of short Parliaments, than Sir Francis has done in his attempts to describe the nature of the utilitarian philosophy.

It may be seen from these specimens, that the practice of our ancestors proves but a slippery foundation for rights, whether popular or aristocratic. When properly used, however, the history of the constitution is a subject not altogether barren. In the first place, the enemies of freedom generally refer to it for precedents for their evil deeds, and, like all men who can make an important use of the complexion of a fact, they exaggerate and misrepresent it. When the calm inquirer proves them to be wrong, he conquers them on their own ground. But there is another and higher use of the experience of history. Franchises and popular rights generally come into existence at periods when it is not the interest of governors to suppress them, and are often allowed a peaceful life till that time arrives. Many useful practices were so brought into existence in early times, which, in later and more enlightened days, when their value was better appreciated, fell before oligarchy or despotic power, or maintained their existence by a protracted war. A few notices of the fraud and violence committed on these privileges, may be useful as a portion of the monitory wisdom which history was meant to teach.

The people of England assuredly possessed certain customs or privileges conducive to the checking of arbitrary government, and the protection of private rights, which the Norman conquest, and the increasing power of the Norman nobility, could not overcome. Force was, indeed, too rude an instrument to lop away these objects of the affection of the people. The ruthless Norman monarch might strip a province, and inclose it for his hunting-ground; and the noble might pillage the little mansion of the neighbouring franklin—such acts of oppression were always committed when the party had power to do so; but the old customs of justice thus broken in upon were not abolished or forgotten, and they held their silent course in the universal practice or adoption of the people, whenever actual violence was withdrawn. It was by the exertions of a more ingenious race than the Norman kings or barons that these popular rights were gradually levelled, and a system was created that, at the accession of James I., had brought England nearly to a despotism founded on principles quite distinct from the rude law of the strong hand, which characterised earlier acts of oppression. As the nation became more civilised, and alive to more subtle political distinctions, the clergy, deriving their knowledge from the slavish doctrines of the civilians, gradually diffused around them the influence of their pernicious learning. Anxious, as it were, to raise a rival on earth to the Deity, whose word they professed to teach, they invested the sublunary king with a portion of the sacred attributes at their disposal, and gradually fashioned the British monarch on the model of that pure and ethereal Divine right which characterised the Roman Emperor. One instance of this may be illustrated in the history of the law maxim of Blackstone, that "the king never dies;" implying that, from the moment of the decease of one king, another begins to reign; a principle now of little importance, but the absence of which was probably useful in preserving the liberties of our ancestors. Henry of Huntingdon tells us that, from the death of Stephen till the arrival of Henry II., "England was without a king." The earliest annalists always speak of a king being "electus," or chosen; and of his beginning to reign at the ceremony of the coronation, and the taking of the oath. The writer of a late work on the rise of the royal prerogative, discovered that, during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the kings passed no public acts till after their coronation, with one exception—viz., Richard I.; and another antiquary, pursuing researches more intimately connected with chronology, discovered that previous chronologists had made a mistake of a whole year in that reign, and that it was no exception from the general rule.* In the reign of Elizabeth, this doctrine was condemned by the judges. When James I., even with his questionable title, mounted the throne, he did not feel grateful to the Parliament for confirming his accession, preferring the respectable title of divine right to popular sanction. By Charles II., the doctrine was still more ludicrously treated. A statute of Henry VII., passed before the subtle doctrines of the civilians had been fully absorbed, made it no treason to obey the command of a King for the time being, however defective his title might be. When this statute was pleaded by Sir Harry Vane, it was answered that Charles II. had been king, not only by title, but de facto, from the moment of his father's death, though he was "kept out of his royal authority by traitors and rebels." The judges probably hesitated between deciding in this form, or, that Charles I. was still living both de jure and de facto, though his head had been cut off by traitors and rebels. The years of the acts of Parliament run from the death of Charles I.; and every loyal historian immediately after that event, heads his chapters with the reign of Charles II., noticing Oliver Cromwell as one of the persons who distinguished themselves during his reign.

* Allen's "Inquiry into the Rise and Growth of the Royal Prerogative." Sir H. Nicolas' "Chronology & History."

There were many other more substantial principles which the learning of the clergy attempted, happily often in vain, to dissolve in the same manner. Little as we may be inclined to admire the wisdom of our ancestors, had they not stubbornly adhered to many of their venerable usages, we should have had, at this time, to fight the battle of freedom on less advantageous ground. Among these, the intricate and inflexible provisions of the common law, and the privileges of Parliament, were occasionally rocks of defence, which baffled allendeavour to assault or undermine them, and held out against the fiercest attacks of despotism, till relieved in better times. A judge might wilfully misinterpret the law at the desire of the king—but what then? It required a continued series of such judgments to alter it; and the judge who misinterpreted did so at the risk of suffering from some other principle of the law, from which the prince might not be able to protect him. Charles I., to make his judges more useful instruments, changed their patents from a holding by good conduct to that of the Sovereign's will; but another remedy was at hand; for the judges who decided in favour of ship-money were impeached. The most sharp-eyed friends of despotism saw, in the destruction of these respected customs, the surest road to absolute rule. "How well this suits with monarchy," says Strafford, speaking with contempt of the common lawyers, "when they monopolize all to be governed by their year books!" and, writing from Ireland to his courtly coadjutor, Laud, he cheerfully remarks—"I know no reason, then, but that you may as well rule the common lawyers in England, as I, poor beagle, do here."

The reservation by the Commons of the right to hold the purse-strings, so vigilantly and punctiliously guarded, was the chief of these protecting powers; and it has done so much to lesson the difficulties of reform in later ages, that those who have contributed an item to the integrity and efficacy of the system, deserve the deepest veneration. Though sometimes invaded by hostile force, the right is as old as any constitutional practice we know, and it was generally practised under a condition usual with those who have money to give—security for value before payment. During the unpopularity of Edward III., his Commons are reported to have addressed him in the following plain, sturdy, and business-like strain:—"The said Commons appeared in Parliament, protesting that they had the same good will as ever to assist the King with their lives and fortunes; but that it seemed to them, if their said liege lord had always possessed about him faithful counsellors and good officers, he would have been so rich that he would have had no need of charging his commons with subsidy or tallage, considering the great ransoms of the French and Scotch Kings, and of so many other prisoners; and that it appeared to be for the private advantage of some near the King, and of others by their collusion, that the King and the kingdom are so impoverished, and the commons so ruined. And they promised the King, that, if he would do speedy justice on such as should be found guilty, and take from them what law and reason permit, with what had been already granted in Parliament, they will engage that he should be rich enough to maintain his wars for a long time, without much charging his people in any manner." On an occasion not long after, they insisted on seeing the vouchers of the expenditure of a previous supply before they voted more money, and objected that "large sums had been expended upon garrisons in France and Ireland, and other places beyond the kingdom, of which they protested themselves not liable to bear the charge;"* a precedent which might have been advantageously followed in the present century.

When Elizabeth haughtily warned the Parliament not to be too free in their discussions; when James, with less dignity, telling them not to meddle with matters beyond their comprehension, tore a resolution from the journals, and prosecuted members for their speeches within the House; when Charles invaded the Commons with an armed force, for the purpose of apprehending five of their members—it is pretty evident that, however much their proceedings had been adapted to the more complicated legislation of the times, they were little more independent than in the days of Edward III., and had as hard a battle as ever to fight with the power of the crown. Other popular rights had meanwhile sunk, and been almost forgotten. Many of the writers of the seventeenth century are remarkable for their ignorance of some of the practices of the constitution; and the learned Clarendon frequently attributes a recurrence to early precedent as innovation, when there is no occasion to attribute his mistakes to want of candour. In the struggle with the commons, the principal appeal to old precedent by the crown, was the fruit of the investigation of Noy, the Attorney-General, who, with beneficial ingenuity, fabricated the imposition of ship money from some dubious provisions for the defence of the country, during the Saxon period. The sound constitutional information was all on the other side, and formed the foundation of the proceedings of Whitlocke and Pym in Parliament, or was selected from the mighty stores of historical learning, collected by Selden and Prynne.

LAKE REMINISCENCES, FROM 1807 TO 1830.

BY THE ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH—Continued.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH was born at Cocker-mouth, a small town of Cumberland, seated on the river Cocker. His father was a lawyer, and acted as an agent for that Lord Lonsdale, the immediate predecessor of the present, who is not unfrequently described by those who still remember him as "the bad Lord Lonsdale." In what was he bad? Chiefly, I believe, in this—that, being a man of great local power, founded on his rank, on his official station of Lord Lieutenant over two counties, and on a very large estate, he used his power in a most oppressive way. I have heard it said that he was mad; and, at any rate, he was inordinately capricious—capricious even to eccentricity. But perhaps his madness was nothing more than the intemperance of a haughty and a headstrong will, encouraged by the consciousness of power, and tempted to abuses of it by the abject servility which poverty and dependence presented in one direction, embittering the contrast of that defiance which inevitably faced him in another throughout a land of freedom and amongst spirits as haughty as his own. He was a true feudal chieftain; and, in the very approaches to his mansion, in the style of his equipage, or whatever else was likely to meet the public eye, he delighted to express his disdain of modern refinements, and the haughty carelessness of his magnificence. The coach in which he used to visit Penrith, the nearest town to his principal house of Lowther, was old and neglected; his horses fine, but untrimmed: and such was the impression diffused about him by his gloomy temper and his habits of oppression, that the streets were silent as he traversed them, and an awe sat upon many faces, (so, at least, I have heard a Penrith contemporary of the old despot declare,) pretty much like that which may be supposed to attend the entry into a guilty town, of some royal commission for trying state criminals. In his park, you saw some of the most magnificent timber in the kingdom—trees that were coeval with the feuds of York and Lancaster, yews that perhaps had furnished bows to Cœur de Lion, and oaks that might have built a navy. All was savage grandeur about these native forests: their sweeping lawns and glades had been unapproached, for centuries it might be, by the hand of art; and amongst them roamed—not the timid fallow deer—but thundering droves of wild horses. Lord Lonsdale, according to an old English writer, (in describing, I think, the Earl of Arundel,) "went sometimes to London, because there only he found a greater man than himself; but not often, because at home he was allowed to forget that there was such a man." Even in London, however, his haughty injustice found occasions for making itself known. On a court day, (I revive an anecdote once familiarly known,) St James' Street was lined by cavalry, and the orders were peremptory, that no carriages should be allowed to pass, except those which were carrying parties to court. Whether it were by accident or no, Lord Lonsdale's carriage advanced, and the coachman, in obedience to orders shouted out from the window, was turning down the forbidden route, when a trooper rode up to the horses' heads, and stopped them: the thundering menaces of Lord Lonsdale perplexed the soldier, who did not know but he might be bringing himself into a scrape by persisting in his opposition; but the officer on duty, observing the scene, rode up, and, in a determined tone, enforced the order, causing two of his men to turn the horses' heads round into Piccadilly. Lord Lonsdale threw his card to the officer—and a duel followed; in which, however, the outrageous injustice of his Lordship met with a pointed rebuke; for the first person whom he summoned to his aid, in the quality of second, though a friend and (I believe) a relative of his own, declined to sanction, by any interference, so scandalous a quarrel with an officer for simply executing an official duty. In this dilemma—for probably he was aware that few military men would fail to take the same disapproving view of the affair—he applied to the present Earl of Lonsdale, then Sir William Lowther. Either there must have been some needless discourtesy in the officer's mode of fulfilling his duty, or else Sir William thought the necessity of the case, however wantonly provoked, a sufficient justification for a relative giving his assistance, even under circumstances of such egregious injustice. At any rate, it is due to Sir William, in mere candour, to suppose that he did nothing in this instance but what his conscience approved; seeing, that in all others his conduct has been such as to win him the universal respect of the two counties in which he is best known. He it was that acted as second: and, by a will which is said to have been dated the same day, he became eventually possessed of a large property, which did not necessarily accompany the title. Another anecdote is told of the same Lord Lonsdale, which expresses, in a more eccentric way, and a way that to many people will be affecting—to some shocking—the moody energy of his passions. He loved, with passionate fervour, a fine young woman, of humble parentage, in a Cumberland farm-house. Her he had persuaded to leave her father and put herself under his protection. Whilst yet young and beautiful, she died: Lord Lonsdale's sorrow was profound; he could not bear the thought of a final parting from that face which had become so familiar to his heart : he caused her to be embalmed ; a glass was placed over her features ; and, at intervals, when his thoughts reverted to her memory, he found a consolation (or perhaps a luxurious irritation) of his sorrow, in visiting this sad memorial of his former happiness. This story, which I have often heard repeated by the country people of Cumberland, strengthened the general feeling of this eccentric nobleman's self-willed character, though in this instance complicated with a trait of character that argued nobler capacities. By what rules he guided himself in dealing with the various lawyers, agents, or stewards, whom his extensive estates brought into a dependency upon his justice or his moderation—whether in fact he had no rule, but left all to accident or caprice—I have never learned. Generally, I have heard it said, that in some years of his life he resisted the payment of all bills indiscriminately, which he had any colourable plea for supposing to contain overcharges ; some fared ill because they were neighbours ; and his Lordship could say, that " he knew them to be knaves ; " others fared worse, because they were so remote that " how could his Lordship know what they were ? " Of this number, and possibly for this reason left unpaid, was Wordsworth's father. He died whilst his four sons and one daughter were yet helpless children, leaving to them respectable fortunes ; but which, as yet, were unrealized and tolerably hypothetic, as they happened to depend upon so shadowy a basis as the justice of Lord Lonsdale. The executors of the will, and trustees of the children's interests, in one point acted wisely : foreseeing the result of a legal contest with so potent a defendant as this leviant of two counties, and that, under any nominal award, the whole estate of the orphans must be swallowed up in the costs of a suit that would be carried into Chancery, and finally before the Lords, they prudently withdrew from all active measures of opposition, confiding the event to Lord Lonsdale's returning sense of justice. Unfortunately, for that nobleman's reputation, and also, as was thought, for the children's prosperity, before this somewhat rusty quality of justice could have time to operate, his Lordship died. However, for once the world was wrong in its anticipations for the children : the successor to Lord Lonsdale's titles and Cumberland estates was made aware of the entire case, in all its circumstances ; and he very honourably gave directions for full restitution being made. This was done ; and in one respect the result was more fortunate for the children than if they had been trained from youth to rely upon their expectations : for by the time this repayment was made, three out of the five children were already settled in life, with the very amplest prospects opening before them—so ample as to make their private patrimonial fortunes of inconsiderable importance in their eyes : and very probably the withholding of their inheritance it was, however unjust, and however little contemplated as an occasion of any such effect, that urged these three persons to the exertions requisite for their present success. Two only of the children remained to whom the restoration of their patrimony was a matter of grave importance ; but it was precisely those two whom no circumstances could have made independent of their hereditary means by personal exertions—viz., William Wordsworth, the poet, and Dorothy, the sole daughter of the house. The three others were—Richard, the eldest ; he had become a thriving solicitor at one of the inns of court in London ; and, if he died only moderately rich, and much below the expectations of his acquaintance, in the final result of his laborious life, it was because he was moderate in his desires ; and, in his latter years, reverting to the pastoral region of his infancy and boyhood, chose rather to sit down by a hearth of his own amongst the Cumberland mountains, and wisely to woo the deities of domestic pleasures and health, than to follow the chase after wealth in the feverish crowds of the capital. The third son (I believe) was Christopher, (Dr Wordsworth,) who, at an early age, became a man of importance in the English church, being made one of the chaplains and librarians of the Archbishop of Canterbury, (Dr Manners Sutton, father of the late Speaker.) He has since risen to the important and dignified station—once held by Barrow, and afterwards by Bentley—of Master of Trinity in Cambridge. Trinity in Oxford is not a first-rate college : but Trinity, Cambridge, answers in rank and authority to Christ Church in Oxford ; and to be the head of that college is rightly considered on a level with a bishopric. Dr Wordsworth has distinguished himself as an author by several very useful republications, (especially the " Ecclesiastical Biography,") which he has enriched with valuable notes. And in his own person, besides other works more exclusively learned, he is the author of one very interesting work of historical research upon the long agitated question of " who wrote the Eicon Basilike ? " a question still unsettled, but much nearer to a settlement in consequence of the strong presumptions which Dr Wordsworth has adduced on behalf of the King's claim. The fourth and youngest son, John, was in the service of the East India Company, and perished most unhappily on the voyage which he had meant to be his last, off the coast of Dorsetshire, in the Company's ship Abergavenny. A calumny was current at the time, that Captain Wordsworth was in a state of intoxication at the time of the calamity. But the printed report of the affair, revised by survivors, entirely disproves the calumny ; which, besides, was in itself incredible to all who were acquainted with Captain Wordsworth's most temperate and even philosophic habits of life. So peculiarly indeed was Captain Wordsworth's temperament and demeanour, and the whole system of his life, coloured by a grave and meditative turn of thought, that, amongst his brother officers in the Honourable Company's service, he bore the surname of " The Philosopher." And William Wordsworth, the poet, not only spoke of him always with a sort of respect, that argued him to have been no ordinary man, but he has frequently assured me of one fact which, as implying some want of frankness and sincerity, gave me pain to hear—viz., that in the fine lines entitled, “The Happy Warrior,” in which an analytical account is given of the main elements which enter into the composition of a real hero, he had in view chiefly his brother John’s character. That was true, I daresay; but it was inconsistent, in some measure, with the note attached to the lines, by which the reader learns, that it was out of reverence for Lord Nelson, as one who transcended the estimate here made, that the poem had not been openly connected with his name, as the real suggester of the thoughts. Now, privately, though still professing a lively admiration for the mighty Admiral, as one of the few men who carried into his professional labours a real and vivid genius, (and thus far Wordsworth often testified a deep admiration for Lord N.) yet, in reference to these particular lines, he uniformly declared that Lord N. was much below the ideal there contemplated, and that, in fact, it had been suggested by the recollection of his brother. But, surely, in some of the first passages, this cannot be so; for example, when he makes it one trait of the heaven-born hero, that he, if called upon to face some mighty day of battle—

“To which heaven has join’d
Great issues, good or bad, for human kind—
Is happy as a lover, and attired
With a supernal brightness, like a man inspir’d”— surely he must have had Lord Nelson’s idea predominating in his thoughts; for Captain Wordsworth was scarcely tried in such a situation. There can be no doubt, however, that he merited the praises of his brother; and it was indeed an improbable tale, that he should first of all deviate from this philosophic temperance upon an occasion when all his energies, and the fullest self-possession, were all likely to prove little enough. In reality it was the pilot, the incompetent pilot, who caused the fatal catastrophe:—“O pilot, you have ruined me!” were amongst the last words that Captain Wordsworth was heard to utter—pathetic words, and fit for him, “a meek man and a brave,” to use in addressing a last reproach, and summing up the infinite injury, to one who, not through misfortune or overruling will of Providence, but through miserable conceit and unprincipled levity, had brought total ruin upon so many a gallant countryman. Captain Wordsworth might have saved his own life; but the perfect loyalty of his nature to the claims upon him, that sublime fidelity to duty which is so often found amongst men of his profession, kept him to the last upon the wreck; and, after that, it is probable that the almost total wreck of his own fortunes, (which, but for this overthrow, would have amounted to twenty thousand pounds, upon the successful termination of this one voyage,) but still more, the total ruin of the new and splendid Indiaman confided to his care, had so much dejected his spirits, that he was not in a condition for making the efforts that, under a more hopeful prospect, he might have been able to make. Six weeks his body lay unrecovered; at the end of that time, it was found, and carried to the Isle of Wight, and buried in close neighbourhood to the quiet fields which he had so recently described, in letters to his family at Grasmere, as a Paradise of English peace, to which his mind would be likely oftentimes to revert, amidst the agitations of the sea.

Such were the modes of life pursued by three of the orphan children—such the termination of life to two. Meantime, the daughter of the house was reared liberally, in the family of a relation at Windsor: and she might have pursued a quiet and decorous career, of a character, perhaps, somewhat tame, under the same dignified auspices; but, at an early period of life, her good angel threw open to her a life of nobler prospects, in the opportunity which then arose, and which she did not hesitate to seize, of becoming the companion, through a life of delightful wanderings—of what, to her more elevated friends, seemed nothing short of vagrancy—the companion and the confidential friend, and, with a view to the enlargement of her own intellect, the pupil, of a brother, the most original and most meditative man of his own age. William had passed his infancy on the very margin of the Lake district, just six miles, in fact, beyond the rocky screen of Whinlatter, and within one hour’s ride of Bassinethwaite Water. To those who live in the tame scenery of Cockermouth, the blue mountains in the distance, the sublime peaks of Borrowdale and of Buttermere, raise aloft a signal, as it were, of a new country, a country of romance and mystery, to which the thoughts are habitually turning. Children are fascinated and haunted with vague temptations, when standing on the frontiers of such a foreign land; and so was Wordsworth fascinated, so haunted. Fortunately for Wordsworth that, at an early age, he was transferred to the very centre of this lovely district. At the little town of Hawkshead, seated on the north-west angle of Esthwaite Water, a grammar school (which, in English usage, means a school for classical literature) was founded, in Queen Elizabeth’s reign, by Archbishop Sandys, a member of a very ancient family of that name, still seated in the neighbourhood. Hither were sent all the four brothers; and here it was that Wordsworth passed his life until the time arrived for his removal to college. Taking into consideration the peculiar tastes of the person, and the peculiar advantages of the place, I conceive that no pupil of a public school can ever have passed a more luxurious boyhood than Wordsworth. The school discipline was not, I believe, very strict; the mode of living out of school very much resembled that of Eton for Oppidans; less elegant perhaps, and less costly in its provisions for accommodation, but not less comfortable; and in that part of the arrangements which was chiefly Etonian, even more so; for in both places the boys, instead of being gathered into one fold, and at night into one or two huge dormitories, were distributed amongst motherly old "dames," technically so called at Eton, but not at Hawkshead. In the latter place, agreeably to the inferior scale of the whole establishment, the houses were smaller, and more cottage-like, consequently more like private households; and the old lady of the ménage was more constantly amongst them, providing, with maternal tenderness and with a professional pride, for the comfort of her young flock, and protecting the weak from oppression. The humble cares to which these poor matrons dedicated themselves, may be collected from several allusions scattered through the poems of Wordsworth; that entitled "Nutting," for instance, in which his own early Spinosistic feeling is introduced, of a mysterious presence diffused through the solitudes of woods, a presence that was disturbed by the intrusion of careless and noisy outrage, and which is brought into a strong relief by the previous homely picture of the old housewife equipping her young charge with beggars' weeds in order to prepare him for a struggle with thorns and brambles. Indeed, not only the moderate rank of the boys, and the peculiar kind of relation assumed by these matrons, equally suggested this humble class of motherly attentions, but the whole spirit of the place and neighbourhood was favourable to an old English homeliness of domestic and personal economy. Hawkshead, most fortunately for its own manners and the primitive style of its habits even to this day, stands about six miles out of the fashionable line for the "Lakers." Esthwaite, though a lovely scene in its summer garniture of woods, has no features of permanent grandeur to rely upon. A wet or gloomy day, even in summer, reduces it to little more than a wildish pond, surrounded by miniature hills; and the sole circumstances which restore the sense of a romantic region and an alpine character, are the knowledge (but not the sense) of endless sylvan avenues, stretching for twenty miles to the sea-side, and the towering groups of Langdale and Grasmere fells, which look over the little pastoral barriers of Esthwaite from distances of eight, ten, and fourteen miles. Esthwaite, therefore, being no object for itself, and the sublime head of Conistone being accessible by a road which evades Hawkshead, few tourists ever trouble the repose of this little village town. And in the days of which I am speaking, (1778-1787,) tourists were as yet few and infrequent to any parts of the country. Mrs Radcliffe had not begun to cultivate the sense of the picturesque in her popular romances; guide books, with the sole exception of "Gray's Posthumous Letters," had not arisen to direct public attention to this domestic Calabria; roads were rude, and, in many instances, not wide enough to admit post-chaises; but, above all, the whole system of travelling accommodations was barbarous and antediluvian for the requisitions of the pampered south. As yet the land had rest; the annual fever did not shake the very hills; and (which was the happiest immunity of the whole) false taste, the pseudo-romantic rage, had not violated the most awful solitudes amongst the ancient hills by opera-house decorations. Wordsworth, therefore, enjoyed this labyrinth of valleys in a perfection that no one can have experienced since the opening of the present century. The whole was one paradise of virgin beauty; and even the rare works of man, all over the land, were hoar with the grey tints of an antique picturesque; nothing was new, nothing was raw and uncitrized. Hawkshead, in particular, though tamely seated in itself and its immediate purlieus, has a most fortunate and central locality as regards the best (at least the most interesting) scenes for a pedestrian Rambler. The gorgeous scenery of Borrowdale, the austere sublimities of Wasdalehead, of Langdalehead, or Mardale; these are too oppressive, in their colossal proportions and their utter solitudes, for encouraging a perfectly human interest. Now, taking Hawkshead as a centre, with a radius of about eight miles, one might describe a little circular tract which embosoms a perfect network of little valleys—separate wards or cells, as it were, of one large valley, walled in by the great primary mountains of the region. Grasmere, Easdale, Little Langdale, Tilberthwaite, Yewdale, Elter Water, Loughrigg Tarn, Skelwith, and many other little quiet nooks, lie within a single division of this labyrinthine district. All these are within one summer afternoon's ramble. And amongst these, for the years of his boyhood, lay the daily excursions of Wordsworth. I do not conceive that Wordsworth could have been an amiable boy; he was austere and unsocial, I have reason to think, in his habits; not generous; and, above all, not self-denying. Throughout his later life, with all the benefits of a French discipline in the lesser charities of social intercourse, he has always exhibited a marked impatience of those particular courtesies of life. Not but he was kind and obliging where his services would cost him no exertion; but I am pretty certain that no consideration would ever have induced Wordsworth to burthen himself with a lady's reticule, parasol, shawl, "or anything that was hers." Mighty must be the danger which would induce him to lead her horse by the bridle. Nor would he, without some demur, stop to offer her his hand over a stile. Freedom—unlimited, careless, insolent freedom—unoccupied possession of his own arms—absolute control over his own legs and motions—these have always been so essential to his comfort, that in any case where they were likely to become questionable, he would have declined to make one of the party. Meantime, we are not to suppose that Wordsworth, the boy, expressly sought for solitary scenes of nature amongst woods and mountains, with a direct conscious anticipation of imaginative pleasure, and loving them with a pure, disinterested love, on their own separate account. These are feelings beyond boyish nature, or, at all events, beyond boyish nature trained amidst the necessities of social intercourse. Wordsworth, like his companions, haunted the hills and the vales for the sake of angling, snaring birds, swimming, and sometimes of hunting, according to the Westmoreland fashion, on foot ; for riding to the chase is often quite impossible, from the precipitous nature of the ground. It was in the course of these pursuits, by an indirect effect growing gradually upon him, that Wordsworth became a passionate lover of nature, at the time when the growth of his intellectual faculties made it possible that he should combine those thoughtful passions with the experience of the eye and the ear. There is, amongst the poems of Wordsworth, one most ludicrously misconstrued by his critics, which offers a philosophical hint upon this subject, of great instruction. I will preface it with the little incident which first led Wordsworth into a commentary upon his own meaning. One night, as often enough happened, during the Peninsular war, he and I had walked up Dunmail Raise, from Grasmere, about midnight, in order to meet the carrier who brought the London newspapers, by a circuitous course from Keswick. The case was this :—Coleridge, for many years, received a copy of the Courier, as a mark of esteem, and in acknowledgment of his many contributions to it, from one of the proprietors, Mr Daniel Stewart. This went up in any case, let Coleridge be where he might, to Mrs Coleridge ; for a single day, it staid at Keswick, for the use of Southey ; and, on the next, it came on to Wordsworth, by the slow conveyance of a carrier, plying with a long train of carts between Whitehaven and Kendal. Many a time the force of storms or floods would compel the carrier to stop on his route, five miles short of Grasmere, at Wythburn, or even eight miles short, at Legberthwaite. But, as there was always hope until one or two o'clock in the morning, often and often it would happen that, in the deadly impatience for earlier intelligence, Wordsworth and I would walk off to meet him about midnight, to a distance of three or four miles. Upon one of these occasions, when some great crisis in Spain was daily apprehended, we had waited for an hour or more, sitting upon one of the many huge blocks of stone which lie scattered over that narrow field of battle on the desolate frontier of Cumberland and Westmoreland, where King Dun Mail, with all his peerage, fell, more than a thousand years ago. The time had arrived, at length, that all hope for that night had left us : no sound came up through the winding valleys that stretched to the north ; and the few cottage lights, gleaming, at wide distances, from recesses amidst the rocky hills, had long been extinct. At intervals, Wordsworth had stretched himself at length on the high road, applying his ear to the ground, so as to catch any sound of wheels that might be groaning along at a distance. Once, when he was slowly rising from this effort, his eye caught a bright star that was glittering between the brow of Seat Sandal and of the mighty Helvellyn. He gazed upon it for a minute or so ; and then, upon turning away to descend into Grasmere, he made the following explanation :—“ I have remarked, from my earliest days, that, if under any circumstances, the attention is energetically braced up to an act of steady observation, or of steady expectation, then, if this intense condition of vigilance should suddenly relax, at that moment any beautiful, any impressive visual object, or collection of objects, falling upon the eye, is carried to the heart with a power not known under other circumstances. Just now, my ear was placed upon the stretch, in order to catch any sound of wheels that might come down upon the lake of Wythburn from the Keswick road ; at the very instant when I raised my head from the ground, in final abandonment of hope for this night, at the very instant when the organs of attention were all at once relaxing from their tension, the bright star hanging in the air above those outlines of massy blackness fell suddenly upon my eye, and penetrated my capacity of apprehension with a pathos and a sense of the infinite, that would not have arrested me under other circumstances.” He then went on to illustrate the same psychological principle from another instance ; it was an instance derived from that exquisite poem in which he describes a mountain boy planting himself at twilight on the margin of some solitary bay of Windermere, and provoking the owls to a contest with himself, by “ mimic hootings” blown through his hands ; which of itself becomes an impressive scene to any one able to realize to his fancy the various elements of the solitary woods and waters, the solemn vesper hour, the solitary bird, the solitary boy. Afterwards, the poem goes on to describe the boy as waiting, amidst “ the pauses of his skill,” for the answers of the birds—waiting with intensity of expectation—and then, at length, when, after waiting to no purpose, his attention began to relax—that is, in other words, under the giving way of one exclusive direction of his senses, began suddenly to allow an admission to other objects—then, in that instant, the scene actually before him, the visible scene, would enter unawares—

This complex scenery was—What ?

“ Was carried far into his heart,
With all its pomp, and that uncertain heav’n received
Into the bosom of the steady lake.”

This very expression, “ far,” by which space and its infinities are attributed to the human heart, and to its capacities of re-echoing the sublimities of nature, has always struck me as with a flash of sublime revelation. On this, however, Wordsworth did not say anything in his commentary ; nor did he notice the conclusion, which is this. After describing the efforts of the boy, and next the passive state which succeeded, under his disappointment, (in which condition it was that the solemn spectacle entered the boy’s mind with effectual power, and with a semi-conscious sense of its beauty that would not be denied,) the poet goes on to say—

“ And I suppose that I have stood
A full half-hour beside his quiet grave,
Mute—for he died when he was ten years old.”

Wherefore, then, did the poet stand in the vil-large churchyard of Hawkshead, wrapt in a trance of reverie, over the grave of this particular boy? "It was," says Lord Jeffrey, "for that single accomplishment"—viz., the accomplishment of mimicking the Windermere owls so well that not men only—Coleridge, for instance, or Professor Wilson, or other connoisseurs of owl-music—might have been hoaxed, but actually the old birds themselves, grave as they seem, were effectually humbugged into entering upon a sentimental correspondence of love or friendship—almost regularly "duplying," "replying," and "quadruplying," (as Scotch law has it,) to the boy's original theme. But here, in this relation of Lord Jeffrey's, there is, at all events, a dismal oversight; for it is evident to the most careless reader that the very object of the poem is not the first or initial stage of the boy's history—the exercise of skill which led him, as an occasion, into a rigid and tense effort of attention—not this, but the second stage, the consequence of that attention. Even the attention was an effect, a derivative state; but the second stage, upon which the poet fixes his object, is an effect of that effect; and it is clear that the original notice of the boy's talent is introduced only as a conditio sine qua non—a notice without which a particular result (namely, the tense attention of expectation) could not have been made intelligible; as, again, without this result being noticed, the reaction of that action could quite as little have been made intelligible. Else, and but for this conditional and derivative necessity, but for this dependency of the essential circumstance upon the boy's power of mimicry, it is evident that the "accomplishment"—which Lord Jeffrey so strangely supposes to have been the main object of the poet in recording the boy, and the main subject of his reverie by the side of his grave—never would have been noticed. It is difficult, indeed, to conceive a stronger evidence of that incoherency of thought under which Lord Jeffrey must have allowed himself to read Wordsworth than this very blunder. But, leaving his Lordship, what was the subject of the poet's reverie? some reader may say. A poem ought to explain itself; and we cannot for a moment admit, as a justifying subject for reverie, any private knowledge which the poet might happen to have of the boy's character, or of the expectations he had chanced to raise amongst his friends. I will endeavour to say a word on this question; but, that I may not too much interrupt the narration, in a note. At the same time, let me remind the reader of one great and undeniable truth: It is a fact which cannot be controverted, except by the very thoughtless and the very unobserving, that scarcely one in a thousand of impassioned cases, scarcely one effect in a thousand of all the memorable effects produced by poets, can, upon any theories yet received amongst us, be even imperfectly explained. And, especially, this is true of original poetry. The cases are past numbering in which the understanding says, or seems to say, one thing, impassioned nature another; and, in poetry, at least, Cicero's great rule will be found to fail—that "nunquam aliud natura, aliud sapientia dicit;" if, at least, we understand sapientia to mean dispassionate good sense. How, for instance, could plain good sense—how could the very finest understanding—have told any man, beforehand, that love in excess, amongst its other modes of waywardness, was capable of prompting such appellations as that of "wretch" to the beloved object? Yet, as a fact, as an absolute fact of the experience, it is undeniable that it is among the impulses of love, in extremity, to clothe itself in the language of disparagement—why, is yet to be explained.

"Perhaps 'tis pretty
To mutter and mock a broken charm;
To dally with wrong that does no harm;
Perhaps 'tis pretty to tie together
Thoughts so all unlike each other;
To feel, at each wild word, within,
A sweet recoil of love and pity.
And what if, in a world of sin"—&c. &c.

That is Coleridge's solution; and the amount of it is—first, that it is delightful to call up what we know to be a mere mimicry of evil, in order to feel its non-reality; to dally with phantoms of pain that do not exist: secondly, that such language acts by way of contrast, making the love more prominent by the contradictoriness of its expression: thirdly, that in a world of sin, where evil passions are so often called into action, and have thus matured the language of violence in a service of malignity, naturally enough the feeling of violence and excess stumbles into its old forms of expression, even when the excess happens to lie in the very opposite direction. All this seems specious, and is undoubtedly some part of the solution; and the verses are so fancifully beautiful, that they would recommend even a worse philosophy. But, after all, I doubt if the whole philosophy be given: and, in a similar attempt of Charles Lamb's, the case is not so much solved as further illustrated and amplified. Finally, if solved completely, this case is but one of multitudes which are furnished by the English drama: but (and I would desire no better test of the essential inferiority attaching to the French drama—no better argument of its having grown out of a radically lower nature) there is not, from first to last, throughout that vaunted field of the French literature, one case of what I may denominate the antinomies of passion—cases of self-conflict, in which the understanding says one thing, the impassioned nature of man says another thing. This is a great theme, however, and I dismiss it to a separate discussion.

So far, however, as I have here noticed it, this question has arisen naturally out of the account, as I was endeavouring to sketch it, of Wordsworth's attachment to nature in her grandest forms. It grew out of solitude and the character of his own mind; but the mode of its growth was indirect and unconscious, and in the midst of other more boyish or more worldly pursuits; and that which happened to the boy in mimicking the owls happened also to him. In moments of watching for the passage of woodcocks over the hills in moonlight nights, in order that he might snare them, oftentimes the dull gaze of expectation, after it was becoming hopeless, left him liable to effects of mountain scenery under accidents of nightly silence and solitude, which impressed themselves with a depth for which a full tide of success would have allowed no opening. And, as he lived and grew amongst such scenes from childhood to manhood, many thousands of such opportunities had leisure to improve themselves into permanent effects of character, of feeling, and of taste. Like Michael, he was in the heart of many thousand mists. Many a sight, moreover, such as meets the eye rarely of any, except those who haunt the hills and the tarns at all hours,* and all seasons of the year, had been seen, and neglected perhaps at the time, but afterwards revisited the eye and produced its appropriate effect in silent hours of meditation. In everything, perhaps, except in the redundant graciousness of heart which formed so eminent a feature in the moral constitution of that true philosopher; the character, the sensibility, and the taste of Wordsworth, pursued the same course of development as in the education of the Scotch Pedler† who gives so much of the movement to the progress of "The Excursion."

One of the most interesting among the winter amusements of the Hawkshead boys was that of skating on the adjacent lake. Esthwaite Water is not one of the deep lakes, as its neighbours of Windermere, Coniston, and Grasmere, are: consequently, a very slight duration of frost is sufficient to freeze it into a bearing strength. In this respect, Wordsworth found the same advantages in his boyhood as afterwards at the university; for the county of Cambridge is generally liable to shallow waters; and that University breeds more good skaters than all the rest of England. About the year 1810, by way of expressing an interest in The Friend, which Coleridge was just at that time publishing in weekly numbers, Wordsworth allowed Coleridge to print an extract from the poem on his own life, descriptive of the games celebrated upon the ice of Esthwaite by all who were able to skate: the mimic chases of hare and hounds, pursued long after the last orange gleam of light had died away from the western horizon—oftentimes far into the night—a circumstance which does not speak much for the discipline of the schools—or rather, perhaps, does speak much for the advantages of a situation so pure, and free from the usual perils of a town, as this primitive village of Hawkshead. Wordsworth, in this descriptive passage—which I wish that I had at this moment the means of citing, in order to amplify my account of his earliest tyrocinium—speaks of himself as frequently wheeling aside from his joyous companions to cut across the image of a star; and thus already, in the midst of sportiveness, and by a movement of sportiveness, half unconsciously to himself expressing the growing necessity of retirement to his habits of thought. At another period of the year, when the golden summer allowed the students a long season of early play before the studies of the day began, he describes himself as roaming, hand-in-hand, with one companion, along the banks of Esthwaite Water, chanting, with one voice, the verses of Goldsmith and of Gray—verses which, at the time of recording the fact, he had come to look upon as either in parts false in the principles of their composition, or, at any rate, as wofully below the tone of high poetic passion; but which, at that time of life, when the profounder feelings were as yet only germinating, filled them with an enthusiasm which he describes as brighter than the dreams of fever or of wine.

Meanwhile, how prospered the classical studies which formed the main business of Wordsworth at Hawkshead? Not, in all probability, very well; for, though Wordsworth is at this day a very sufficient master of the Latin language, and reads certain favourite authors, especially Horace, with a critical nicety, and with a feeling for the felicities of his composition that probably few have ever felt, I have reason to think that little of this skill had been obtained at Hawkshead. As to Greek, that is a language which Wordsworth has never had energy enough to cultivate with effect.

From Hawkshead, and, I believe, after he had entered his eighteenth year, (a time which is tolerably early on the English plan,) probably at the latter end of the year 1787, Wordsworth entered at St John's College, Cambridge. St John's ranks as the second college in Cambridge—the second as to numbers and influence, and general consideration; in the estimation of the Johnians as the first, or at least as coequal in al

* In particular, and by way of giving an illustration, let me here mention one of those accidental revelations the unfold new aspects of nature: it was one that occurred to myself. I had gone up at all times of the morning and the year, to an eminence, or rather, a vast field of eminences, above Scor Crag, in the rear of Allan Bank, a Liverpool gentleman's mansion, from which is descried the deep and gloomy valley of Great Langdale. Not, however, for many years, had it happened that I found myself standing in that situation about four o'clock on a summer afternoon. A length, and on a favourable day, this accident occurred; and the scene which I then beheld, was one which I shall not wholly forget to my dying day. The effects arose from the position of the sun and of the spectator, taken in connexion with a pendulous mass of vapour, in which, however, were many rents and openings, and through them far below, at an abyss-like depth, was seen the gloomy valley, its rare cottages, and "unrejoicing" fir-trees. I have beheld the scene many times before; I was familiar with its least-important features, but now, it was absolutely transfigured, it was seen under lights and mighty shadows that made it no less marvellous to the eye than the memorable creation amongst the clouds and azure sky, which is described by the Solitary in "The Excursion. And, upon speaking of it to Wordsworth, I found that he had repeatedly witnessed the same impressive transfiguration; so that it is not evanescent, but dependent upon fixed and recoverable combinations of time and weather.

† Amongst the various attempts to justify Wordsworth's choice of so humble and even mean an occupation for his philosopher, how strange that the weightiest argument of all should have been omitted—viz., the privilege attach to his functions of penetrating without offence, and naturally, and at periodic intervals, to every fire-side.

things with Trinity ; from which, at any rate, the general reader will collect, that no such absolute supremacy is accorded to any society in Cambridge as in Oxford is accorded necessarily to Christ Church. The advantages of a large college are considerable, both to an idle man who wishes to lurk unnoticed in the crowd, and to the brilliant man, whose vanity could not be gratified by pre-eminence amongst a few. Wordsworth, though not idle as regarded his own pursuits, was so as regarded the pursuits of the place. With respect to them he felt—to use his own words—that his hour was not come ; and that his doom for the present was a happy obscurity, which left him, unvexed by the torments of competition, to the genial enjoyment of his life in its most genial hours.

It will excite some astonishment when I mention that, on coming to Cambridge, Wordsworth actually assumed the beau, or, in modern slang, the “dandy.” He dressed in silk stockings ; had his hair powdered ; and in all things plumed himself on his gentlemanly habits. To those who remember the slovenly dress of his middle and philosophic life, this will furnish matter for a smile.

Stranger still it is to tell, that, for the first time in his life, Wordsworth got “bouzy” at Cambridge. It is but fair to add, that the first time was also the last time. But perhaps the strangest part of the story is the occasion of this drunkenness ; which was in celebration of his first visit to the very rooms at Christ College once occupied by Milton—intoxication by way of homage to the most temperate of men, and this homage offered by one who has turned out himself to the full as temperate ! Still one must grant a privilege—and he would be a churl that could frown on such a claim—a privilege and charter of large enthusiasm to such an occasion. And an older man than Wordsworth, at that era not fully nineteen, and a man even without a poet’s blood in his veins, might have leave to forget his sobriety in such circumstances. Besides that, after all, I have heard, from Wordsworth’s own lips, that he was not too far gone to attend chapel decorously during the very acmé of his elevation.

The rooms which Wordsworth occupied at St John’s were singularly circumstanced ; mementos of what is highest and what is lowest in human things solicited the eye and the ear all day long. If the occupant approached the out-doors prospect, in one direction, there was visible through the great windows in the adjacent chapel of Trinity, the statue of Newton “with his silent face and prism,” memorials of the abstracting intellect, serene and absolute, emancipated from fleshly bonds. On the other hand, immediately below, stood the college kitchen ; and, in that region, from noon to dewy eve, resounded the shrill voice of scolding from the female ministers of the head cook, never suffering the mind to forget one of the meanest amongst human necessities. Wordsworth, however, as one who passed much of his time in social gaiety, was less in the way of this annoyance than a profounder student would have been. Probably he studied little beyond French and Italian during his Cambridge life ; not however at any time forgetting (as I had so much reason to complain, when speaking of my Oxonian contemporaries) the literature of his own country. It is true that he took the regular degree of A.B., and in the regular course ; but this was won in those days by a mere nominal examination, unless where the mathematical attainments of the student prompted his ambition to contest the honourable distinction of Senior Wrangler. This, in common with all other honours of the University, is won in our days with far severer effort than in that age of relaxed discipline ; but at no period could it have been won, let the malicious and the scornful say what they will, without an amount of mathematical skill very much beyond what has ever been exacted of its alumni by any other European university. Wordsworth was a profound admirer of the sublimer mathematics ; at least of the higher geometry. The secret of this admiration for geometry lay in the antagonism between this world of bodiless abstraction and the world of passion. And here I may mention appropriately, and I hope without any breach of confidence, that, in a great philosophic poem of Wordsworth’s, which is still in M.S., and will remain in M.S. until after his death, there is, at the opening of one of the books, a dream, which reaches the very ne plus ultra of sublimity in my opinion, expressly framed to illustrate the eternity and the independence of all social modes or fashions of existence, conceded to these two hemispheres, as it were, that compose the total world of human power—mathematics on the one hand, poetry on the other.

“The one that held acquaintance with the stars
—undisturbed by space or time ;
The other that was a god—yea, many gods—
Had voices more than all the winds, and was
A joy, a consolation, and a hope.”

I scarcely know whether I am entitled to quote—as my memory (though not refreshed by a sight of the poem for more than twenty years) would well enable me to do—any long extract ; but thus much I may allowably say, as it cannot in any way affect Mr Wordsworth’s interests, that the form of the dream is as follows ; and, by the way, even this form is not arbitrary ; but, with exquisite skill in the art of composition, is made to arise out of the situation in which the poet had previously found himself, and is faintly prefigured in the elements of that situation. He had been reading “Don Quixote” by the sea-side ; and, oppressed by the heat of the sun, he had fallen asleep whilst gazing on the barren sands before him. He dreams that, walking in some sandy wilderness of Africa, some endless Zaarah, he sees, at a distance

“An Arab of the desert, lance in rest, Mounted upon a dromedary.”

The Arab rides forward to meet him ; and the dreamer perceives, in the countenance of the rider, the agitation of fear, and that he often looks behind him in a troubled way, whilst in his hand he holds two books—one of which is Euclid's "Elements;" the other, which is a book and yet not a book, seeming, in fact, a shell as well as a book, sometimes neither, and yet both at once. The Arab directs him to apply his ear; upon which—

"In an unknown tongue, which yet I understood," the dreamer says that he heard

"A wild prophetic blast of harmony,
An ode, as if in passion utter'd, that foretold
Destruction to the people of this earth
By deluge near at hand."

The Arab, with grave countenance, assures him that it is even so; that all was true which had been said; and that he himself was riding upon a divine mission, having it in charge

"To bury those two books;

"The one that held acquaintance with the stars," &c.—that is, in effect, to secure the two great interests of poetry and mathematics from sharing in the watery ruin. As he talks, suddenly the dreamer perceives that the Arab's countenance grew more disturb'd," and that his eye was often reverted; upon which the dreaming poet also looks along the desert in the same direction; and in the far horizon he descries

—"a glittering light."

What is it? he asks of the Arab rider. "It is," said he, "the waters of the earth," that even then were travelling on their awful errand. Upon which, the poet sees this apostle of the desert riding off,

"With the fleet waters of the world in chase of him."

The sketch I have here given of this sublime dream sufficiently attests the interest which Wordsworth took in the peculiar studies of the place, and the exalted privilege which he ascribed to them of coeternity with "the vision and the faculty divine" of the poet—the destiny common to both, of an endless triumph over the ruins of nature and time. Meantime, he himself travelled no farther in these studies than through the six elementary books, usually selected from the fifteen of Euclid. Whatever might be the interests of his speculative understanding, whatever his admiration, practically he devoted himself to the more agitating interests of man, social and political, just then commencing that vast career of revolution which has never since been still or stationary; interests which, in his mind, alternated, however, with another and different interest, in the grander forms of external nature, as found in mountainous regions. In obedience to this latter passion, it was—for a passion it had become—that during one of his long Cambridge vacations, stretching from June to November, he went over to Switzerland and Savoy, for a pedestrian excursion amongst the Alps; taking with him, for his travelling companion, a certain Mr J——, of whom (excepting that he is once apostrophised in a sonnet, written at Calais in the year 1802) I never happened to hear him speak: whence I presume to infer, that Mr J—— owed this flattering distinction, not so much to any intellectual graces of his society as, perhaps, to his powers of administering "punishment" (in the language of the fancy to restive and mutinous landlords—for such were abroad in those days; people who presented huge reckonings with one hand, and, with the other, a huge cudgel, by way of opening the traveller's eyes to the propriety of paying them without demur. I do not positively know that to have been the case; but I have heard Wordsworth speak of the ruffian landlords who played upon his youth in the Grisons; and, however well qualified to fight his own battles, he might find, amongst such savage mountaineers, two combatants better than one. Wordsworth's route, on this occasion, lay, at first, through Austrian Flanders, then (1788, I think) on the fret for an insurrectionary war against the capricious innovations of the Imperial coxcomb Joseph II. He passed through the camps then forming, and thence ascended the Rhine to Switzerland; crossed the great St Bernard, visited the Lake of Como, and other interesting scenes in the north of Italy, where, by the way, the tourists were benighted in a forest—having, in some way or other, been misled by the Italian clocks, and their peculiar fashion of striking round to twenty-four o'clock. On his return, Wordsworth published a quarto pamphlet of verses, describing, with very considerable effect and brilliancy, the grand scenery amongst which he had been moving. This poem, as well as another in the same quarto form, describing the English lake scenery of Westmoreland and Cumberland, addressed, by way of letter, "to a young lady," (viz., Miss Wordsworth,) are remarkable, in the first place, as the earliest effort of Wordsworth in verse, at least as his earliest publication; but, in the second place, and still more so, from their style of composition. "Pure description," even where it cannot be said, sneeringly, "to hold the place of sense," is so little attractive as the direct or exclusive object of a poem, and in reality it exacts so powerful an effort on the part of the reader to realize visually, or make into an apprehensible unity the scattered elements and circumstances brought together, that, inevitably and reasonably, it can never hope to be a popular form of composition; else it is highly probable that these "Descriptive Sketches" of Wordsworth, though afterwards condemned as vicious in their principles of composition, by his own maturer taste, would really have gained him a high momentary notoriety with the public, had they been fairly brought under its notice: whilst, on the other hand, his revolutionary principles of composition, and his purer taste, ended in obtaining for him nothing but scorn and ruffian insolence. This seems marvellous; but, in fact, it is not so: it seems, I mean, prima facie marvellous, that the inferior models should be fitted to gain a far higher reputation; but the secret lies here—that these were in a taste which, though frequently spurious and hollow, had been long reconciled to the public feelings, and which,

besides, have a specific charm for certain minds, even apart from all fashions of the day; whereas, the other had to struggle against sympathies long trained in an opposite direction, to which the recovery of a healthier tone (even where nature had made it possible) presupposed a difficult process of weaning, and an effort of discipline for reorganising the whole internal economy of the sensibilities, that is both painful and mortifying: for—and that is worthy of deep attention—the misgivings of any vicious or unhealthy state; the impulses and auspicious gleams of the truth struggling with cherished error; the instincts of light conflicting with darkness—these are the real causes of that hatred and intolerant scorn which is ever awakened by the first dawns of new and important systems of truth. Therefore it is that Christianity was so much more hated than any mere novel variety of error. Therefore are the first feeble struggles of nature towards a sounder state of health, always harsh and discordant; for the false system which this change for the better disturbs, had, at least, this nothing advantage—that it was self-consistent. Therefore, also, was the Wordsworthian restoration of elementary power, and of a higher or transcendent truth of nature, (or, as some people vaguely expressed the case, of simplicity), received at first with such malignant disgust. For there was a galvanic awakening in the shock of power, as it jarred against the ancient system of prejudices, which inevitably revealed so much of truth as made the mind jealous that all was not right, and just so far affected as to be dissatisfied with its existing creed, but not at all raised up to the level of the new creed; enlightened enough to decry its own wanderings, but not enough to recover the right road. The more energetic, the more spasmodically potent are the throes of nature towards her own re-establishment in the cases of suspended animation, by drowning, strangling, &c., the more keen is the anguish of revival. And universally, a transition state is a state of suffering and disquiet. Meantime, the early poems of Wordsworth, that might have suited the public taste so much better than his more serious efforts, if the fashion of the hour, or the sanction of a leading review, or the prestige of a name in the author, had happened to give them a season's currency, did in fact drop unnoticed into the market. No where have I seen them quoted, no not even since the author's victorious establishment in the public admiration. The reason may be, however, that not many copies were printed at first; no subsequent edition was ever called for; and yet, from growing interest in the author, every copy of the small impression had been studiously brought up. Indeed, I myself went to the publishers (Johnson's) as early as 1805 or 1806, and bought up all the remaining copies, (which were but six or seven of the Foreign Sketches, and two or three of the English,) as presents, and as future curiosities in literature to literary friends, whose interest in Wordsworth might assure one of a due value being put upon the poem. Were it not for this extreme scarcity,* I am disposed to think that many lines or passages would long ere this have been made familiar to the public ear. Some are delicately, some forcibly picturesque; and the selection of circumstances is occasionally very original and felicitous. In particular, I remember this one, which presents an accident in rural life that must by thousands of repetitions have become intimately known to every dweller in the country, and yet had never before been consciously taken up for a poet's use. After having described the domestic cock as "sweetly ferocious"—a prettiness of phraseology which he borrows from an Italian author—he notices those competitions or defiance which are so often carried on interchangeably from great distances:—

"Echo'd by faintly answering farms remote."

This is the beautiful line in which he has caught and preserved so ordinary an occurrence—one, in fact, of the commonplaces, which lend animation and a moral interest to rural life.

After his return from this Swiss excursion, Wordsworth took up his parting residence at Cambridge, and prepared for a final adieu to academic pursuits and academic society. It was about this period that the French Revolution broke out: and the reader who would understand its appalling effects—its convulsing, revolutionary effects upon Wordsworth's heart and soul—should consult the history of the Solitary, as given by himself in "The Excursion;" for that picture is undoubtedly a leaf from the personal experience of Wordsworth:—

"From that dejection I was roused—

"But how?"—&c.

Mighty was the transformation which it wrought in the whole economy of his thoughts; miraculous almost was the expansion which it gave to his human sympathies; chiefly in this it shewed its effects—in throwing the thoughts inwards into grand meditations upon man, his final destiny, his ultimate capacities of elevation; and, secondly, in giving to the whole system of the thoughts and feelings a firmer tone, and a sense of the awful realities which surround the mind; by comparison with which the previous literary tastes seemed (even where they were fine and elegant, as in Collins or Gray, unless where they had the self-sufficing reality of religion, as in Cowper) fanciful and trivial. In all lands this result was accomplished, and at the same time: Germany, above all, found her new literature the mere creation and product of this great moral tempest; and in Germany or England alike, the poetry was so entirely regenerated, thrown into moulds of thought and of feeling so new—so primary—so different from the old worn-out channels in which they had been trained to flow—that the poets everywhere felt themselves to be putting away childish things, and now at length—now first (as regarded the eighteenth century) entering upon the dignity and the sincere thinking of mature manhood.

Wordsworth, it is well known to all who know anything of his history, felt himself so fascinated by the gorgeous festival era of the Revolution—that era when the sleeping snakes which afterwards stung the national felicity, were yet covered with flowers—that he went over to Paris, and spent about one entire year between that city, Orleans, and Blois. There, in fact, he continued to reside almost too long. He had been sufficiently connected with public men to have drawn upon himself some notice from those who afterwards composed the Committee of Public Safety. And, as an Englishman, when the war had once obliterated the too fervent and too indulgent partiality which, at an earlier period of the revolutionary movement, had settled upon the English name, he became an object of gloomy suspicion with those even who would have grieved that he should fall a victim to undistinguishing popular violence. Already for England, and in her behalf, he was thought to be that spy which (as Mr Coleridge tells us, in his Biographia Literaria) afterwards he was accounted by Mr Pitt's emissaries in the worst of services, against her. I doubt, however, (let me say it, by the way, without impeachment of Mr Coleridge's veracity—for he was easily duped,) this whole story about Mr Pitt's Somersetshire spies; and it has often struck me with astonishment, that Mr Coleridge should have suffered his personal pride to take so false a direction as to court the humble distinction of having been suspected as a spy, in those very years when poor empty tympanies of men, such as G——, Thelwall, Holcroft, were actually recognised as enemies of the state, and worthy of a State surveillance, by Ministers so blind and grossly misinformed as, on this point, were Pitt and Dundas. Had I been Coleridge, instead of saving Mr Pitt's reputation with posterity by ascribing to him a jealousy which he or his agents had not the discernment to cherish, I would have boldly planted myself upon the fact, the killing fact, that he had utterly despised both myself, Coleridge to wit, and Wordsworth—even with Dogberry, I would have insisted upon that—"Set down, also, that I am an ass!" I would have exulted in this fact; it should have been my glory—namely, that two men, whom, in their intellectual faculties, posterity will acknowledge as equal to any age, were scorned and slighted as too contemptible for fear; whilst others, so gross and vulgar in style of mind as this Holcroft, this Thelwall, this—(what is his name?)—were as brainlessly feared by Mr Pitt's cabinet as ever Bottom was adored by Titania. What a perversion of pride! that Coleridge should have sought, by lending his ear to fables which Wordsworth's far sterner principle views as lies,* to gain the fanciful honour of standing upon Mr Pitt's pocket-list of traitors and French spies; when, after all, they stood confessedly in that list as tenth-rate and most inconsiderable villains. Heavens! that was a strange ambition, that, rather than be wholly forgotten by Mr Pitt, (in which fate there was, by possibility, a great dignity,) would seek to figure amongst the very rear-guard of his traitors!

In France, however, Wordsworth had a chance, in good earnest, of passing for the traitor that, in England, no rational person ever thought him. He had chosen his friends carelessly; nor could any man, the most sagacious, have chosen them safely, in a time when the internal schisms of the very same general party brought with them worse hostilities and more personal perils than even, upon the broader divisions of party, could have attended the most ultra professions of anti-national politics, and when the rapid changes of position shifted the peril from month to month. One individual is specially recorded by Wordsworth, in the poem on his own life, as a man of the highest merit, and personal qualities the most brilliant, who ranked first upon the list of Wordsworth's friends; and this man was so far a safe friend, at one moment, as he was a republican general—finally, indeed, a commander-in-chief. This was Beaupuis; and the description of his character and position is singularly interesting. There is, in fact, a special value and a use about the case; it opens one's eyes feelingly to the fact that, even in this thoughtless people, so full of vanity and levity—nevertheless the awful temper of the times, and the dread burthen of human interests with which it was charged—had called to a consciousness of new duties—had summoned to an audit, as if

* The reader, who may happen not to have seen Mr Coleridge's Biographia Literaria, is informed that Mr Coleridge tells a long story about a man who followed and dogged himself and Mr Wordsworth in all their rural excursions, under a commission (originally emanating from Mr Pitt) for detecting some overt acts of treason, or treasonable correspondence; or, in default of either, some words of treasonable conversation. Unfortunately for his own interests as an active servant, capable of bagging a promising amount of game, within a week or so, even in a whole month, that spy had collected nothing at all as the basis of a report, excepting only something which they (Coleridge and Wordsworth to wit) were continually saying to each other, now in blame, now in praise, of one Spy Noxy; and this, praise and blame alike, the honest spy very naturally took to himself—seeing that the world accused him of having a nose of unreasonable dimensions, and his own conscience accused him of being a spy. "Now," says Mr Coleridge, "the very fact was, that Wordsworth and I were constantly talking about Spinoza." This story makes a very good Joe Miller; but, for other purposes, is somewhat damaged. However, there is one excellent story in the case. Some country gentleman from the neighbourhood of Nether Stowey, upon a party happening to discuss the probabilities that Wordsworth and Coleridge might be traitors and in correspondence with the French Directory, answered thus:—"Oh, as to that Coleridge, he's a rattle-brain, that will say more in a week than he will stand to in a twelvemonth. But Wordsworth—that's the traitor: why, God bless me, he's so close on the subject that, d—n me if you'll ever hear him open his lips on the subject from year's end to year's end!"

at some great final tribunal, even the gay, radiant creatures that, under less solemn auspices, under the reign of a Francis I. or a Louis XIV., would have been the merest painted butterflies of the court-sunshine. This Beaupuis was a man of superb person—beautiful in a degree which made him a model of male beauty, both as to face and figure; and, accordingly, in a land where conquests of that nature were so easy, and the subjects of so trifling an effort, he had been distinguished, to his own as well as the public eyes, by a rapid succession of bonnes fortunes amongst women. Such, and so glorified by triumphs the most unquestionable and flattering, had the earthquake of the revolution found him. From that moment, he had no leisure, not a thought, to bestow upon his former selfish and frivolous pursuits. He was hurried, as one inspired by some high apostolic passion, into the service of the unhappy and desolate serfs amongst his own countrymen—such as are described, at an earlier date, by Madame de Sevigné, as the victims of feudal institutions; and one day as he was walking with Wordsworth in the neighbourhood of Orleans, and they had turned into a little, quiet lane, leading off from a heath, suddenly they came upon the following spectacle: A girl, seventeen or eighteen years old, hunger-bitten, and wasted to a meagre shadow, was knitting, in a dejected, drooping way; whilst to her arm was attached, by a rope, the horse, equally famished, that earned the miserable support of her family. Beaupuis comprehended the scene in a moment; and, seizing Wordsworth by the arm, he said—"Dear English friend!—brother from a nation of freemen!—that it is that is the curse of our people, in their widest division; and to cure this it is, as well as to maintain our work against the kings of the earth, that blood must be shed and tears must flow for many years to come!" At that time, the revolution had not fulfilled its purposes; as yet, the King was on the throne; the fatal 10th of August 1792 had not dawned;* and, as yet, there was safety for a subject of kings. But the irresistible stream was hurrying forwards. The King fell; and (to pause for a moment) how divinely is the fact recorded by Wordsworth in the M.S. poem on his own life, placing the awful scenes past and passing in Paris under a pathetic relief from the description of the golden, autumnal day, sleeping in sunshine—

"When I
Towards the fierce metropolis bent my steps
The homeward road to England. From his throne
The King had fallen"—&c.

What a picture does he give of the fury which there possessed the public mind; of the frenzy which shone in every eye, and through every gesture; of the stormy groups assembled at the Palais Royal, or the Tuileries, with "hissing factionists" for ever in their centre, "hissing" from the self-baffling of their own madness, and incapable from wrath of speaking clearly; of fear already creeping over the manners of multitudes; of stealthy movements through back streets; plotting and counter-plotting in every family; feuds to extermination, dividing children of the same house for ever; scenes such as those of the Chapel Royal, (now silenced on that public stage,) repeating themselves daily amongst private friends; and, to shew the universality of this maniacal possession—that it was no narrow storm discharging its fury by local concentration upon a single city, but that it overspread the whole realm of France—a picture is given, wearing the same features, of what passed daily at Orleans, Blois, and other towns. The citizens are described in the attitudes they assumed at the daily coming-in of the post from Paris; the fierce sympathy is portrayed, with which they echoed back the feelings of their compatriots in the capital: men of all parties had been there up to this time; aristocrats as well as democrats—and one in particular of the former class is put forward as a representative of his class. This man, duly as the hour arrived which brought the Parisian newspapers, read restlessly of the tumults and insults amongst which the Royal Family now passed their days; of the decrees by which his own order were threatened or assailed; of the self-expatriation, now continually swelling in amount, as a measure of despair on the part of myriads, as well priests as gentry—all this and worse he read in public; and still as he read,

"his hand
Haunted his sword like an uneasy spot
In his own body."

In short, as there never has been so strong a national convulsion diffused so widely with equal truth, it may be asserted that no describer, so powerful, or idealizing so magnificently what he deals with, has ever been a real living spectator of parallel scenes. The French, indeed, it may be said, are far enough from being a people pro-

* How little has any adequate power as yet approached this great theme! Not the Grecian stage—not "the dark streets of the line of Thebes," in any of its scenes, unfolds such tragical grouping of circumstances and situations as may be gathered from the memoirs of the time. The galleries and vast staircases of Versailles, at early dawn, on some of the greatest days—the tempestuous gathering of the mobs—the figure of the Duke of Orleans obscurely detected amongst them—the growing fury—the growing panic—the blind tumult—and the dimness of the event—all make up a scene worthy to blend with our time-hallowed images of Babylon or of Nineveh with the enemy in all her pines, Memphis or Jerusalem in their agonies. But, amongst all the exponents of the growing agitation that besieged the public mind, none is so profoundly impressive as the scene (every Sunday renewed) at the Chapel Royal. Even in the most penitential of the litanies, in the presence when most immediately confessed of God himself—when the antiphonies were chanted, one party singing, with fury and gnashing of teeth, Salvum fac regem, and another, with equal hatred and fervour, answering Et Reginam—the organ roared into thunder—the semi-chorus swelled into shouting—the menaces into defiance—the agitation into tempestuous fury—again the crashing semi-chorus sang with shouts their Salvum fac regem—again the vengeful antiphony hurled back its Et Reginam—and one person, an eye-witness of these scenes, which mounted in violence on each successive Sunday, declares that, sometimes, the semi-choral bodies were at the point of fighting with each other in the presence of the King.

found in feeling. True ; but of all people, they most exhibit their feeling on the surface ; are the most demonstrative (to use a modern term ;) and most of all mark their feelings by outward expression of gesticulation and fervent enunciation : not to insist upon the obvious truth—that even a people of shallow feeling may be deeply moved by tempests which uproot the forest of a thousand years' growth ; by changes in the very organization of society, that throw all things, for a time, into one vast anarchy ; and by murderous passions, alternately the effect and the cause of that same chaotic anarchy. Now, it was in this autumn of 1792, as I have already said, that Wordsworth parted finally from his illustrious friend—for, all things considered, he may be justly so entitled—the gallant Beaupuis. This great season of public trial had searched men's natures ; revealed their real hearts ; brought into light and action qualities oftentimes not suspected by their possessors ; and had thrown men, as in elementary states of society, each upon his own native resources, unaided by the old conventional forces of rank and birth. Beaupuis had shone to unusual advantage under this general trial ; he had discovered, even to the philosophic eye of Wordsworth, a depth of benignity, very unusual in a Frenchman ; and not of local, contracted benignity, but of large, illimitable, apostolic devotion to the service of the poor and the oppressed—a fact the more remarkable as he had all the pretensions in his own person of high birth and high rank ; and, so far as he had any personal interest embarked in the struggle, should have allied himself with the aristocracy. But of selfishness in any shape, he had no vestiges : or, if he had, it shewed itself in a slight tinge of vanity ; yet, no—it was not vanity, but a radiant quickness of sympathy with the eye which expressed admiring love—sole relic of the chivalrous devotion once limited to the service of ladies. Now, again, he put on the garb of chivalry ; it was a chivalry the noblest in the world, which opened his ear to the Pariah and the oppressed all over his mis-organized country. A more apostolic fervour of holy zealotry in this great cause, had not been seen since the days of Bartholomew las Casas, who shewed the same excess of feeling in another direction. This sublime dedication of his being to a cause which, in his conception of it, extinguished all petty considerations for himself, and made him thenceforwards a creature of the national will—"a son of France," in a more eminent and loftier sense than according to the heraldry of Europe—had extinguished even his sensibility to the voice of worldly honour : "injuries," says Wordsworth—

Made him more gracious."

And so utterly had he submitted his own will or separate interests to the transcendent voice of his country, which, in the main, he believed to be now speaking authentically for the first time since the foundations of Christendom, that, even against the motions of his own heart, he adopted the hatreds of the young Republic, growing cruel in his purposes towards the ancient oppressor, out of very excess of love for the oppressed ; and, against the voice of his own order, as well as in stern oblivion of many early friendships, he became the champion of democracy in the struggle everywhere commencing with prejudice or feudal privilege. Nay, he went so far upon the line of this new crusade against the evils of the world, that he even accepted, with a conscientious defiance of his own inevitable homage to the erring spirit of loyalty embarked upon that cause, a commission in the Republican armies preparing to move against La Vendée ; and, finally, in that cause, as commander-in-chief, he laid down his life. "He perished," says Wordsworth——"perished, fighting in supreme command,

Upon the banks of the unhappy Loire."

Homewards fled all the English from a land which now was fast filling its prisons, and making ready the shambles for its noblest citizens. Thither also came Wordsworth ; and then he spent his time for a year and more, in London chiefly, overwhelmed with shame and despondency for the disgrace and scandal brought upon liberty by the atrocities committed in that holy name. Upon this subject he dwells with deep emotion in the poem on his own life ; and he records the awful triumph for retribution accomplished, which possessed him when crossing the sands of the great Bay of Morecambe from Lancaster to Ulverstone ; and hearing from a horseman who passed him, in reply to his question—was there any news ?—"Yes, that Robespierre had perished." Immediately, a passion seized him, a transport of almost epileptic fervour, prompting him, as he stood alone upon this perilous* waste of sands, to shout aloud anthems of thanksgiving for this great vindication of eternal justice. Still, though justice was done upon one great traitor to the cause, the cause itself was overcast with clouds too heavily to find support and employment for the hopes of a poet who had believed in a golden era ready to open upon the prospects of human nature. It gratified and solaced his heart, that the indignation of mankind should have wreaked itself upon the chief monsters that had outraged their nature and their hopes; but for the present he found it necessary to comfort his disappointment, by turning away from politics to studies less capable of deceiving his expectations.

* That tract of the lake country which stretches southwards from Hawkshead and the lakes of Esthwaite, Windermere, and Coniston, to the little town of Ulverstone, (which may be regarded as the metropolis of the little romantic English Calabria, called Turness,) is divided from the main part of Lancashire by the estuary of Morecambe. The sea retires with the ebb tide to a vast distance, leaving the sands passable for a few hours for horses and carriages. But partly from the daily variation in these hours, partly from the intricacy of the pathless track which must be pursued, and partly from the galloping pace at which the returning tide comes in, many fatal accidents are continually occurring—sometimes to the too venturesome traveller who has slighted the aid of guides—sometimes to the guides themselves, when baffled and perplexed by mists. Gray the poet mentions one of the latter class, as having then recently occurred under affecting circumstances. Local tradition records a long list of interesting cases.

From this period, therefore—that is, from the year 1794–5—we may date the commencement of Wordsworth's entire self-dedication to poetry as the study and main business of his life. Somewhere about this period, also, (though, according to my remembrance of what Miss Wordsworth once told me, I think one year or so later,) his sister joined him; and they began to keep house together: once at Race Down, in Dorsetshire; once at Clevedon, on the coast of Somersetshire; then amongst the Quantock Hills, in the same county, or in that neighbourhood; and, at length, at Alfoxton, a beautiful country house, with a grove and shrubbery attached, belonging to Mr St Aubyn, a minor, and let (I believe) on the terms of keeping the house in repair. Whilst resident at this last place it was, as I have generally understood, and in the year 1797 or 1798, that Wordsworth first became acquainted with Coleridge; though, possibly, in the year I am wrong; for it occurs to me that, in a poem published in 1796, there is an allusion to a young writer, of the name of Wordsworth, as one who had something austere in his style, but otherwise was more original than any other poet of the age; and it is probable that this, and knowledge of the poetry, would be subsequent to a personal knowledge of the author, considering the little circulation which any poetry of a Wordsworthian stamp would be likely to attain at that time.

WHO IS A LIAR?

Who is a liar?—his guises what?
Come listen awhile, and I'll tell you, Pat.
That portly sage, with the ruby nose,
Who waddles in fat as he churchward goes.
Why, that's an apostle—a Peter, a Paul.
He'd tell you so—he's a bishop—that's all.
Tis no narrow path that the sycophant trede,
A Broadway of smiles was his heavenward road.
Did he court the smile of the lowly and poor?
No—the smile of his Lordship and Lordship's —.
And he smiled when the curse was loud and long,
And gaily cheered at the libertine's song;
He quoted the Bible with delicate sneer,
And blasphemy minced in his patron's ear;
And along the high-road of preferment was driven—
An apostle of Christ, with a call from heaven.
Who is a liar?—his guises what?
Come listen awhile, and I'll tell you, Pat.

There stands the patriot—fired with zeal,
He'd brave the stake for public weal.
How his heart was consumed for his country's cause!
And the skies might fall, but he'd stand by the clause—
His country—his conscience!—ah! dearer than life!
For conscience and country he'd die in the strife.
Behold the placeman!—what reck's he,
At Windsor, where the cause may be?
The cause must yield to beauty's charms;
The placeman smiles, and folds his arms;
His conscience will sleep in the storm, as calm
As the innocent sleep of the harmless lamb
'Mid the howl of the tempest—the hurricane's sweep;—
To the trill of the nightingale's music 'twill sleep.
But the patriot wakes?—To suppose it were stupid—
They are one and the same, by the soul of Cupid.

CYRUS.

THE CORN-LAWS AGAIN.

BEFORE the rulers of his fate
The poor man humbly stands;
His cheek is wan, his eye is sunk,
Toil-hardened are his hands.

Care-worn his face, and deep the stamp
Of sorrow and despair;
Though blasted be his faded form,
A heart is beating there—

A heart that, spite of human laws,
Is true to nature's ties,
And swells when'er he dares to think
Of this life's destinies.

Unto the Molochs of the land
He oft hath made appeal—
"Give, give to me my daily bread"—
But, no!—their heart is steel.

The wife that to his manly breast
In hopeful youth he took,
Must sink beneath the deadly blows
By stern Starvation strook.

His children, clinging to his knee,
Have begged of him for bread;
And in his bitterness of soul,
He sobs and hangs his head.

His brother-worms fare sumptuously
Their lands are broad and fair;
Of want and wretchedness like his
What should they know or care?

Stern were the laws which History tells Old Draco writ in blood;
But sterner far must be the code
That takes the poor man's food.

How long shall toil, without its meed,
Be all his earthly doom?
How long shall life to thousands be
A sunless, joyless tomb?

How long, how long shall selfishness
And might o'er right prevail?
Arise! ye millions, at whose voice
Earth's pigmy things must quail!

THE QUEEN AND THE BEGGARMAN.

A NEW AND TRUE BALLAD.

THERE was a jolly beggarman
A-begging oft had been ;
And at last he went a-begging
To the pretty little Queen—
 With a whack row de dow dow, fol de dol de dee.

Oh, he wouldn't beg for praties,
Nor he wouldn't beg for meal ;
But he begged for scraps of freedom
For himself and all his Tail—
 With a whack, &c.

So off he went, with this intent,
And with him went a throng too ;
And when he reached her palace gate,
He rapped both loud and long too—
 With a whack, &c.

The Queen's engaged, her porters state ;
But that was all a bam :
She was only sitting tête-à-tête,
Along with her pet Lamb—
 At their crack, &c.

So at the gate he had to wait,
Himself and all the boys ;
"But, until I see herself," says he ;
"Or, Sow! I'll make a noise—
 With a whack," &c.

Another message then was sent—
"Her Majesty's at prayers ;"
But, the noise increasing still, she went,
To see the cause, up stairs,
 Of their whack, &c.

She trembling there, with doubts and fears,
To see this begging crew—
Cries, "They'll pull this house about our ears !
Oh, dear! what shall I do ?
 With their whack," &c.

Says Lamb, quite pat, "We'll manage that,
If you'll do as I warn ye—
To give their Chief both bread and beef,
And feed the rest with blarney,
 And whack," &c.

But when they saw her pretty eyes,
With cheers and whillaloo,
They threw their caubens* to the skies,
And that soon brought her to—
 With a whack, &c.

This changed her mind ; and, growing kind,
She says, "I'll go salute them.
Says her men of war, "Twere better far,
To let us go and shoot them,
 And their whack," &c.

* Old hats.

But says Lamb & Co., "You need not go,
For we'll go parliamenting,
To stop their voice with votes and noise,
And save you from consenting
 To their whack," &c.

Still the boys without would bawl and shout,
And liked to raise a riot,
Till mighty Dan would wave his hand,
And tell them to keep quiet—
 With a whack, &c.

So, to treat between the crowd and Queen,
Their chief soon gained admission ;
And, with scrapes, and bows, and loyal vows,
There hands her his petition.
 With a whack, &c.

"To refuse me and these boys without
I'm sure you're not so cruel—
You're the world's darling, without doubt—
You're a diamond of a jewel !
 With a whack, &c.

Sure, you're far too grand for any man"—
(You see, he wished to please her)—
"Ay, even for Brian Bourroo, himself,
Or ould Nebuchandesor—
 With a whack," &c.

"Well, indeed, I'd grant you all you want,
You're so modest and engaging ;
But then, you see, 'tween you and me,
Their Lordships would be raging,
 With their whack, &c.

"And the Bishops, too, that holy crew,
Though waiting my translation,
If I should grant you what you want,
Would shut me from salvation—
 In their black, &c.

"And you must admit it is not fit I'd treat with a Precursor."—
"If you wont," says Dan, "adopt my plan,
You must a worse and worse—
 With a whack, &c.

"For, to tell you plain, we'll not again
A-begging here be seen ;
If you won't consent, we'll parliament
Ourselves in College Green—
 With a whack," &c.

"Then, I must get my Cabinet
To meet in consultation."—
So, there we leave the whole conclave
To mystify the nation,
 With their clack, &c.

PARABAWN.

SONG.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

LAND of the Men who brought before
All nations, in all times,
A King, soul-gorged with pride and gore,
And slew him for his crimes !
Shall we not name thy name with pride,
Famed Mother of the brave ?
Who would not die as Hampden died,
That looks on Sidney's grave ?
O'er it thy mountain summits rise,
Thy dewy roses bloom ;
We stand upon it—Here he lies !
Thou, Britain, art his tomb !

Yet scorners say, thy hills and vales
Are cur'd from sea to sea ;
"The land of palaces and jails"
Derision nameth thee.
For shameful stripes thy children fight,
Or labour in despair,
Where demons tax the blessed light,
And taint with plague the air.
Land of the wise, the great, the good !
When wilt thou break thy chains,
And startle into honest blood
The filth in tyrants' veins ?

BLANCHE DELAMERE.

CHAPTER V.

Swing and his Satellites.

We left the inmates of the Abbey of the Holy Cross in confusion worse confounded. In the conflagration of a great house, like the end of a battle, the general maxim is, Sauve qui peut; and when the little Lady Blanche, having struggled out of the arms of her Arab rescuer, flew back to her grandmother, she found that noble lady abandoned by all her servants, and in something like cataleptic rigour, from which it was difficult to rouse her faculties.

"Haste, haste, my lady grandma!" cried the little girl, clasping her arms fondly about the rigid, motionless lady; "I will carry you; Hassan will carry you. Oh! come, my own father's mother—come with us—with Hassan!" A myriad of broken, confused, and distracted thoughts flashed, as in a night-mare dream, across the brain of the perturbed lady. She was in the psychological state of the little tipsy old woman in the ballad, who doubted her own identity. Was she indeed Marguerite Countess of Delamere, sole representative of an illustrious line—alone, deserted by "her people," and her mansion in flames over her head, from the torch of villainous and ungrateful incendiaries? And was this England? The Arab gave no time for rumination or parley; and a more unceremonious handling down the great staircase than his could not well be imagined. In the open air, the discordant voices of the people and the glare of the torches acted upon her senses and partially restored them. She was hurried, dragged across the lawn, and flung upon a bench under a solitary and magnificent beech tree, whence she might undisturbed contemplate the progress of the conflagration.

"It might better have become the last Delamere to have perished in the ashes of the old nest," said the reviving lady; "but God's will be done."

"Oh, don't be sorry, dear grandmamma," said her only companion, venturing to caress her aged relative with more freedom than at any previous time of their intercourse. "Fred will soon put out the fire, and you will get back to your own warm room again—never fear that. Let me put my little shawl round your feet." And, as the girl knelt to perform this act of attention, the aged Countess, under the influence of one of those electric touches which sooner or later come to all, suddenly kissed the affectionate and intelligent creature ministering to her comfort; and Blanche, though she had often endured her grandmother's formal salute, felt that this was the first motherly kiss that had ever been given to her. She repeatedly kissed her grandmother's hand; and, looking up with her mother's eyes, which glowed through tears, exclaimed—"Grandmamma, you love Blanche? Do you? Not so well as Mrs Thompson at the laundry loves little Lucy. Oh, she is so happy, that poor child!

—But some little you love me. Ah, when I feared you should be burned alive, poor old grandma! how I loved you then—when we came back to you! But now!"

"Did you indeed return for me? Do you indeed love grandmamma, Blanche? You are a strange, a very strange child. . . . Who else cares for me?" added the lady, sorrowfully but haughtily, recalling in full force her lonely situation, as the deserter, Dr Hayley, approached in haste. "My people, base poltroons, fled—leaving their too generous, too easy mistress to the protection of a foreign menial, and the kindness of a child. My friends—those who had called themselves"—

"Madam, you wrong your servants," interrupted the Doctor, "and the most devoted and faithful, though the humblest of your friends. I had flown for aid to convey you to a place of safety." The good doctor said nothing of sundry small matters of cash and papers in his own apartment, hastily secured about his person; yet his statement was substantially true. "I find I have been anticipated. The flames are happily completely subdued. To the main building there never was any danger, thanks to the courage of a young hero, or rather to the knowledge and self-possession of a young philosopher, who has to-night earned the gratitude of every friend of your Ladyship and the family."

"It is Fred," cried Blanche, exultingly. "He is the gardener's nephew, Lucy's cousin, and a scholar—not a gentleman. Oh, he is so clever and good—and they are all so proud of him! He is the friend of Hassan, and knows our language very well. I love him very much myself. . . . Oh, here he comes"—and she sprang towards the youth, who was eagerly advancing, bareheaded, and blackened in the face.

"You are safe, Lady Blanche?" said he, eagerly.

"Yes, yes; come, Fred, to grandmamma. And she dragged the lad forward, who, on recognising the august and awful Countess, was modestly shrinking back.

"Ah, this is your Ladyship's young champion against the Fire-king," said Dr Hayley. "Though he does bear sable tokens of the combat, permit me to present Mr Frederick Leighton to your Ladyship." The Countess saw a handsome, slight boy, with a pale and interesting, though shockingly begrimed face. An expression of mildness and benignity, and a smile of singular sweetness—at least as his eyes fell upon the triumphant little lady who held his hand—were more remarkable than the features. The Countess was most gracious.

"The family of Delamere, this young lady and myself, are, I understand, indebted to you, sir; and a Delamere never forgets a service, nor yet an injury." She extended her hand. The abashed youth muttered some words of acknowledgment, and bowed most deferentially upon the gracious hand of the lady, for he literally fell fainting at her feet,

"Poor boy! his feelings have overcome him; he is unused to a presence like ours."

Dr Hayley had more serious fears. "The poor fellow has, I fear, sustained some severe personal injury while on the roof of the wing. Where, Lady Blanche, is Hassan?—he is a skilful leech." Here Lady Blanche ran screaming across the lawn towards her "Arab friend;" and, as the Countess was now surrounded by "her people," steward, butler, housekeeper, own maid, and own footman, all alike respectfully eloquent, in protestations of attachment, and explanations of the accident; and as the bench and the sward around her became literally cushioned, clothed, and carpeted for her comfort, as if by enchantment, no one regarded the Arab, the heiress, or the fainting boy.

"Take him to my own nursery; we will watch him ourselves, Hassan—his arm, you say, broke?—only broke—boys don't die of broken arms—Fred shall not die!"—And the Lady Blanche heroically cut away the sleeves of the boy, and his blood-clotted hair; and, under the directions of the Arab, who was indeed no contemptible surgeon, performed the besprinkling duties necessary in such cases. She then flew back to poor "Madam Grandma," who, now leaning on the arm of Dr Hayley, was contemplating the ravages of the fire, so happily arrested by the intelligence, courage, and activity of Frederick Leighton. "He is a noble boy," said the Countess, unusually excited; "and I have long marked him. It is the privilege of English nobility to patronise and reward talent in the lower orders. I shall write to the commander-in-chief; or, should he prefer the Church, I have livings in my gift. And Blanche is a good child, too," added she, as the girl burst to her through the phalanx of servants.

"And he is living, grandmother! I put water on his face, and he would not live; I held smelling salts to him, and Hassan gave him a good shake, and he would not live. And then I wept, and kissed him, and kissed him, and he lived! He opened his eyes so wide, and said, 'How good, Lady Blanche!'" Dr Hayley smiled, and made his usual significant gesture of silence. The features of the Countess were assuming that peevish, perplexed look, called forth by the odd ways of her grandchild, when Blanche, who had a savage's acuteness in all her senses, called out—"Hark! I hear the tramp of horses." This was disputed for some minutes, until the more distant beat of the horses' feet, and the flash of torches in the woods, proved that the troops sent for were approaching.

"Thank heaven!" ejaculated the Countess. "Browne, Mr Grimshaw," (she addressed her head-butler and her steward,) "is the ruffian named Swing, the villanous incendiary, secured? I should wish the military to find that my household is not altogether inadequate to the defence of my property." Mr Browne was half-afraid to tell that there was no trace of any strange incendiary; and yet that both he and Dr Hayley, and indeed every one whom the care of their own goods and chattels had given leisure for observation, noticed some very suspicious circumstances attending the fire. It had broken out in the steward's business-room; and, what was remarkable, while the furniture and building timber were nearly unharmed, a mass of valuable and important papers had been consumed, and even thick account-books destroyed in their strong stone and iron repositories. What the flames had spared, water had wasted; and all was one heap of inextricable confusion.

The steward wrung his hands in despair. He was ruined! forever ruined! The scene was over-acted; and Dr Hayley, remembering the hint he had received from Frederick Leighton, coolly bade the worthy man be composed, for the butler should maintain vigilant watch over the half-burned premises, until the affair could be probed to the bottom by the proper functionaries, who might, perhaps, find it necessary to call in the assistance of some of the keen-sighted gentlemen of Bow Street. It was long afterwards universally alleged by the servants, that Mr Grimshaw had changed colour and started at this hint.

"Bow Street officers, thief-takers! rummaging the dwelling of my noble and honoured mistress, under the direction of a county magistrate—of probably Jervis Yates—taking the deposition of the Countess of Delamere! May the old eyes of the faithful follower of her house be spared that sight!"

"Ay, indeed, Doctor, how should you talk of Bow Street officers and Jervis Yates ransacking my family repositories—taking my deposition—about the base, low wretches who have fired the mansion of the Delameres! But the military gentlemen approach. I charge you, Browne, that all fitting attention and hospitality be shewn to our brave defenders, his Majesty's troops. The commanding officer will, no doubt, wait upon me for his further orders—I mean for the necessary explanations."

"And leave to me, my Lady, to the most devoted and now the oldest servant of your house, to look after Swing, while Mr Browne attends to his duties in-doors," said the steward. "If your Ladyship should catch cold in the night air, or suffer from this excitement:—but, no! True Delamere! ever the more calm and self-possessed as danger rises higher! I think I may venture to shew you this diabolical scrawl of the monster Swing, written in characters of blood—sealed with the death's-head and cross-bones of the Irish Papist, O'Connell—threatening my destruction for my fidelity to 'that brimston haridan,' as they wickedly and blasphemously term a noble lady!"

"Good Heavens, Grimshaw—my poor, faithful Grimshaw!"

"Alas, madam! I was fool enough to fancy that my own poor place and my few ricks at the Grange only were threatened, while destruction hovered round the dwelling of my noble mistress."

"Let that epistle be preserved for the i spection of the magistrates," said Dr Hayley, authoritatively.

"Perish the thought, sir!" cried the steward, tearing the precious document into a hundred pieces in his virtuous fury. "Not, save at the price of my blood, shall any eye rest upon the contumelious epithets applied to my thrice-honoured and honourable lady, by these blood-thirsty monsters; and, least of all, the eyes of Mr Jervis Yates. For myself, I welcome the ruin and personal distress that may spare Lady Delamere a moment's pain."

"Ay, indeed, doctor!—such language going through all the Jacobinical journals, as applied to me!—Let the vile scrawl never be seen again!"

"Incorrigible fool!" thought the vexed and angry ex-chaplain, as he impatiently waited the arrival of the dragoons. "Fawning rascal, if not black, designing villain!"

"Don't you be so sorry, pray, for Mr Grimshaw," said Lady Blanche, addressing herself to the consolation of her grandmother. "He won't be ruined. I have heard Mr Browne and the housekeeper say, many's the time, he had feathered his nest well, and had still very pretty pickings." In spite of "the august presence," there was a suppressed titter among the uninterested bystanders; while the steward gave one blighting side-glance at the girl, whom her grandmother commanded to silence, as malapert.

What could stay the military, expected now for several minutes?—Had some one, in league with the incendiaries, led them off the two miles long and now neglected avenue, which led from the Stoke Delamere gate?—Were they, man and horse, over the crags into the river?—No such thing. But, after really having been within the park, they had been told the fire was got under, and recalled to suppress a riot in the borough, where a lawless mob had set fire to the jail, and rescued the wounded poacher Waterton. Now they came gallantly on, at a brisk trot; and as they emerged from the avenue, and were loyally received by the cheer of the spectators, which was returned till the echoes of the old abbey rang again; and as the numerous torches held by the servants flashed on plumed helmet, and sabre, and glittering harness, the bosom of the ancient lady swelled with proud and long-forgotten emotions. Here was a shadowing of the gallantry, the gorgeousness, and the inspiring dangers of the olden time. Just so might the Abbey of the Holy Cross have looked on that ever-memorable night when it enjoyed the never-to-be-forgotten glory and felicity of sheltering the fugitive royal Charles and a band of valiant cavaliers. Such as now looked the young and handsome lieutenant of hussars, who, gracefully dismounting, stood unhelmeted, bending lowly before the lady of the mansion, at the grand entrance to the saloon, might the royal Charles have been. The gorgeous dream had an abrupt awakening; there were here men and things, intrusive vulgar realities, which had no prototypes in the glorious days on which she pampered her fancy.

"The Colonel," said the officer, "with his most respectful compliments, charged me, madam, to express his deep regret that important affairs in another part of the county have prevented him from taking this duty in person. I may be inexperienced in such delicate affairs; but I walk by this gentleman's wisdom. . . . Mr Jervis Yates, madam, one of your intelligent and well-affected county magistrates, who volunteered this duty. I am happy, however, to find that your Ladyship requires none of my services—that the affair is over."

"Nor of Mr Yates's either, sir," returned the Countess, drawing haughtily up, as the bustling and somewhat consequential magistrate, who had thrown his bridle to his acquaintance Hassan, hastily advanced. "My own household are perfectly adequate to the defence of my life and property; if not, they must be augmented."

"Don't you consider it rather curious, my Lady," said Yates, "that the fire should have done so much damage in the steward's business room, without spreading farther? . . . Ha! my noble little cousin, Lady Blanche, how d'ye do, my dear?"

"Madam grandma, may I shake hands with my plebeian cousin? . . . Pray, sir, did the poor poacher's wife come to you from me, to get some of that money from you to buy food, which you are to give me when I make a great match with a grandee, and make you uncle to an Earl?"

Mr Jervis Yates smiled, the undigested plebeian notwithstanding. "This frank young lady, Lieutenant Wynne," said he, "is my little cousin, Lady Blanche Delamere, a young lady not yet perfect in her English, though otherwise, it seems, abundantly precocious. . . . Thinking of marriage, the great act in the woman's drama, already, Blanche, my dear?—Ah, ha! a touch of old Mother Eve in all bloods, Doctor."

"I intend to marry Fred myself, if he will have me," continued the frank-spoken maiden; "and everybody, save grandma and the Doctor, tells me I am a young lady of title, and a great heiress, and may do just as I please: and I will, too."

The young officer laughed.

"Very pretty, my little lady," returned the merry magistrate. "Anything, you mean, becoming your duty, and your exalted rank and station." And he winked—yes! Mr Jervis Yates made some sort of slight motion of intelligence with his left eye, at or towards Marguerite, twentieth Countess of Delamere, whom the naïveté or pertness of her grandchild, and this fresh audacity, appeared to have frozen to stone.

"But to business!" cried the active magistrate. "Here are no ordinary matters for investigation." And, in defiance of the remonstrances of the steward, Mr Yates went on, till midnight, plunged forty fathom deep in examinations and depositions; and, with all his acuteness, was so effectually baffled, that he took nothing for his pains save a very severe cold.

The distinguished small party in the dining-room, meanwhile, partook of refreshments; and the ten troopers and their sergeant, in the hall, joyously regaled themselves; while Blanche and Hassan remained with their patient.

The Countess deeply, though silently, resented the smallness of the military party sent to her assistance, though this was but one of the many mortifications to which she was this night doomed; for the jovial troopers did not consider themselves half qualified to pronounce upon the quality of the far-famed double ale of the Abbey of the Holy Cross, when a mounted messenger brought a summons to their commander, from a neighbouring magistrate, to come promptly to the defence of another place threatened by the Stoke Delamere rioters; nor could the indignation of the Countess be disguised, when the commanding officer—himself a scion of Norman nobility—hastened their departure from her almost untasted hospitalities, to the protection of some trumpery cotton-factories, a few miles down the valley, respectfully stating, that he was bound instantly to obey the orders of the civil magistrate. . . . It was long past her usual hour on that memorable night before the Countess was undressed, put to bed, and had received her Madeira-whey from her faithful Martin.

"Is Lady Blanche in bed? You tell me the poor boy's arm is properly set, and that magistrate person gone with his followers."

"Yes, my Lady; and I trust in gracious Providence, my Lady, that the prayers of your faithful servants, my Lady, may prevent the gout"—

"There must be family-prayers, thanksgiving, in the hall to-morrow, at twelve precisely," interrupted the Countess, "for my signal deliverance from this most guilty and horrible attempt. Let the servants be warned, and see that the state apartments are in order. Doubtless there will be distinguished visitors at the Abbey to-morrow. Many will sympathize with me in this calamity. O Martin, what will society—what will ruined, unhappy England come to? Well might the immortal Pitt exclaim in his dying hour—'O my country! my country!'"

The afflicted Countess swallowed the final gulp of her wine-whey, and was tucked up for the night in swandown blankets and satin coverlets, under a coroneted canopy.

CHAPTER VI.

Cases of Conscience.

The consequences of that fire were many and various, which, to her dying day, Lady Delamere persisted in attributing to that omnipresent, and, it would seem to some imaginations, that omniscient miscreant Swing. In the first place, it brought an influx of the provincial nobility and gentry—from the Lord Lieutenant, the Right Honourable the Earl of Fanfaronade, and his Countess, downwards—with congratulations, condolences, friendly offers of service, and of leagues for mutual protection; and with the expression of warm sympathy in this undoubted conspiracy against the aristocracy, and extravagant praises of the high spirit displayed by the noble sufferer. Its future consequences were, inextricably-ravelled accounts, numerous petty prosecutions of tenantry, an expensive chancery suit, long afterwards instituted by the heirs of Mr Grimshaw against Blanche Countess of Delamere, and the loss of large balances.

Awkward or impertinent as Blanche had been on the previous night, the marks of her instinctive attachment to her deserted grandmother were not forgotten by that lady; and on the day of general gratulation, Lady Blanche behaved so well, and was so much commended by the noble visitors, for improved growth and appearance, prepossessing manners, and a decided resemblance to the Delamere family, that she had never before been so high in favour. A proper governess was forthwith to be provided for her, on the recommendation of the noble governess of an "illustrious personage;" the Arab was to be sent home to his country; she was to have her hair turned up, wear longer petticoats, and be confirmed, along with some junior branches of the neighbouring noble families. The Countess, in the plenitude of her exultation, declared that she had resolved to provide for Frederick Leighton, either in the Army or the Church, whichever was found most suited to his genius. With this last intelligence, which she had picked up with her usual quickness, the Lady Blanche flew back to the bedside of the patient, whom the Countess had herself condescended to visit, though Blanche had been prohibited the indulgence.

"Be a soldier, Fred—if you cannot be a great man. Do not, Hassan says, be a priest—to do religion, and flatter, and imbibe, and play cards all day with old women like grandmamma," was the earnest exhortation of Lady Blanche.

"I would rather be a scholar," said the mild youth. "But do, Lady Blanche, leave me; the Countess will be so displeased with you for being here against her orders."

"Then you don't like me near you, Fred; you like Lucy better; you do not love me to be with you, to watch you, and give you drink." The boy sighed, and turned away his head.

"I wish you loved me as I love you, Fred; but you won't look at me—then I don't care for you either." The Lady Blanche walked off, in disdain, and in sorrowful anger. She sought Hassan, to tell him of her causes of grief; but found she could not tell him that Fred did not love her.

She proposed that they should have a gallop to the Stoke Delamere gate, to hear of the liberated poacher. It was long past her ordinary hour of exercise, but she resolved to go; and the Arab never baulked her in any wish, though in violation of all established rules. She stole back to her nursery for her riding-whip, which happened to be there, and to be friends with Fred, if he asked her; for a quarrel of above five minutes with any one she loved, and, above all, with him, lay like a dead-weight on the heart of Blanche. Aunt Thompson, from the laundry, was with him, and little Lucy—the pretty, fair, and fairy Lucy, was prattling to him, and holding his hand. The heiress stole back unperceived, silently mounted, and far outrode even the fleet pace of Hassan. When he overtook her, he found her stretched, as if dead, in the path, beside a poacher's great-coat and dark lantern, which had probably startled the pony. The world, at this sight, seemed a blank to the Arab. She was, however, perfectly recovered long before he got her home, and said merely she was sleepy—she should like to sleep. The greatest alarm and distress pervaded the establishment. The consequence of the little heiress had never been felt till now. It might now have been thought that the Countess had no object in existence save her grandchild, for whose preservation heaven and earth were stirred. The family surgeons, three in number—the Fanfaronade family surgeon—the “very able” medical friend of Mr Jervis Yates, were all in turn eagerly welcomed. Their learned fears, diverted from the brain, rested on “injury to the spine.”

Perfect inaction, a constantly recumbent posture, was the cruel sentence pronounced upon the lively, restless, and quick-spirited girl; and rigidly was it enforced by the entire household. In the accession of the Lady Blanche, every one placed hopes, and no one knew what might befall to place and perquisite under the regime of the little Irish boy and his mother. The Countess, horrified by the idea of the death of her heiress, or of her possible deformity—deformity which might prove an obstacle to her marriage—to the greatest of earthly interests, the lineal transmission of the family honours—yielded to or anticipated her every wish. Her early kind friend, Mrs Thompson, was, at her desire, permanently planted in her apartments, as her principal attendant. The pretty, gentle, little Lucy was engaged as her playmate; and Frederick Leighton, until he was sent to the University, was her reader and master of design; Dr Hayley taking long spells of the same duty. Hassan alone, the wild Arab, fancied it cruelty, perhaps designing cruelty of the Franks, to fasten his companion, his wild gazelle, his graceful antelope, all day long, like a dried mummy, to a board. He became more and more moody and dissatisfied—he was not fitted for an in-door attendant; and, though the Lady Blanche affectionately received his daily visits, their intercourse began to be less happy. Her intellect was rapidly expanding—thoughts and images were rapidly accumulating. The mind of the Arab was as completely stereotyped as that of the English Countess. As his influence with the hope of the house appeared to decline, Mrs Martin became saucy, and Mr Browne surly; and, on several occasions, the fiery Hassan had drawn his dagger, and upon one he used it. Blanche clung to him still; and it was, perhaps, fortunate that the desire to part came on his side. During a tedious and severe winter, which nearly precluded outdoor pursuits, now his only pleasure in England, Hassan was seized with the home-sickness—with that indescribable languishing desire, that un-appeasable yearning for home and kindred, to which medicine has given a name, though nature alone affords the remedy. He was finally sent home with liberal presents, and an annuity which, in his own country, made Hassan a chief.

It was not until the eve of his departure that the Arab secretly committed to his young mistress a sacred trust, which he had cherished with Mahomedan fidelity—every scrap of the writings which had been in her father's possession at his death; her mother's diary and daily correspondence while a girl, the reader of the Countess; and that good grandfather's letters, of whom Mrs Thompson delighted to tell her, that virtuous pastor of Stoke Delamere. Her grandfather's daily notes of counsel and direction for his daughter's studies and conduct, and the open, affectionate, and cordial interchange of mind and heart between them, were all in her possession. What precious treasures, as Blanche came to consider them! One sealed packet was addressed, “To my daughter, Blanche Georgiana, to be read when she shall be seventeen.” Blanche pressed it to her lips.

Though occupied by these parting gifts, the Lady Blanche wept a long day for the loss of the giver, her “Arab friend,” who, in exchange for a lock of her hair, bestowed upon her the precious amulet brought from Mecca by his grandsire. From a mingled sentiment and superstition, Blanche secretly wore this charm in an armlet, till old enough to smile at the fond folly, and to sigh at the discovery that it was one.

The Lady Blanche was soon left yet more to her own resources. Frederick Leighton was at his college, and Lucy with an aunt in Chester, who wished to adopt her; Dr Hayley at his living, and the Countess gouty, rheumatic, feeble, peevish, and repining. The fiat of the physicians still held her recumbent, allowing her only a couple of hours a-day for carriage exercise. It was a trying discipline for one with animal spirits so high, and whose former existence had been nearly that “of a dweller out of doors.” Reclining, she could now work, sing, draw, play with and arrange the flowers heaped upon and around her bed, or her couch, or the floor, on which she was condemned to lie extended for hours. But her business, her pursuit, her engrossing pleasure or passion, was reading, followed in a very irregular and desultory manner, but with enthusiastic ardour, incomprehensible to all around her, save Frederick Leighton. “Save for books,” was her speech to him in aftertimes, “I should, under medical torture, have become a maniac or an idiot; blessings be with them, my preservers! my comforters!” Of Mr Frederick so flattering were the accounts that the Countess resolved to have him yet Archbishop of Canterbury; but he was first to be constituted, when qualified for the important office, her domestic chaplain and private secretary. In the meanwhile, he was employed, at every recess, in directing or rather sharing the studies of the invalid Lady Blanche, and as her language-master. In general literature she had, he said, far outstripped him, which was probably true; for she had read lovingly in the light of her mother's often gay and girlish, but heart-inspired criticism, and of her grandfather's profound and eloquent commentaries on those favoured works which were, on this account, the volumes cherished by his young descendant. In this weary, sad, but most important interval, when the habits of her mind were strongly and rapidly forming, Blanche owed much to her humble friend Mrs Thompson. This matron was a Quakeress, well and solidly, though plainly educated, who had been thrust beyond the pale of the Friends for a love-match, which, however, she had not yet, when past middle age, repented. On being left a young and destitute widow, her exquisite skill as a laundress had recommended her, spite of dissent, to the housekeeper at the Abbey; and for many years she had reigned matron paramount of lawn and linen, and independent mistress of the romantic and comfortable residence within the park, called the Laundry. She had been, strange as was the fact, in a great house, universally beloved and esteemed. There were some things remarkable in her history—she had saved money, and refused several offers of marriage from persons of consideration in the Countess's establishment; and while duly performing her business, she had cultivated her mind. It was, however, her motherly kindness of manner, and perhaps her pretty tales and ballads, that first won the heart of Blanche; and certainly neither her acquired knowledge, nor yet her high moral principles or singular religious opinions. These, indeed, she kept to herself, and let her life and conversation declare them.

In this humble matron Blanche found a friend to whom she could communicate her doubts and intrust her distresses, and with whom she could even converse about her books and her projects for the future. No one could manage the Lady Blanche, the petted, wayward, capricious heiress, save the Quakeress; and with her, Blanche, affectionate and docile, required little management.

"I obey my grandmother because it is my duty, and I will not grieve her—my good Dr Hush-ley never exacts obedience," said she one day to her young tutor, now become Mr Frederick Leighton; "but I obey ma bonne"—her caressing name for this humble friend—"because I defer to her clear judgment and strong intellect, and know that she loves me for myself, and to do right for its own sake, and because it gives me such pleasure—such heartfelt pleasure—to comply with the wishes of those I love—of those whom my compliance can render happy. . . . They are not many." This last was spoken in a melancholy tone—melancholy for one so young and so much the darling of fortune;—one naturally so gay, so affectionate—to whose feet, to do homage to whose charms and high endowments, all that was noble, or great, or illustrious in the world of England, would yet be gathered. So dreamed the silent listener, in a long pause, lasting till Rollin, the study of the day, was resumed, on the suggestion of the pupil. Lady Blanche was now almost fifteen, but she looked at least three years older. In her long recumbency she had grown rapidly; and her always animated features had taken a higher and more refined and thoughtful expression. "Deep, humid eyes, surmounted by a brow of lofty thought," had been a descriptive flight of Mr Fred's, the truth of which Dr Hayley was unable to challenge, though he scarce approved its tone.

A maiden lady, a visitor to the Abbey, commissioned for the purpose of scrutiny, had written a more minute account of the personalities of the great heiress-hermitess, to Lady Blande, the married daughter of Lord Fanfaronade, a distinguished leader of fashion, a very clever, brilliant woman, only half of the world, but who was quite willing to use a little sisterly diplomacy for the advantage of her second and favourite brother.

With this brother she sat in her dressing-room in May-Fair, ready to go out, letter and watch in hand.

"Just entered sweet sixteen—but looks nineteen—a decidedly fine figure; completely lost by a careless slouching gait." Well, that is still quite remediable under good treatment, and, I dare say, caused by those abominable spine-doctors and their strappings. My belief is, that Blanche, who, three years since, was as firm and elastic as a young savage, has no more spine than I have, or, at any rate, than she should have, being an inch taller, but encourages this nonsense to gratify an indolent habit of sauntering, and reading poetry and romances, under cover of study with this Abelard, whom her foolish grandmother has chosen to give her—with the usual consequences, no doubt of it—if my good-nature and your good fortune, your very good fortune, Horatio, shall not prevent them."

The lady read on. "A certain curious awkward elegance, or rustic gracefulness of manners, is conspicuous; yet she is quite unformed. No discretion—less retenue than a child of seven years old. She will laugh at nothing perceptible to other people, like a mad creature; and they tell me she is as easily moved to tears, though we, fortunately, are not favoured with any displays of sensibility. Save for her long protracted valetudinary state, the young lady might have been masculine or hoydenish; now she inclines to the lackadaisical. They speak here of her candour; I can witness for her brusquerie. She can be positively ill-bred. Her admirers say she has very generous and warm feelings. We see nothing of them. If she has a heart, she keeps it to herself. She has been remarked from childhood for obstinacy, and liability to bursts of passion, especially with those she loves; and she has imbibed some most extraordinary religious opinions, which is no wonder, considering her origin among Mahommedans, Jews, and Catholics, and that her spiritual director, or sole director in the family, is not really Dr Hayley, but an old Quakeress or Moravian, her mother-confessor. I have been, at your request, sounding the Countess about allowing Lady Blanche to visit you in London; but the old lady will not let her go into the world in any shape until she is confirmed; and the strange, obstinate, and impious girl will not submit.' Well, what think you of all this, Horatio? I have shewn you the worst of it," said Lady Blande, folding up the letter; "a very, very fine fortune, and more in expectancy—a fine person—not trail of younger brothers and sisters; and, in heart and mind, good material and plenty of it, out of which a sensible man may fashion an admirable wife."

"Have her up for judgment by all means," said the laughing brother; and he took the letter to read for himself.

Lady Blande, in person, claimed the fulfilment of an old promise, that Lady Blanche should be allowed to visit her for three or four months, to have a sly peep of the world from her nursery windows. She would be taken such care of as never was taken of young lady before. "They were so quiet in good old Grosvenor Square—indeed the very highest circle in London was ever the most quiet."

Blanche was passive, yet pleased with the graceful pressing kindness and fascinating manners of a pleader who would not be refused; and Dr Hayley was urgent for her departure. Blanche, from rapid growth—he was unwilling to believe it might be any cause more serious—had, ever since her accident, now three years back, become more and more delicate in habit, and thoughtful in mind. Languor, wasting, fluctuating spirits, and fits of unaccountable waywardness and depression, were among the gloomy train of symptoms which he lamented. The provincial physicians had varied their treatment of her case, and exhausted every means of their art. In London, she would be under the daily care of that famed and fashionable physician, two or three times brought down, but whom even the fees of a Lady Delamere could not lure for many days from his lucrative practice. The Countess consented. Martin and Mrs Thompson were to attend the young lady; and, lest any inconvenience might arise, she was, with Lady Blande's permission, to have her own carriage. "After this long retirement, we may afford to dash off our heiress a little, though not brought out," said the Countess to the Doctor. "That duty I take upon myself. If God spare me, it is her grandmother shall present the Lady Blanche, future Countess of Delamere, to her sovereign, and his illustrious consort. Only, I insist that, before moving, she shall be confirmed. She shall not leave her ancestral home a tall heathen, to shame us all."

"The Lady Blanche," said the good Doctor, hesitatingly, "still doubts her fitness for what, to a young person, seems, and in one sense is the most solemn rite of the Church. I own I respect her scruples so much—your grand-daughter's is no common mind, my Lady—that I should be reluctant to see your Ladyship use your undoubted authority at this time. A leetle time, a leetle discussion. There are eminent theologians in the Church of England, who do not consider confirmation quite an essential—an absolute essential, I mean."

"Not be confirmed!—not obey me!—set up her independent judgment, not alone against me, her only parent, but her spiritual directors and her Church! I will not, Doctor Hayley, longer tolerate such perversity and rebellion. My grand-daughter, before she stir beyond these walls, shall be confirmed in Delamere chapel, as I was. These are not times when well-born persons may, with impunity, set an example of laxity in the fulfilment of their religious duties."

Blanche was summoned. There was a point up to which Blanche, young as she was, and head-strong as she was reputed to be, now readily yielded her own will to the wishes of the Countess, as if in lofty forbearing compassion with her age and her narrow understanding, or from the generous desire of contributing to the happiness of one ever more favoured by fortune than affection. The Countess urged her purpose. The bishop had kindly offered to come himself to the Abbey. The family chapel, so long unused, had been repaired, and decorated for the ceremony.

"Why make a hypocrite of me?" said the girl, driven to the last resort. "The Bible tells me nothing of it. Indeed, indeed, grandmother, I cannot. Leave me alone—I am not good enough—I am not religious in the Articles. I am a very ignorant, simple Christian."

"The Articles, child! how indeed should you pretend to understand such things? The Bible! what know you of it, save as you are taught to believe?"

"Madam, am not I, like yourself, a Protestant? You have had me taught to read—ineestimable blessing!—and my Creator has given me reason and understanding. Shall I extinguish the divine light in my own mind—strive against inborn conviction?"

"Grant me patience! Is she a Quaker, Doctor? They rave something about inward light, I believe. Has that artful woman, who has such sway with her—and whom I only retain because she understands her constitution—has she corrupted her religious principles with which we have taken such pains? I shall never forgive Martin for having introduced a Dissenter into my family. What are all the nice clear-starching and small-plaiting in the world, compared with bringing heresy into a great household like mine?"

Blanche smiled; while the slightest possible shade of contempt mingled with the feeling of the ludicrous, quivering on her lip.

"Do you presume, young lady, to have more reason and understanding than your grandmother—more than the whole of your ancestors?—you, a child—a baby but yesterday!"

"And therefore not fit for this solemn rite—one you conceive so solemn. No, no;—I will not—I never will be a wicked hypocrite, and make a mock of belief—when I do not, cannot believe other than my Saviour has bidden me in those plain doctrines and pure and holy precepts to which my inmost heart responds.”

“Child, child,” cried the excited Countess, “does not all the world declare against you? Every young lady—nay, I am happy to say that, in these improved times, every young gentleman also publicly performs his religious duties. You are surely distracted. There never was an Englishwoman of title a Dissenter, save Lady Huntingdon, to the grief and shame of her family, and with no advantage to her own character. A Methodist, a Quaker—a what is she, Doctor?” The Countess held up her spread hands in horror.

“I am neither, madam. Give me time. I hold to the Scriptures as my rule of faith and life—I don’t understand beyond that. Many of my ancestors were Roman Catholics, and must have held the doctrines of the Church of England damnable heresy. My maternal ancestors have, I learn, been Puritans and Nonconformists, and thought the hierarchy erroneous and anti-scriptural. In the country where I was born, there are a great diversity of faiths. My friend Hassan worshipped the Prophet whom you call Antichrist; I once kissed hands to the moon; and my early protectors were zealous Roman Catholics. I have since had the great benefit of Dr Hayley’s instructions, and those of my bonne. I have, in these long, weary years read my Bible in the light shed upon it by the pure and holy life of my grandfather, and with the advantage of his instructions to his daughter, my poor mother. I am of no peculiar sect—I am of the faith of Jesus Christ and his gospel, as, in all humility, my reason apprehends them. It is the faith my soul needs—the faith my heart cleaves to; and I am not of the Church of England—I am a simple Christian.” This was said in a low, deep tone, but with an earnest vehemence which overpowered the hearers.

“Simple enough, God wot, and mad too,” said the vexed and angry lady. “And, pray, what call you a Christian?—Am not I—is not Dr Hayley a Christian?”

“I trust you are. The more pure and holy in heart and mind, the more warmly and actively good in thought and deed, the more religious I am bound to consider every one, whether poor or rich. I know of no other standard than—‘If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.’ Scripture speaks nothing to me of a religion apart from goodness. One of your own High-Church philosophers says—‘The more I am a good man, the more I am religious—the more a Christian.’ I suppose Mr Coleridge did not confine the opinion to rank or sect.”

“And does the Church of England make distinctions of rank? No, ignorant child:—persons of all conditions—boors or parish paupers—may receive the comfortable rites of the Church; and, if they repent their sins and believe, are not cut off from salvation.”

“Providence, doubtless, for wise and merciful ends,” put in Dr Hayley, “has decreed a vast variety of conditions in this transitory life, many of them, no doubt, trying and painful; but with God there is no respect of persons. And what are the ills and poverty of this brief, transitory existence to the everlasting life set before the pious poor, and the suffering, when God’s own hand shall adjust the balance, and the last be first, and the first last?”

“And what, also,” said Blanche, “the goods and luxurious enjoyments of so brief a life? Why so tenacious for the privileges and distinctions of the threescore years and ten, if we really believed that the grave levels all distinctions, save those created by superior goodness? Oh! it is a strange subject, and might well perplex a stronger head than mine. Hassan, the Mahometan, has said to me he could not think the wealthy grandee Christians believe their own religion, else they would exclude the poor and vulgar from their Heaven, and keep it all, or at least the best places in it, for themselves, as the do here on earth.”

“What shocking blasphemous things have been infused into this girl’s mind!” cried the Countess, piquing herself upon dignified forbearance with the ignorance and perversity of her grand-daughter. “Why, child, that person—a respectable enough individual, I believe, in his own way—your relative, by the maternal side, Mr Jervis Yates, has, as I am informed by my Lord Fanfaronade, at this appalling crisis, when the welfare of the State and the security of property are so indissolubly connected with the maintenance of the Church, publicly renounced dissent, and returned to its bosom. Go, child, I have long borne with your ignorance and petulance—and shall I say presumption?—from reflecting upon your disadvantages in childhood, and that you were full ten years old before you were taught your catechism. I leave the Doctor to converse with you. But confirmed you shall be. It is your duty; it becomes your condition as my apparent heiress; and it cannot be longer delayed.” The Countess swept off in her grandest manner.

Good Dr Hayley was anything but an overbearing and pertinacious, and much less a persecuting priest; for, though he every day more and more abhorred dissent, he loved his ease; and was more likely, in ordinary times, to have erred upon the side of indifference and laxness than of strictness and severity in “mere matters of opinion”—of “mere ceremony,” as he now described the stumbling-block placed in the way of Blanche. “What was it but a ceremony?—and, though most becoming in the observance, particularly in young ladies of condition, not materially different from a lad, on entering the university, subscribing the Articles of the Church. It leads to nothing,” he continued; “and merely shews the colours likely to be afterwards worn by the individual. It is certainly not worth vexing the aged Countess about, who has set her heart on the performance.”

"Why should my grandmother be vexed about a mere ceremony, if to me it is stuff of the conscience?" said the unconvinced Blanche, quickly; "or yet about what I privately think?" And Blanche argued the matter in her own earnest and simple way, drawing her sharpest arrows from the quiver of Milton, whose prose writings, given to her by Frederick Leighton, when he had last gone to college, had, for some months back, been the private study of her recumbent solitude.

Jeune as the remarks of his catechumen might be, many of them were perplexing to the good, downy Doctor, who, failing to move the understanding of his disciple, wisely rested his case on an appeal to her heart, in behalf of her aged and pious grandmother, whose peace of mind and happiness depended so much on her compliance with "the ceremony." He carried his point; only "the ceremony" was to be delayed for a few months, until his instructions had brought the young lady to a more suitable frame of mind, and take place immediately before she went to London, after Easter. Both ladies looked forward with some anxiety to that period. Blanche was so untaught in elegant female accomplishments, so deficient in everything, that her grandmother became uneasy for her, and, for relief, took up the good Doctor's idea, that the education and acquirements of her heiress, though different, were more valuable and solid, than those of other young ladies; and she really knew a very great deal—perhaps, in one sense, a great deal too much. These matters formed frequent topics of conversation between the Doctor and his patroness. The Countess had one peculiar source of sympathy with her grandchild. Enjoying many of the privileges of the other sex, her pride had often suffered under the legal prescription of women; and if she could not reason, she could be at times very indignant, that, while the Earl of Fanfaronade was Lord-lieutenant of the county, she could not be a deputy—not even a Magistrate, like Mr Jervis Yates; or do judgment at Quarter Sessions on poachers and paupers, like her own Grimshaw; and Lady Blanche also, though destined to be that exalted being, a Peeress in her own right, was the proscribed entity, a woman. Dr Hayley had no sympathy with these feelings, which he fancied very ridiculous; but he had a very bad opinion of Mr Grimshaw, the steward, or chamberlain as he was styled—who, he was sure, systematically imposed upon the Countess; and he was aware of the importance of the Lady Blanche, with her prospects, obtaining a competent knowledge of accounts, and, perhaps, of the outline of the laws and interests of the country in which she had so vast a stake. Besides her large estates in different parts of the kingdom, Blanche would, in all probability, succeed to a great monied fortune, and an interest in manufacturing and mining concerns. Some knowledge of the economical interests of the country and of the British constitution was requisite; and Lord Fanfaronade was consulted, and approved. His Lordship had caught the opinion, probably as people catch a prevalent epidemic without knowing how or when, that in the one case Adam Smith was the standard, and in the other Blackstone infallible; and no doubt Mr Frederick Leighton, the young favourite, with whose fortunes Lady Delamere charged herself, and of whose intelligence, learning, and good principles, his college tutors spoke so highly, was the very domestic oracle to expound these authorities. A regular course of study to be undergone in three months, was drawn up by his Lordship, cut-and-dry, ready to be administered. "Butler's Analogy" was to alternate with "Chesterfield's Letters," and Hannah More and Warburton balance Horace Walpole and Lady Mary Wortley. Memory was to be refreshed in English history; for the Lady Blanche had already been initiated into "history, geography, and the use of the globes."

"I will have Lady Blanche intimately versant with the history of her own country, and of France, the land of her Norman ancestors," said the Countess, at a solemn family conclave. "But she must know nothing of politics—politics, Mr Frederick, I expressly debar. Nothing is so odious, improper, and unlady-like as a female politician, save, indeed, a female sectary. Understand, Mr Frederick, that I confine her studies to history alone."

"To the politics of every year but the present," whispered Blanche; and she added, aloud, "Pray, Doctor, what do politics become after they are fifty years old?"

"Politics," interposed the Countess, "are always vulgar and unfeminine, and particularly unbecoming to young ladies of condition."

"Shall I tell you, Doctor," continued Blanche, in by-play with her old friend, while the Countess lectured and documented the young tutor intrusted with so precious a confidence as the farther initiating the heiress of Delamere into History as it should be taught to young ladies. "Shall I tell you? I found it out quite of myself, I assure you, from a conversation I had with ma bonne and Frederick, the other evening, about the times of the Civil Wars. Why, the turbulent, saucy, scolding, quarrelsome minx Politics becomes, in forty years, that grave, staid, and dignified matron History, whose deeds it is the province of women to study, until they have at their finger ends, how Elizabeth was the lion-hearted Protestant princess; that Charles I. suffered martyrdom on the 30th of January 1649; and how his gracious son was blessedly restored upon the 29th May 1660; and such like important events, never once venturing to inquire or to reason about the causes which sent the one to the block and the other upon his travels." The Doctor shook his head in smiling menace, as if he said, "You are incorrigible;" and the Countess, who had caught all that was meant for her, went on—

"Certainly, child; these are the exact dates I believe. My Lord Fanfaronade is quite of my own opinion, that a solid and liberal education, in the station in which it has pleased God to place you, is necessary; that, notwithstanding your sex, it is your duty to understand the laws and leading interests of your country, and particularly those of our Order, which is the first in the state. I make no doubt Mr Adam Smith has placed all that in the proper light.—Though I have the utmost confidence in the zeal of one so devoted to my family as you must be, Mr Frederick, I shall deem it a duty to look, from time to time, into Lady Blanche's progress; and you will not, I am certain, neglect Lord Fanfaronade's excellent hint about the analysis or theme from Smith, to be submitted to me. Mrs Thompson here, of course, pursues her needlework while Lady Blanche studies. I need not commend the child to your best care, nor yet say, that, as her parent, I depute to you all needful authority. Your arm, Doctor.—And the Countess sailed away before the disclaiming or complimentary speech of the young tutor—blushing as much from the arch side glances of the pupil as the lecture of the Countess—was half concluded.

"Well, sir, are you to whip me, or only look up the naughty girl in the dark closet, if she is idle or disobedient?" said Blanche, as he shut the door of the pretty apartment formerly named the schoolroom, but now refurnished, and filled with all her literary and other treasures, and dignified with the appellation of "Lady Blanche's study." No answer was returned.

"Dear lady," said the Quakeress mildly, "my friend feels this to be misplaced, perhaps cruel jesting."

"Let us resume our task," said the still embarrassed tutor.

"Oh, surely, sir; but, on penalty of whipping—which I daresay I may deserve—I shall take my own way with my Smithian exercise."

"You will deeply offend the Countess," said the gentleman, with the utmost gravity; "but I beg pardon—you know best; I have only to submit to your will, Lady Blanche."

"Every one, of course, submits to Lady Blanche's will," replied Blanche, in a tone of pique, yet of deep feeling, and with an affected playfulness of manner. "Will any one in the world ever care for her enough to control her will—to make her reason submit to a more enlightened or wiser will than her own?" She hastily looked up—the eyes of her tutor were riveted upon Adam Smith, and a silence followed, embarrassing from its mere protraction, before the gentleman faltered out—"Is she capable of this?"

"Who is there to try her?—who ever, save you, ma bonne—you who are too indulgent to my faults—and my Arab—who never saw a fault in me—has ever, in a kindly spirit, thrown away one precious pearl of truth on poor Blanche? But to our studies," she hastily added, with the consciousness of having gone too far.—"I shall, as I have told you, find such things in this pleasant, light reading selected for me, as shall make my grandmother and Lord Fanfaronade believe I have been studying Tom Paine or Cobbett under your care."

"When the Countess will be deeply offended—perhaps put an end to our readings."

Lady Blanche appeared sunk in reflection. This was a result she by no means desired. "You must not be implicated, however. But I cannot refuse myself the pleasure of seeing how Lord Fanfaronade will stare and grandmamma look. Remember how for three years I have been a prisoner in bonds, and do not grudge me a little pleasant revenge."

CHAPTER VIII.

Studies of an Heiress.

Upon the next visit of the Earl, the Lady Blanche was summoned to give an account of her studies to that paternal and urbane nobleman; and she went, her prepared theme in hand. "Nay then, dear lady," said the Quakeress, in gentle expostulation, and laying her hand on the paper.

"Nay then, dear friend," returned the Lady Blanche, laughingly, "why baulk my sport?—I assure you, Frederick—Mr Frederick Leighton—shall not suffer from my temerity." She gently extricated the paper, crying, as she went off,

"Is it not rare sport

To see the engineer hoist with his own petard?"

Arrived in the presence, and the preliminary ceremonies over, the theme was produced, and the fair student assured her noble auditors that it was wholly her own—Mr Frederick Leighton had not even read it. This drew forth the compliments of the Earl; and the young lady being accommodated with a reclining chair, commenced reading a cento of sentences from Adam Smith. "I. Of productive and unproductive labourers, or ploughmen and footmen.—'Labour was the first price, the original purchase-money that was paid for all things.—Does that, my Lord, include the price my ancestors paid for their sief?—Is feudal service labour, productive labour?"

"Certainly, Lady Blanche, my dear—most certainly, Countess. What labour so productive as that of our minds in the council, and our swords in the field?"

Blanche proceeded—"The labour of a manufacturer generally adds to the value of the materials upon which he works, that of his own maintenance and his master's profit. The labour of the menial servant, on the contrary, adds to the value of nothing.' I beg Mr Smith's pardon there, though," said the reader. "I do think the cook adds very considerably to the value of the chicken she roasts for me; and the chamber-maid every day to the value of the bed she makes, and the rooms she cleans for me. But my author perhaps means lackeys, when he says—'The maintenance of a menial servant never is restored. A man grows rich by employing a multitude of manufacturers; he grows poor by maintaining a multitude of menial servants. The labour of some of the highest orders of society, is, like that of menial servants, unproductive of any value. The Sovereign, for example, with all the officers both of justice and war under him, the whole army and navy, are unproductive labourers.'"

"Child, what jargon is that?" interrupted the Countess. "They are gentlemen—they are not labourers at all."

"True, madam. Your definition is the exact and scientific one," said the Earl.

Blanche did not perceive any definition, and she was signaled to proceed.

"Though the profusion of the Government must, undoubtedly, have retarded the national progress of England towards wealth and improvement, it has not been able to stop it. . . .

. . . . In the midst of all the exaction of the Government, capital has been silently and gradually accumulating, by the private frugality and good conduct of individuals."

"When did the man write this stuff, Blanche, my dear?" said the Countess.

"About sixty or seventy years since, madam."

"Most extraordinary! I do fear, my Lord, you have been imposed upon in this Scottish writer. Sixty years ago was before the Jacobins!"

The noble Earl seemed uneasy; he took snuff, and Blanche, though tickled, with the charity of true politeness, read on.

"II. TAXATION, CORN-LAWS.—'Taxes upon the necessities of life have nearly the same effect upon the circumstances of the people as a poor soil and a bad climate. Provisions are thereby rendered dearer, in the same manner as if it required extraordinary labour and expense to raise them. . . . To lay a new tax upon them because they are already overburthened with taxes, and, because they already pay too dear for the necessities of life, to make them likewise pay too dear for the greater part of other commodities is certainly an absurd way of making amends. Such taxes, when they have grown up to a certain height, are a curse, equal to the barrenness of the earth and the inclemency of the heavens, and it is in the richest and most productive countries they have been generally imposed. . . . A tax may take out of the pockets of the people a great deal more than it brings into the public treasury, in four ways:—First'"—

"Have done with that trash, child," said the excited Countess. "Surely a writer, quoted in Parliament and so extolled, must have something better than that nonsense, and I trust you have profited by him in something."

"I have learned all about the effect of bounties and prohibitions, madam."

"That is well enough for merchants and traders, and so forth, but of little consequence to persons of family and estate."

"Primogeniture and entails, then?"

"Ay, indeed," said the Earl. "Primogeniture, the palladium of our Order, my Lady; along with the Church, the very bulwark of the Constitution; and Entails, the fundamental principle, the basis of primogeniture."

"Read, child," said the Countess; and Blanche very demurely read—

"Entails are founded on the most absurd of all suppositions—the supposition that every successive generation of men has not an equal right to the earth, and all that it possesses, but that the property of the present generation should be restrained and regulated by the fancy of those who died perhaps five hundred years ago."

"Hear you that, my Lord?" cried the Countess. "There must be some mistake—some very serious blunder here—that, child, cannot be Smith."

"Yes, madam, it is—quite right, I assure you. He says—'Entails are still retained, through the greater part of Europe, in those countries especially where noble birth is a necessary qualification for the enjoyment of either civil or military honours.'"

"Certainly, save now, in unhappy, degenerate, revolutionized France," said the Earl.

"Entails," read Lady Blanche, "are thought necessary for the maintenance of this exclusive privilege of the nobility to the great offices and honours of the State."

"Certainly," repeated the Earl, emphatically. "The career open to talents—a novel, innovating principle—may be the maxim of a Republican Usurper, but can never find place in a legitimate monarchy."

"Was Napoleon a Republican, my Lord?" inquired Blanche, gravely.

"He was, Lady Blanche, the very child of Jacobinism and Revolution."

"And a tyrant, too," said Blanche. "But to the order of nobility:—'That order having usurped one unjust advantage over the rest of their fellow-citizens, lest their poverty should render them ridiculous, it is thought reasonable they should have another.'"

"Grant me patience! Is this, my Lord Fanfaronade, the book you have put into the hands of my granddaughter? You must have been dreadfully deceived—the man is a rank democrat and leveller."

The discomfited Earl again took snuff.

"He is a philosopher, grandmamma."

"Ay, ay, a Scotch philosopher—perhaps an infidel; but pardon me, my Lord. It shall not be said I have condemned unheard." Blanche read—

"All for themselves, and nothing for the rest of the world, seems in every age to have been the vile maxim of the Masters of mankind. As soon, therefore, as they [the feudal nobility] could find a method to consume their rents upon themselves, they had no disposition to share them with any other person. [He has just been describing, Madam, how in rude times the feudal nobles kept a great many retainers, until the gradual increase of luxury afforded them another and more selfish way of consuming their revenues.] They sold their birthright, not, like Esau, for a mess of pottage, in time of hunger and necessity, but in the wantonness of plenty, for trinkets and baubles, fitter for playthings for children, than the serious pursuits of men. . . .

. . . In countries where a rich man can spend his revenue in no other way than by maintaining as many people as it can maintain, he is not apt to run out; and his benevolence is seldom so violent as to attempt to maintain more than he can afford. But where he can spend the greatest revenue upon his own person, he frequently has no bounds to his vanity, or to his affection for his own person."

"I am astonished—confounded!" cried the Earl, unable longer to restrain himself; "there must be a mistake; this cannot be the work I mean—Smith's 'Wealth of Nations,' Lady Blanche?"

"Indeed it is though. He goes on to tell, madam, how the estates were cleared, in the manner Mr Grimshaw went over to Donegal to help the Irish agent to clear your property of Papists and paupers; and how farms were enlarged and rack-rented, and yet"—and the tone of the speaker became earnest—"how the wrath of man worketh the righteousness of God, and society is bettered even by this cruel means."

"Don't cant, child," interrupted the Countess angrily; "I detest cant. And how, my Lord, shall I ever forgive you for allowing this incendiary work to come into my library?"

She attempted to soften the severity of the rebuke by a smile.

"I shall never forgive myself, Lady Delamere. I have been strangely deceived. But what shall we say, when sedition and sectarianism may be found lurking in everything we read? I have heard this man quoted by those who ought to have known better. What edition is it that your Ladyship possesses?" It was ascertained. "I knew it!—interpolated, I make no doubt, by some seditious Scotch editor."

Even with this explanation, Smith was ignominiously expelled from the library of the Lady Blanche, and her theme committed to the flames, and thus ended three weeks' study of "Political Economy" by a great heiress. The study of the British Constitution was deferred. The Earl, having made one fatal error, could not be certain of Blackstone himself. Besides, Blackstone had written before the French Revolution, and things, though nominally the same, were now, in reality, very different. It was, therefore, resolved that the Lady Blanche should, save history, suspend all her more serious studies, and betake herself to the "well of English undefiled," as the Earl phrased it—to Shakspeare and Milton, Dryden and Addison. The Earl remained to dinner, and Mr Frederick Leighton had the honour of being admitted to table, and properly lectured.

"You comprehend the wishes of the Countess, for Lady Blanche. The poets—down to Pope, and no later—the dramatists as I shall select them; our best essayists; with county histories, memoirs, and antiquities. This is my idea, my Lady; and, as a little indulgence," continued the graciously-smiling Peer, "suppose we throw in a romance or two—Richardson's or Scott's."

"Quite my own idea," responded the Countess.

"And make good use of your time, my dear young lady. My daughter Blande will be down at Easter, and will not leave the county without you; so, by the middle of April—it is now hard on February—you will require, Doctor, to have your interesting pupil in proper training. It is with you, sir, I believe, Lady Blanche reads Italian?" He turned to Leighton.

"Lady Blanche has read a little Italian with me," replied Mr Fredrick Leighton; "but that beautiful language was one of her native, her childhood's tongues. She has not learned—she has merely recalled."

"I have a smack of all the tongues of Babel," said Blanche, laughing, "save Irish, which grandmamma has promised to let me over to her fine place in Donegal, to catch, some day; and a touch of all national characters, which, I suppose, is the cause of my prejudices being kept in equilibrium."

Leaving Dr Hayley to do the honours, the aged Countess, considerably exhausted, sought her comfortable fauteuil for her afternoon sleep, and the Lady Blanche flew to her bonne. Her colour was high; for the palest rose tint seemed as the deep rose hue in the usually marble cheeks of Blanche. Her eyes glowed, her spirits were elated. She communicated all her good fortune. Her joke had told; perhaps one or the other of her noble auditors might ponder some one of Adam Smith's apophthegms, and Lord Fanfaronade try to make independent provision for his younger sons and daughters. The benevolent Quakeress shook her sagacious head.

"Oh, that hope-damping, Burleigh shake, ma bonne!" cried Blanche, laughing. "Think that I have still three months of delicious spring before me, and nothing to do all day but drive my pony-chaise, gather flowers with you, and read, read, read poetry and romances, or, better still, hear Fred read, read, read, and you talk to us about it! Will it not be delightful! Nay, I won't suffer that second shake. Thus I prevent it." And Blanche playfully placed her hands on each side of the neat lawn coif of her maternal friend, until they almost touched it.

THE BELLEVUE STEAMBOAT.

ONE Monday last summer, two hours before noon, We left Interlaken by steamboat for Thun;
A rather large party: a gent. and his wife;
A brace of young ladies, with sweet graces rife—
The eldest perfection in all points might claim—
If she is long unmarried, 'twill be a sad shame;
A youth, with a fancy for scribbling and singing;
A nice little lad, to discourse just beginning;
Two soubrettes; a Florentine courier too;
Nine persons in all, besides strangers a few;
Three Englishmen voyagers, baggage, and spouses;
One courier; children, some sporting new blowsees,
Some coated and cloaked as the fancy might lead 'em,

Some carrying books, but unwilling to read 'em.
On deck, a glass case, very carefully locked,
With chamolais-horn pins, ditto shirt buttons, stocked;
Two old Galignanis, a Gazette du Rhin,
A carte "avec Champagne et toutes sortes des vins;"
A vast lump of ice fresh from Grindelwald; views
Of Hotel de Bellevue, for those who might choose
To spend their five francs for a franc's worth, or less—
'Tis not one of our follies, we freely confess.
Le Capitaine, civil enough in his way,
Pointed out all the lions, nor asked us to pay,
Till we stepped from the boat, and were landed at noon,
In time for the table d'hôte dinner at Thun, [DOGGREEL.

BRITISH COMMERCE VERSUS BRITISH CORN-LAWS.*

THE disclosures made at the late meetings of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, are indeed astounding. That the Corn-Laws were a great and crying evil, was well known; but for this fearful revelation of the extent of the evil, the public was altogether unprepared.

The taxes on food were known to be imposed, not for the purpose of revenue, but for the maintenance of high rents—that is, to enable the owners of land to plunder all the rest of the community. They were known to make the price of corn and butcher meat about twice as high in the markets of Britain as in other markets. The sum which these nefarious imposts directly cost the people, it was known, had been estimated at from twelve to thirty millions of pounds sterling, and even higher, while not above one-fifth of the enormous pillage ever reached the pockets of the perpetrators and upholders of the robbery. It was known that the food taxes kept the most skilful and industrious artisans, and the capital of the highest order of merchants and manufacturers in the world, comparatively unproductive of their proper rewards. It was known that the same infernal imposts kept down population in this manufacturing country, by the operation, as Malthus has it, “of the various forms of misery, or the fear of misery,” and, to an equal extent, prevented happiness and inflicted misery in other countries, which should have sent us food in exchange for manufactures. It was farther known, that these primary effects of the great robbery had a tendency to foster the manufactures and commerce of foreign countries, and even to send British capital, skill, and machinery abroad, to rival what remained at home, and thus undermine the very foundations of our national prosperity. But that these last consequences had already ensued to a most alarming extent—that we were already far on the road to ruin—was little known or suspected, until the important proceedings at Manchester carried surprise and dismay over the length and breadth of the land. The manufactures and trade of Britain, on which so many millions of our countrymen depend for subsistence, are threatened with something very like ruin. Market after market is becoming shut against our commodities, and supplied with home manufactures, called into existence and maintained by our Corn and Timber Laws; in the markets which are still open, we are beaten by these same forced rival manufactures; and even in our home markets, there are instances of our being actually undersold by foreigners, who send us back our own raw material, wrought up, and, after having paid two duties, cheaper than the same description of goods can be made at home!

The Report of the two Meetings of the Man-

* Report of two Meetings of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, on the subject of the Corn-Laws. 8vo, pp. 168. Ridgway, London.

NO. LXII.—VOL. VI.

chester Chamber of Commerce on the operation of the Corn-Laws on commerce, has been printed as a pamphlet. It is a publication of the deepest importance to every man and woman in the kingdom, and should be read and pondered by every person who can exercise even the smallest influence on the course of conduct to be pursued by the Government of this country. And who is there that cannot exercise some influence on the public men of his neighbourhood? He that hath ears to hear, and voice to utter sounds of approval and disapproval, if he can do no more, let him go to every meeting at which he can have an opportunity of signifying his feelings in regard to the taxes that have brought so much evil on his country already, and threaten it with an extent of misery appalling to contemplate. There is no time for trifling longer with the Corn-Laws. This disclosure of their deadly operation, in its full extent, must and will be followed up by the most determined efforts to remove them from the statute-book. We shall do our part, by giving what publicity we can to some of the more important facts stated by the different speakers at the Manchester meeting.

On the 13th and 20th December, meetings of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce were held to consider the propriety of petitioning for a Repeal of the Corn-Laws. Nineteen of the twenty-one Directors of the Chamber had signed the requisition for the meeting, and the assemblage of the members was the largest which has taken place for the last eight years; comprising men of every political party, seven county magistrates, the mayor, and eight aldermen of Manchester; and the most wealthy and intelligent manufacturers of the chief manufacturing city of the world. This assembly of men, eminently possessed of every quality which entitles their statements to the attention of the community, although confessedly reluctant and “slow to proclaim, at a public meeting of the Chamber, their own adverse situation and gloomy prospects, and thus advertise to the world the cheaper markets of their rivals,” have at last been drawn to confess “that their industry is yielding to the rivalry of foreign manufacturers; whilst they declare it to be their solemn conviction that this is the commencement only of a state of things which, unless corrected by a timely repeal of all protective duties upon the importation of corn and other foreign articles of subsistence, must eventually transfer our manufacturing industry to other and rival countries.” This ominous declaration sounds in our ears like Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin. But this solemn and impressive warning cannot have been made in vain. The nation will arouse itself, and throw off the incubus that threatens its vital energies with destruction.

Passing over the sensible speech of the Chairman, and the able and argumentative petition prepared by the Directors of the Chamber, we come at once to the remarkable speech of Mr J. B. Smith, one of the directors, and a county magistrate. Mr Smith commences with a concise history of the Corn-Laws, which may be useful as information to some of our readers, and as a refresher to the memory of the better informed.

He did not hesitate to say that he could not approve of any protective duty on corn; and that, in his opinion, the whole course of legislation on the subject had been from beginning to end one of the most scandalous instances of landowners legislating for their own benefit at the expense of the people, that was to be found in the history of legislation in any country of the world. (Hear, hear.) In the early history of corn-law legislation—at the Revolution of 1688, when the country grew more corn than could be consumed—the landowners passed an act giving a bounty of five shillings upon all corn exported to foreign countries; thus enabling the foreigner to obtain British wheat at a cheaper rate than the inhabitants of this country themselves could purchase it at. From 1740 to 1750, no less a sum than £1,515,000 was paid in this way, out of the pockets of the English people, in the shape of bounty, for the exclusive benefit of the corn-law legislators; and when it was recollected that the bounty system continued not for those ten only, but for one hundred and twenty years, he would leave the meeting to form an estimate of the amount that must have been taken out of the pockets of the people during that period for the benefit of the landowners. (Hear, hear.)

Mr Smith proceeded to trace the history of prohibitory duties on corn from 1773 to the passing of the prohibitory laws of 1815.

By the law of 1773 the bounty duties were relinquished and protective ones substituted. By that law the importation of wheat was prohibited up to 48s., when it was admitted at 6d. per quarter, duty. This was the most favourable corn-law we ever had. From that time our population and manufactures began rapidly to increase, and enabled us to consume our corn at home; prosperity smiled upon the country, prices rose, and the agriculturists in 1791, taking advantage of that prosperity, passed another law, by which the duty was raised from 6d. to 24s. 3d. per quarter. In 1804, prices having risen in consequence of the war, they passed another law, by which the duty of 24s. 3d. per quarter was imposed till the average price reached 63s. Then came the law of 1815, the year after the peace, when prices began to fall, for they had obtained during the war as much as 120s. a quarter. Then the landlords passed a law prohibiting foreign corn till the average reached 80s. per quarter. In those days our worthy president was an agitator, (hear, hear,) and he remembered hearing an excellent speech from him, declaiming against the injustice of that iniquitous law. The excitement of that time had never been equalled within his memory. Crowds of people assembled and beset the houses of parliament, which had to be guarded by soldiers whilst the law was passed. That law might be said to have been passed at the point of the bayonet. He believed that it was the only instance in which a law was so carried in the British parliament, and he hoped it might be the last. (Hear, hear.) This law, however, was found not to answer the purpose of those for whom it was framed, and then came the Duke of Wellington's law of 1828, by which, instead of prohibiting corn till it was 80s., it was admitted on a graduated scale of duties. This law was given as a great boon, by which we were to have an importation of grain at all times. Corn was admitted when the average price reached 40s. at a duty of 46s. 8d. What an insulting mockery! By the corn laws of 1773 we were allowed to import corn when the average price reached 48s. on payment of 6d. duty; by the boon of 1828, we might import it by paying 38s. 8d. (Hear, hear.) In fact, up to 60s. a quarter we still pay a duty of 26s. 8d., and it was not until the market price had attained to 70s. that it was admitted as low as 10s. 8d. duty, and 73s. that it was admitted at a duty of 1s. This was the land-owner's boon, and he would appeal to the meeting if he was not justified when he said, that the British parliament had, under the forms of constitutional law, adopted a system of legislation in reference to corn, which no despot had ever dared to attempt. (Hear, hear.)

To complete the account of the Corn-Laws, we shall interrupt Mr Smith's speech, to quote some remarks from that of Mr Richard Cobden, the well-known "Manchester Manufacturer." Mr Cobden will not allow "that the Corn-Law of 1827-8, under which the country now suffers, was a relaxation of the one which was passed in 1815;" and maintains that

The law of 1827-8 is an aggravation of that of 1815. In fact, it never was intended to be a relaxation, but was passed with a full knowledge that it was a severer law than the previous one. To understand this subject clearly, it was necessary to refer to the very different state of the currency in 1815 and 1828; at which later period, it had undergone an appreciation of about twenty-five per cent. That this point was very well understood by the confederates—he might call them conspirators—who passed the present law, was very evident to all who read the proceedings in parliament of that time. Indeed, the alteration in the currency was urged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr Robinson, (who let the cat out of the bag when hard pressed by Sir E. Knatchbull and the fanatics of the agricultural party for a complete monopoly,) as a reason for passing the bill; and Sir F. Burdett, who was in favour of the high duty on corn, consoled his party by telling them, that, whilst the currency law remained in force, they would not be worse off by the change. An appeal to the duties at the two periods fully justifies this opinion. In 1815, corn was admissible, duty free, at 80s.; and, by the law of 1828, it is admitted at a shilling duty, when the price in the home market reaches 73s. Taking into account the change that had taken place in the currency, by which the sum of 80s. in 1815 had been made equivalent to 60s. in 1828, the landlords actually raised the monopoly some fifteen per cent. higher by the change.

Allowing Mr Smith now to resume, he remarks, that

The effects of excluding foreign corn had been to induce foreign nations to impose heavy duties upon our manufactures. We had disregarded their remonstrances against our unjust exclusion of their produce in exchange for ours, and we might now turn to look at the effect of our selfish policy. In 1820 we exported to Russia, 13,203,867 yards of cotton cloth; in 1837 our exports to that country were reduced to 847,022 yards only. (Hear, hear.) In 1820 we exported to Prussia 5,442,535 yards of cloth; now we exported not a yard. (Loud cries of hear.) To Germany in 1820, we exported 47,658,285 yards; in 1837 our exports to that country had fallen off to 38,581,633 yards. The effect of our prohibitory system had been that, notwithstanding the great increase in the population of Europe since the peace, our exports to Europe had actually fallen off, and were less by 20 per cent. in the last five years than during the first five years of peace. Our exports to Northern Europe, by far the most populous, civilized, and wealthy portion of the globe, were less by £7,400,000, in the five years since 1832, than during the first five years after the war. No wonder this all; a more fearful state of things had arisen. THOSE COUNTRIES HAD BECOME MANUFACTURERS THEMSELVES, and we, instead of being manufacturers of cotton goods for them, had become mere spinners of their yarn, while our poor weavers were reduced by it to a state of wretchedness and suffering which admitted of no hope. To shew the truth of the last statement, he would call attention to our exports of cotton twist. In 1820 we exported to Russia 8,762,310 lbs., while last year the quantity exported amounted to 23,910,019 lbs. To Germany and Prussia in 1820, we exported 11,682,683 lbs.; last year 36,109,100 lbs. To the United Netherlands, in 1820, we exported 232,400 lbs. of cotton twist, while last year our exports of article had risen to 17,457,232 lbs. (Hear, hear.) These were our exports to Northern Europe, and our trade was not only going to destruction there, but we were fast losing our ground in Southern Europe, where a similar policy was being adopted to that pursued in the north, and we should find, that while in 1820 we exported no twist to France, in 1837 the exports amounted to 354,025 lbs. In the same manner our exports had increased during the same period to Gibraltar, from 61,182 to 280,114 lbs.; to Malta and the Ionian Islands, from 108,464 to 371,760 lbs.; to Italy, from 1,291,261 to 3,118,938 lbs.; to Turkey, from 542,093 to 4,047,871 lbs. Total exports to South Europe in 1820, 2,003,000 lbs.; last year, 14,172,708 lbs. (Hear, hear.)

But the exportation of raw materials was not confined to cotton alone; labour was so much cheaper on the continent, that, true as the needle to the pole, manufacturers were finding their way to the cheap food. In 1820 our exports of woollen yarn was only 3,924 lbs., in 1836 it was 2,546,177 lbs. (Hear.) The same process was going on with respect to linen yarn, and on examining the exports it would be found, that while in 1820 we exported not a pound, our exports in 1836 were 4,574,504 lbs. The total export of cotton yarn in the same period had increased from 23,032,525 to 105,106,529 lbs.; and we found now that warps were sent abroad sized and dressed ready to be put into the loom; thus affording every facility for the most unskilful workman to weave them into pieces. Mr Bazley had just mentioned to him that even cops were sent out in casks ready to put on the shuttle. The effect of all this upon our labourers was to deprive them of half their work—We exported more cotton yarn than would be sufficient to manufacture all the cotton goods we exported to all parts of the world; and if, instead of exporting yarn, we exported it made up into goods, which we should do but for the corn-laws, there would be employment for double the number of hand-loom, and double the number of power-loom weavers employed in this way at present. This was a most important consideration, and sufficiently accounted for the deplorable condition of our poor weavers. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.")

But our exportation of cotton yarn was only on suffrance: THE SPINNING OF OUR RIVALS WAS RAPIDLY INCREASING. On looking at the consumption of cotton in foreign countries he found, that while in 1808 the United States consumed only 100 bales of the raw material, in 1836 they had converted into manufactures no less than 237,000 bales. (Hear.) France, in 1832, consumed only 262,719 bales, whilst in 1836 her consumption amounted to 353,005 bales; and there were no less than sixty cotton mills in course of erection. In Austria also a rapid increase was taking place in cotton manufactures, and in 1837 she had 600,000 spindles at work, and 100,000 more in preparation. Similar progress was making in Bohemia, the Tyrol, Lombardy, Naples, and Salerno.

Do not these facts justify the declaration, that several of the most important branches of our manufacturing industry, for the successful prosecution of which we had many advantages, are yet, owing to these atrocious Corn-Laws, "yielding to the rivalry of foreign manufacturers," and actually in the course of being "transferred to other and rival countries?"

Mr Smith has not confined his investigations to the trade of Manchester. We owe to him also an important account of the hardware manufacture, the result of personal inquiries in Birmingham and Wolverhampton.

The export of hardware and cutlery from this country, in 1824, was 12,285 tons; and, in 1830, 16,275 tons—being an increase of 33 per cent; while what was most important was, that, in the same period, the exportation of bar iron, pig iron, and castings, had increased from 34,691 tons to 106,467 tons—being an increase of 300 per cent. The Sheffield people complained that there was no increase in their export trade; and, in 1820, the export of unwrought steel was 326 tons; in 1834, it was 1,709 tons—an increase of 550 per cent. With these vast exports of raw iron and unwrought steel, added to the export of coals, the foreign manufacturers were enabled to make articles at a cheaper rate than in this country; and it was important to notice the great increase in the export of coals coincident with the increase in that of raw iron and unwrought steel. In 1820, the export of coals was 158,672 tons; in 1835, 546,338 tons. By these means the foreigner was enabled to make and export cutlery at a less price than ourselves.

A great number of articles which were formerly made in Wolverhampton—such as scythes, sickles, coffee-mills, pepper-mills, common knives, hinges, common locks, and bolts, which were formerly exported to Germany—could now be purchased so much cheaper in Germany, that the merchants of Wolverhampton purchased in that market, instead of manufacturing themselves, for re-exportation to foreign countries. (Hear, hear.) A merchant of Birmingham said, that for years past they had been constantly losing the sale of some article or other which they had formerly supplied to foreign markets—that, in Constantinople, they were cut out of the hardware market by the Russians; while, in Portugal and Spain, the wares of Germany and France were supplanting those of England; and, what was more extraordinary, that the wares of those countries were imported to supply our own markets. Even the article of Brummagem buttons, which one would think were cheap enough, were imported from France; and, after paying a duty, were sold for less in the London market than they could be made for in Birmingham; while the article of gilded toys, which formerly gave employment to numbers of persons, had ceased to be manufactured in Birmingham, and were imported from France.

In relation to the hosiery trade, Mr Smith mentions that,—

At Leicester, one of the largest manufacturers had told him, that he had bought a quantity of foreign worsted hosiery, at lower prices than he could make it, and that the quantity of woollen yarns now exported was sufficient to give employment to 10,000 stocking-makers all the year round. This, of itself, was sufficient to account for the distress felt in the hosiery trade. In Derby similar statements were made to him, and the furniture trade was suffering from the importation of foreign rosewood and mahogany goods, which were imported and offered for sale by public auction. A gentleman in Manchester, indeed, had corroborated this statement, and said that he knew houses where such articles were regularly sold in Manchester. America was exporting machinery to Russia, and a gentleman in Birmingham said he had a relation in Russia who had engaged himself to an American company who were establishing cotton weaving and spinning manufactories there, the machinery for which was supplied by the United States. (Hear, hear.) Another article, which we were losing the supply of, was cotton hosiery; for not only was Saxony manufacturing as large a quantity as ourselves, but while we exported only 430,000 dozen pair, they exported 1,500,000 dozen pair per annum. The Saxons supplied as much cotton hosiery to the United States alone, as we did to all the world. He held in his hand a beautiful specimen of their manufacture of white cotton gloves, which cost only 3s. 6d. per dozen at Ham-burgh. He held in his hand also another specimen of gloves of foreign manufacture, and one of similar quality of the manufacture of this country; but while the price of the English goods was 6s. per dozen, those of the Saxon manufacture were purchased at Ham-burgh for 3s. 2d. per dozen. He had before him another specimen of beautiful stockings of Saxon manufacture, which, at Ham-burgh, sold for 12s. 4½d. per dozen, while the stockings of the same quality of English manufacture which he held in his hand, could not be had for less at Nottingham than 23s. per dozen. It was a lamentable fact, that Saxon hosiery and gloves were now regularly imported and sold in this country at lower prices than they can be made here, and will, undoubtedly, shortly entirely destroy this large branch of our manufactures. (Loud cries of hear, hear.)

Well might Mr Smith exclaim—

Could there be a doubt of the pernicious effects of laws which enabled the Saxons thus to undersell us in the manufactured article, the raw material for which they purchased in the same market as ourselves (cheers,) and when it was recollected that the yarn was spun in England, taken there for the purpose of being converted into goods, which were brought back again, after a land carriage of nearly 700 miles, and sold at the low rates he had already noted?

At the meeting of the Chamber, on the 20th December, Mr Smith brought forward a number of additional illustrations of the effects of the Corn-Laws on our trade. He observed that—

He had endeavoured to shew, at the meeting of last week, that the greatest increase in our exports was in unmanufactured goods, such as cotton twist, unwrought iron, and steel; that these articles were now sent abroad in the raw state, and manufactured by the foreigner, whereby the workman of this country was deprived of the employment he would otherwise have received by converting them into manufactured goods. He would now proceed to shew how this had affected different branches of our trade. Last year (1837) the total value of the exports of cotton manufactures was £20,000,000. Of these goods, one-half consisted of cotton twist, the value of which was only £6,000,000; whilst the value of the manufactured goods was £13,000,000; and therefore by the export of yarn instead of manufactured goods, we sustained a loss of £7,000,000 in labour and profit. Now he would ask, what would have been the condition of our weavers and other artisans, if these £7,000,000 had been left here in the shape of wages among our working classes, instead of going to remunerate the foreign labourer? (Hear, hear.) He should be able to tell them the loss to this country in the wages of the workman, in the exportation of the raw material instead of the manufactured article, by some facts connected with the exportation of hardware. According to Mr Babbage, the labour expended on the manufacture of a quantity of bar iron worth £1 into agricultural instruments, increased its value to £3 : 5 : 7; of the same quantity into musket-barrels, £9 : into swords, £16; saws, £14; files, £20; razors, (cast steel,) £53; table knives, £35; needles, £70; pen-knives, £657; and buckles, £896. Now, only conceive the immense value of the labour lost to this country by being deprived of the manufacture of hardware, which was sufficient to account for the distress in Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Sheffield, and elsewhere. (Hear, hear.)

Let not gentlemen flatter themselves with the delusion that we had little to fear at present—that, at all events, the loss of our trade would be gradual. Let them take warning from the facts which he had already laid before them, and listen to the past. In the year 1834, the Prussian league was established. In 1833, the year previous to that time, our exports of velvets amounted to 8,162,000 yards; in 1837, only four years afterwards, they had fallen to 4,638,000 yards. In 1833, our exports of cambrics and muslins was 12,754,000 yards; while, in 1837, it amounted only to 6,193,900. In the year 1833, our export of nankeens was 18,000,000 yards; in 1837, it had decreased to 355,000. (Loud cries of "hear, hear.")

Although we are aware of the risk of weakening, by superabundance of details, the effect of the alarming evidence of the supplanting of British trade by the progress of foreign manufactures, we cannot resist the desire to extract more from this important speech of Mr Smith. "From various quarters," he says, "since last week, he had received a large amount of information."

One gentleman had sent him a lot of patterns of American prints, which he was desirous should be exhibited to the members of the Chamber, in the same way as the Saxon cotton hosiery; but any gentleman could see them after the meeting. A gentleman who had been in the United States three or four years ago, and who was complaining to one of his customers there that they had sent him no orders for hosiery lately, was told—"Oh, we get it so much cheaper in Germany." The English merchant, supposing that the low price arose from the market being overstocked at that time, and that people could not sell goods at that price without being ruined, persuaded his American customer to give him an order for £500 worth of English hosiery, and to order that amount of Saxon hosiery at the same time. This was executed; and the reply to his inquiry as to the result was, that the English hosiery cost his American friend 25 per cent. more than the Saxon. There were gentlemen present in the Manchester trade, who had been in the habit of selling largely to American houses; and they told him that, since the revival of the demand for America, many Americans had called on them to purchase goods, and they had shewn to these Americans various articles which they had been in the habit formerly of selling to them, and had received the reply, as to one article—"That article we now manufacture at home." As to another—"What is the price?" "So and so." "Oh, we can beat you at home." "What is your price for this?" "So much." "Oh, we can't afford to give it." Such were the answers, in very many instances, of the American buyers. He was informed by one of the largest exporters in this town to the American market, that all descriptions of low broad cloth had now ceased to be exported from this country, being manufactured in America. He knew that the article of Negro clothing, in which he (Mr Smith) dealt largely himself, when in business, was now manufactured in the United States, and its export thither from this country had almost entirely ceased. The Americans no longer took our grey unbleached cloth, sheeting, shirtings, and bed-ticks—no longer took our printed goods under the value of twelve shillings, except blacks and whites; what we now exported were all of finer qualities than those, and they were every day getting of finer quality, while the Americans were daily improving in their manufacture of prints, as would be seen by the specimens in his hand. In the low qualities of hardware they manufactured many articles superior to the English, and as cheap; and we were losing that trade in consequence, as to the lower qualities. They made also a low fancy pantalon stuff, not yet sufficient for their own consumption, and hitherto that deficiency had been supplied from this country; but his informant stated, that this year that article might be bought so much lower in the German than in the English market, that all orders for it this season had gone to Germany. The Americans were beginning to manufacture kerseymeres for themselves, and what the same gentleman told him of the decrease in our exports of this article seemed so prodigious that he almost doubted the statement; and when he got home, he referred to such documents as he possessed, which were not the latest, but they convinced him that the statement was correct. He found, from the tables of the Board of Trade, that in 1820 we exported to America 13,217 pieces of kerseymeres; and in 1831, only 3,500 pieces. Of flannels, we sent to the United States, in 1820, 1,525,000 yards; but in 1831, only 104,000 yards. That article we had lost the sale of in America. Such was the progress of cotton spinning in the United States, that his information led him to expect that, in four or five years, they would be powerful rivals to us in the exportation of cotton twist. (Hear, hear.) It was an object at which they were aiming; and he had no doubt that they would accomplish it.

Other speakers corroborated the truth of Mr Smith's dismal array of facts, proving the gradual shutting out of our commerce from the nearest, the best, and the old-accustomed markets, by the competition of foreign manufactures, which, but for the infamous monopoly possessed by the British landowners, would never have existed, or never have obtained their present efficiency, as rivals to the manufactures of this country. Mr William Neild, calico-printer, of the firm of Thomas Hoyle & Sons, said, "that within seventeen or eighteen years. printed calico was reduced 75 per cent. in price, or from 100 to 25 per cent., from various causes, the most powerful of which was competition." Mr Richard Cobden "had made the tour of Germany, lately, and had given some attention to the progress of manufactures in those countries through which he had passed ;" and he "corroborated generally what Mr Smith had stated." Mr W. Rawson, hosiery manufacturer, had been, from 1815 till 1820, engaged in furnishing the Saxon market with cotton hosiery, when his house was obliged to yield in the battle of competition.

From 1820 to 1833, they had struggled on; but, at the latter period, they had lost all the South American continent in every article of cotton hosiery made by the Saxons. In fact, they could not stand before Saxony a single moment after she had entered the field of competition. In consequence of our long wools, they had not much interfered with the Leicester manufacture, which consisted of worsted and woollen hosiery. But Mr Smith, in his late visit to Leicester, was informed that worsted and woollen yarns had been purchased there by the Saxons sufficient to employ 10,000 stocking-makers for a year. He believed he could not be contradicted when he asserted, in reference to our cotton hosiery, that not an article in that line had been sold during the last three years, from one extremity of South America to the other, at a loss of less than thirty per cent. From 1834 Saxony had, in this department, commanded every market in the world. If, as we had seen, they could beat us in our own market, after paying the importation duty of twenty-five per cent., it was evident we could not have the slightest chance when we met them on common ground. After what he had seen last week of Saxon manufacturers, and comparing them with what they were in 1814, he felt like a person awakening from a feverish dream. They could sell us goods of equal quality to ours, at little more than half our price. He had given orders for a lot of goods from their market, which he would have at the proportion of 3s. 3d. to 5s., duty paid. They were a kind of goods on which about eighty per cent. of the whole value was expended in labour; and it was cheap labour, arising from the cheapness of food, that caused this, to us, alarming difference in price. In the hosiery trade, with which he was connected, this element operated to a greater extent than in many others; but he, and others in that trade, were only a little in advance of the rest in the road to ruin. They might be compared to persons living in a valley in which an alarming flood was rising. The inhabitants of the table lands around were sceptical as to the progress of the flood, so long as it did not threaten immediately to invade their own dwellings. Unfortunately for them, they lived far in the valley; but he would tell them who might think themselves secure, that the rising tide would soon reach them also. This overwhelming tide of foreign competition would continue to advance so long as the cheap food of foreigners enabled them to work at half the money price of labour. It would be actually better for the manufacturers of Nottingham, engaged in foreign trade, to throw their machinery into the Trent, than to employ it while they laboured under their present disadvantages. But it required a great deal of moral courage to take such a step as that. They were, however, only the advance guard, and the evil, if not determinedly met, would speedily overwhelm them all. With all due deference to the merchants of Manchester, he thought the thundering of their labouring wains, incessantly pushing through their streets to convey the produce of their spindles to the looms and workshops of the foreign manufacturer, seemed as if destined to act as a continual monitor, not to be misunderstood.

What man, of the least pretension to justice, or even to discretion in pillaging, can refuse to join worthy Mr Rawson in his concluding remark? "After the astounding facts which had been brought before them, to talk of anything less than complete abolition [of the Corn-Laws.] would be a mockery to the branch of manufacture in which he was engaged, and a false beacon of delusion to those in other branches, who still indulge in a false confidence."

The idea of our being rivalled by foreign manufacturers, has hitherto never produced much alarm. We foolishly confided in our superior advantages—our numerous and admirably trained manufacturing population; our large commercial marine; our colonies; our abundant capital; our excellent machinery; and our facilities of internal communication. But it is now proved that we have no monopoly of these requisites to a large and successful commerce. The nations of the European Continent, and the United States of America, have been digging canals, constructing railroads, building ships, importing and making machinery, and encouraging numerous skilful artisans from this country to lay the foundations of a manufacture of such excellence as to be qualified to compete successfully with even that of Britain. They have, moreover, imitated us in placing the same sort of protection around their rising manufacture that we have bestowed on our agriculture. They protect the home manufacturer against the foreign, as we protect the home grower of corn against the foreign grower. This is only natural, and indeed has been forced upon them by our refusing to supply them with our manufactures on the only terms on which they can buy from us—that is, taking their corn, &c. in payment. How can we blame them? How can we convince them that they are wrong? Such of them as have no advantages for manufactures, and great advantages for producing corn, certainly are wrong. But they see that we have become wealthy and powerful by commerce. They see that we have become great under a system of restriction; and attribute no small part of our greatness to what has been our bane. It is in vain to preach free trade to foreigners, while we ourselves practise restriction. They will go on in their too successful attempt to cultivate manufacture, at least as long as we "protect" our agriculture, and refuse to take their raw produce for our manufactured goods.

Let us see what some of those nations, who ought to be our best customers, have already done, in the way of attaining manufacturing facilities similar to ours. And, first, as to the grand requisite of perfect machinery. We have already quoted Mr Smith's information, that America is not only making her own machines, but exporting machines to Russia. Hear, next, Mr Cobden state the results of his personal observation in Germany.

He would refer to a branch of industry that was making great progress, and which had struck him as one of the most ominous signs he had witnessed. He alluded to the great increase in the manufacture of machinery abroad, under the auspices of English mechanics. Previous to the time of passing the Corn-Law in 1828, the manufacturers and spinners of this country, anxious to share the monopoly of the landholders in some shape, pressed for a prohibition of the exportation of machinery, and it was granted. The artisan, who had been previously interdicted from emigrating, now demanded a law to enable him to carry his labour to the best market, and this of course was granted. And here we see the invariable effects of trying to make selfishness harmonize with the public good. The artisan left this country to teach the foreign spinner how to organize his mill, and was then sent home to reap the effects in a restricted market for his industry. But now the demand arises for the makers of machinery, and the same process was going on to instruct the foreigner in making spinning frames, that was formerly done in spinning cotton. Whilst at Dresden, he was shewn over a large machine-making establishment, by an Englishman, who took him into a large room filled with machinery for spinning flax, with Gore and Wesley's patent improvements—this, said he, was brought out from England, at an expense of 35,000 dollars, for models, and I am engaged to superintend the copying it. At Chemnitz, also in Saxony, he visited also a large establishment, organized and conducted by English mechanics, for the manufacture of machinery. And it happened, that on the very day he was there, the place was decorated with evergreens and laurel branches, for the purpose of doing honour to the King and Queen of Saxony, who paid a visit to the premises. He found at Prague, in Bohemia, an establishment belonging to an Englishman, for making machinery for manufactures. And at Vienna there were two of our countrymen accommodated under an imperial roof, carrying on a similar trade. At Elberfeld and Aix-la-Chapelle, he also found large machine-making businesses carried on by Englishmen. At Liege there is a similar concern, the largest in the world, belonging to Mr Cockerell, who was born at Haslingden, in this county, and who employs nearly four thousand hands. And at Zurich, he found the large establishment of Mr Esher, with an Englishman at the head of the foundry, and another at the head of the forge, casting five tons of iron a-day brought from England, into spindles, rollers, and wheels, for the spinners and manufacturers of Austria, Saxony, or Bavaria. In almost every large town there were English mechanics instructing the natives to rival us. Now he contended, that every one of those artisans was expatriated from their native country by Act of the British Parliament. They carried their labour abroad, because our Corn-Law will not allow them to exchange the results of their industry for the corn and food of other countries.

The next witness to the progress of our foreign rivals in the acquisition of first-rate machinery, shall be Mr R. H. Greg, a county magistrate, and a partner of the firm of Samuel Greg & Co., the most extensive spinners in the kingdom, who consume, in their numerous establishments, the hundredth part of all the cotton spun in this country.

To add one or two facts to those mentioned by Mr Smith and Mr Cobden, as to the rapidity with which foreign manufacturers supply themselves with the means of competition, he (Mr Greg) had had furnished to him, in the beginning of last year, a list of orders for machinery to the amount of £360,000 in the hands of Mr Schlumberger, Mr Esher, and a very few others, all foreign machine makers of Belgium, Switzerland, and Germany. (Hear.) That was proceeding with very great vigour, and it might readily be supposed that that gap which yet remained to be filled up in the supply of their own markets, would very rapidly be filled up. The competition was already felt in our own market. His (Mr Greg's) house had, last year, to break up 200 looms, which formerly supplied an article for one of those markets. And this year they had broken up 200 looms more, which supplied another article for another of those markets. (Hear.)

Lastly, on the point of foreign machinery, Mr Holland Hoole, of the firm of Lambert, Hoole, & Jackson, extensive cotton-spinners and export merchants, shall give his testimony. Mr Hoole is a Conservative; but the question of corn monopoly or free trade, is not one of Whig or Tory, nor of Radical politics neither, if we may credit what we heard only two days ago of a soci-disant Radical Member of Parliament. He and this Conservative manufacturer take opposite views on this trying subject.

Mr Hoole thought both petitions for the repeal of the Corn-Laws [there were two under discussion] good ones, and could sign either or both. . . . He felt strongly on the subject of the Corn-Laws, and not without occasion; for the welfare of the establishment with which he was connected, the support of his family, and the continuance of his business, all depended upon the continuance or the repeal of the Corn-Laws. (Hear.) Therefore, though differing from many present upon political questions, he did not differ from them upon this, which was not a political question. He had been informed by a gentleman of respectability, that a gentleman, who transported himself to Belgium some years ago with his capital, and commenced the cotton business, was over here a fortnight ago, engaging hands and purchasing machines, which he found no difficulty in doing; and he said, "We," meaning foreign manufacturers, "have nothing to fear except an alteration in your Corn-Laws. (Hear, hear.) If you'll let them alone for ten years to come, we can do without you, we can then set you at defiance." (Hear, hear.)

Our rivals, it is plain, do not want for machinery. Will they have to struggle with defective internal communications? Hear Mr Alderman Cobden as to the progress of railroads in Germany, under the encouragement of the German league.

The extent to which that vast league was operating to our injury might be judged of, from the fact, that it comprised 26,000,000 of the most intelligent and the richest people of the continent, containing four monarchies with their capitals, and a score of minor independent sovereignties, each having a nucleus in its capital for the consumption of luxuries and articles of considerable cost in the fabrication; so that we must see the extent to which we were injured, and to what extent that league was calculated to foster the industry of a state like Saxony, whose manufactures now, instead of being confined to the consumption of two millions and a-half of people, had the whole range of a country comprising twenty-six millions. This was a most important element in the competition we must now expect from Germany. Those who were now manufacturing in Berlin, Leipsic, or any any other part of the country, would have access to the whole of the markets of Germany. But the league not only stimulated them, but had security to give to them. (Hear, hear.) Hence a feeling of confidence had sprung up; they had overrun the country with railroads; joint-stock banks were established; and this confidence was so great as even to sustain paper money. All those evidences of security and confidence were mainly the growth of that commercial league, and all that security and confidence would become elements in a powerful competition with ourselves, since we had hitherto, of all nations, alone possessed and enjoyed this confidence and security. The Dresden and Leipsic Railroad Company had permission to issue 500,000 dollars in paper, one of which notes he held in his hand. These were absorbed and circulated immediately, payable as they were on demand, though (as one of the intelligent directors had told him) five years ago, not one dollar of those notes would have kept in circulation. (Hear.) Surely some reference should be made, in our petition, to the great progress making in internal improvements abroad—as ordinary roads, railroads, and those other improvements of which we had hitherto had the monopoly in Europe. We had this no longer; railroads were being constructed in almost every part of the continent, and Belgium was more completely intersected with railroads than any other country in the world. They were now constructing in Prussia a line of railroad to run through the empire: in Saxony they had nearly finished one from Dresden to Leipsic, and that from Magdeburg to Leipsic was in a forward state; so that probably by the end of next year, we should be able to go by steam from Hull direct to Leipsic. This communication gave to the stocking manufacturer of Chemnitz an equality, at least, with our Nottingham manufacturers. Russia, and even Switzerland, were busily engaged in constructing railroads; and this ought to be referred to in the petition, as one reason why we could not afford to be left in our present adverse position in point of food.

It is superfluous to speak of the railroads, canals, navigable rivers, and inland seas of the United States—they are well known to be of the most stupendous magnitude. If any of our readers wish particular information on this subject, let them consult the recent publication of Mr David Stevenson, Civil Engineer, and learn to what degree our best customer among the nations at present, but also our most formidable rival in trade, possesses the elements of commercial greatness.

It were unnecessary to adduce any testimony to the generally admitted fact, that skilful artisans from this country have been drawn to our foreign rivals, and are busily employed in making machines, and teaching the native populations how to use them. Equally superfluous would it be to insist on the natural tendency of capital to leave the countries where it is unproductive, for those where it can be profitably employed. Masters will go abroad as well as the men, machinery, and capital, unless the food monopoly be speedily abolished. The forbidding prospects of manufacturers in this country, Mr Greg, the great mill-owner already quoted, tells us, "had been acting on his mind and the minds of his partners so powerfully, that, some time ago, they had made a determination to have no increase in their establishments in this country, but to look abroad." Mr Greg's house, it will be recollected, had even broken up two hundred looms in each of the years, 1837 and 1838. He and his partners, he adds, "had been on the point, more than once, and should be again, of forming establishments out of this country; in Germany, and, probably, in America. Such were their convictions, that they intended to act upon them in this way.—Then came the question—If this was the state of things, what could be done? How could we retrace our steps, and extricate ourselves from this difficulty and danger? He was certainly almost hopeless, respecting our capability of extricating ourselves; but, his strong conviction was, that the only chance of escape lay in the repeal of the Corn-Laws." Of shipping our rivals suffer under no deficiency. Most of them have food at half our prices:

and, consequently, cheaper labour. And they have protecting duties on their manufactures, to complete our expulsion from their markets. A glance at the nature of some of their protecting regulations may be instructive. Would that we could make every British landowner read the direct effects of his monopoly of the supply of food to his manufacturing countrymen!

It was well observed by the president, that the manufactures of America had their origin in the British restrictions on the importation of corn.

In consequence of our engaging in war with America, she was thrown upon her own resources; manufactures were established; they received legislative protection; then came high duties; and the manufacturing interest of America had reached the high pitch it had now attained, in consequence of the hostilities between the two countries. On one occasion a proposition was made by the President of the United States to abandon their system of prohibitive duties, and to adopt one of moderate duties (having reference only to finance, and not to the protection of manufactures), provided we would adopt a similar course with respect to grain. We refused, and adhered to our prohibition with respect to American flour; and America maintained her position with respect to our manufactures.

On the same point, Mr Smith remarks—

We had the best evidence that our Corn-Laws had been the means of establishing the manufactures in America. The British Minister at Washington, Mr Addington, in reference to the tariff, wrote to Mr Canning as follows:—"I have only to add, that had no restrictions on the importation of foreign corn existed in Great Britain, the tariff would never have passed through either House of Congress; since the agricultural states, and especially Pennsylvania, would have been opposed to its enactment."

The recent German league was alluded to by several of the speakers; and certainly it deserves the most serious attention of those who have the destinies of this great commercial nation at their disposal. Some of the effects of that league have been already quoted (page 122) from Mr Smith. In another place he remarks—"The Prussian ambassador had frequently remonstrated against the exclusion of their corn and timber; but had our ministers ever had the courage to mention this when complaints were made in Parliament of the Russian-German league?"

We now quote from the president's opening speech:—

The merchants and manufacturers of this town were suffering at this moment from the German league; which was a system similar in kind, though not equal in degree, to that by which our importation of corn was governed. They sought to protect, by high duties, their home manufactures, in the way we seek to protect by high duties our growth of corn at home.

Mr J. C. Dyer, the eminent machine-maker and patentee, chairman of Mr Poulett Thomson's first election committee, said, in relation to the same subject—

The outlets of the Rhine and Elbe ought to bring us timber, corn, and cattle, and every article of food, as well as wines and a few straggling articles of merchandise. We ought not to complain of the German league, when their artisans ate food at half the price that ours paid for it.

Mr Cobden's ideas on the subject of the league, from his recent German tour, must be worthy of particular attention.

There was a question, he remarked, which had scarcely glanced at, and which was very much misunderstood too which ought to be referred to—he meant the great commercial league in Germany, upon which our national prejudices and pugnacity had been very much invoked, but upon which those who had the guidance of public opinion had studiously avoided the truth. That great league, so far as regarded its own people, was a benign measure: it was calculated to unite the German family in one bond by the establishment of a common tariff, and ultimately one common standard of weights and measures, and one system of money. (Hear, hear.) It was a union formed for the first time in the annals of the world, without a political bond. (Hear.) It was not an alliance of princes for their own purposes of aggrandizement, involving the disputes of legitimacy—not a mere parchment treaty of diplomatists, that might be torn in pieces any moment, as thousands had been before—but a bond of union, a commercial confederacy, a partnership entered into between the German people, for the purpose of facilitating their trade; allowing travellers to pass the frontiers into every country from Belgium to Russia, from the Tyrol to the Baltic, without let or hindrance, without being stopped at barriers in the shape of custom-houses, in the interior, as was formerly the case, three or four times a-day. But we were told by those who guide public opinion, that the German league was formed as a hostile measure towards England, forsooth; that the Prussian cabinet had no other object in it than to annoy and harass us. It was thus that our bristles were set up, and we were sent abroad with our nationality misdirected, to fight against Russians, Prussians, or against any people or principle in the world, so that it only diverted us from the real cause of all our mischiefs—the landlord's corn-laws. (Applause.) That German league had for its object the settling of one uniform tariff for the whole country; but that was not to be fixed for a perpetuity. Every three years a congress of the leagued states met together, and arranged the commercial terms of that tariff for the next three years. When travelling lately within the pale of that league, he made it his business to inquire minutely into its operation; he procured semi-official introductions, with a view of ascertaining the truth; and it was his firm conviction, from what he heard every individual say with whom he conversed, even including the Saxon manufacturer, throughout Prussia, Saxony, Wirtemberg, and Bavaria, that it was in our power at any time to effect a reduction in the duties upon our manufactures. All intelligent men concurred in saying—"Repeal your corn-law, and we will remove the duty on your goods." He would give in his own words the saying of a person of great intelligence in Prussia, upon this subject—"If you will send us," said he, "a commercial agent, to represent a commercial people, and competent to agree to take in exchange for your manufactures our products, we shall have no difficulty in arranging an extensive trade together; but whilst you send us an agriculturist to represent an agricultural people, we cannot hope to deal with you, for we are agriculturists ourselves." (Hear, hear.)

In a subsequent speech, while animadverting on the conduct of Mr Poulett Thomson, Mr Cobden confirms what Mr Smith had said as to the remonstrances of the Prussian ambassador to our Government. Whilst in Berlin, Mr Cobden was told that the Prussian embassy in London had again and again told our Cabinet that our Corn-Law was the sole obstacle to the arrangement of a commercial treaty between the two nations.

He would read an extract from a letter he had just received from a gentleman at Berlin, whose intelligence and means of access to the first sources of information, disposed him to place implicit confidence in his authority—"I have spoken," says the writer, "to one or two leading men in the finance bureau, and the result of our conversation has been, that, in their opinion, if we choose to alter our Corn-Law in England, and to admit the grain of Prussia at a fixed duty, there can be no doubt that this would reduce the duties on British manufactures compt one-half; and, of course, this would apply to (Mr whole Union, and to a population of twenty-six millions. This contains an indirect answer to your question, and shows that our Corn-Laws originally led to the legislative enactments of Prussia, and, through her influence, to a system of retaliation through the whole of the North of Germany. One official man told me, that he knew the Prussian ministers in London had repeatedly told Mr P. Thomson that your Corn-Law was the stumbling block to a trade between the countries." (Hear, hear.)

It may now be proper to inquire what has been the effect of all this insane conduct on the part of the British Government—this fostering of the manufactures and trade of foreign countries at the expense of so much suffering to our own. What progress have these foreign manufactures been making? It was known that they were increasing; but the rapidity of the increase will excite some surprise, and no little alarm—especially when coupled with the remarkable decline of our own trade in what used to be some of our best markets. We quote from Mr Greg, as to American trade.

The exports of their own manufactured cloth from the port of New York alone were, in 1823, 1700 bags; in 1825, 1600; in 1827, 2500; in 1828, 1900; in 1829, 2800; in 1830, 5300; in 1831, 3000; in 1833, 13,000; and in that part of 1834, of which he had a return, 10,000 bags, valued at two millions of dollars. In 1835, the export was valued at 2,856,000 dollars. He had no returns for the last two years; but he knew that, in the eighteen months including half of 1836 and the year 1837, the Americans had exported 20,000 bales of their own manufactured cloth round the Cape of Good Hope, and 16,000 bales of cloth to South America. (Hear, hear.) As to the profits on these articles, it was sometimes said that the Americans could not compete with us in plain cloths, but must sell without profit. A gentleman, who had established a mill at Lowell, and who was formerly well known to some gentlemen here, stated that he had cleared there, in great part by these exports, £200,000; and gentlemen might be sure the Americans would not export at the rate stated, if they did not get a profit by it. The same gentleman, who was the owner of the mills at Lowell, said to him, (Mr Greg,) "We have pushed these low domestics beyond the mark, as now we are turning our attention to spinning lo numbers of twist for the German market." (Hear, hear.) These were facts which, for some time past, had filled him (Mr Greg) with alarm; but what most alarmed him was this—that our own manufacturers and merchants—the who ought to know better—who knew or ought to have known these facts—were not only ignorant of, but utterly incredulous as to these facts. That was the most alarming feature of our case.

We have seen (supra, page 119) that the Saxon hosiery and gloves were not only supplanting our articles in common markets, but actually meeting us in our own, under the most disadvantageous circumstances to the Saxons, excepting the comparative cheapness of food and labour in their own country. Farther examples of the prosperity of foreign, and the depression of British, manufactures, would be needless. Let us next advert to what Mr Smith justly styles the alarming fact, that, while the exports of this country were nearly stationary, the exports of foreign countries were greatly on the increase.

He had before him a table of the declared value of the exports in the years 1815 and 1836, of three different countries. He would begin with our own first: the exports of Great Britain, in 1815, amounted to £51,603,029; in 1836, to £53,368,571. The exports of the United States of America, in 1815, amounted to 28,500,000 dollars; in 1836, to 66,500,000 dollars; an increase of more than 200 per cent. (Loud cries of "hear.") The exports of France, in 1815, were 23,750,000 francs; in 1836 they had risen to 74,000,000 francs; nearly 400 per cent. ! So that while our exports had increased only four per cent., those of France had risen to nearly 400 per cent. in the same period. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") He would repeat, that these were alarming facts; and the increase in the manufacture of different articles in other countries was also rapidly progressing. He happened to have in his hand a return of the increase of Russian manufactures from 1821 to 1831, a period of nine years. In that period the cotton manufactures of Russia had increased 230 per cent.; silk had increased 25 per cent.; woollen had increased 30 per cent.; flax and hemp had increased 45 per cent.; tobacco and snuff had increased 130 per cent.; and the manufacture of soap 131 per cent. (Hear.)

Some gentlemen expressed but little alarm at the danger of losing our manufacturing superiority, and congratulated themselves that the country was not ruined yet. It might be that those who were engaged in the spinning of cotton twist were doing well. ("No, no, no.") He saw that gentlemen dissented. The makers of raw iron and steel he understood were well employed, but those who were engaged in the fabrication of these materials into articles were complaining of the hardness of trade. (Hear, hear.) Now, when he had occasionally met some of the directors of the Chamber, they had affected surprise, that, notwithstanding the loss of portions of our trade, we should have flourished so long, exhibited such signs of wealth, and asked how could it be accounted for? It might be accounted for, he would reply, by the fact, that it was difficult to ruin a country like this all at once, abounding in wealth and natural resources. (Hear.) But were gentlemen insensible to the handwriting on the wall? (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") Might not what had been raised by the superior skill and industry of our countrymen be destroyed by bad legislation? (Hear, hear.) We had attained our present position chiefly by the enormous increase of our productive power, by our steam and machinery, at a time when other countries had not turned attention to its employment. This had enormously increased our wealth. But who derived the benefit of this? Had the working classes? (Hear, hear.) No; because they had been giving constantly a greater quantity of manufactures for the same or a less quantity of food, and because it had been exchanged, not for the food which they consumed, but for luxuries for the rich—(hear)—or for raw materials, or for blocks of wood, as Mr Dyer had justly said, for anything but what the people could eat. (Hear.) The increase of our productive power might be inferred from the fact, that in 1815 our steam power was equal to 30,000,000 of labourers, while at present it was equal to 600,000,000. (Hear, hear.) That it was this that had enabled us to sustain the enormous burthen of taxation, and as large a burthen in the shape of Corn-Laws, under which we groaned, there could be no doubt. But whenever the time arrived that our competitors should attain to that point in mechanical power possessed by this country, then was the time that Britain's sun would set. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.")

Even the landowner, who looked beyond the receipt of his next year's rent, must see that the destruction of the manufactures of this country was the inevitable destruction of himself. (Hear.) What must be the result of destroying our manufactures, but to throw the greatest part of the people out of work, and reduce them to a state of pauperism? How were they to be supported when manufactures no longer exist, but by the land? And what, then, will be the value of the landowners' estates, which the starving people will eat up like locusts, and even find these insufficient to save them from misery and destitution? (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

He quitted the continent at Antwerp for England, and he would tell them what were his feelings after walking through the deserted Exchange of that once famous emporium, and looking at its almost deserted harbours, in which by the way he observed American, not English vessels, which had been the bearers of the coffee and sugar of Cuba. Whilst looking at these evidences of departed greatness, and reflecting upon the cause of the decay of Antwerp, of the atrocities of the Spanish general Alva, who banished the skilful weaver and the capitalist of Belgium to foreign countries, he felt a conviction, which he still was sorry to entertain, that the rulers of this country were pursuing precisely the same policy as the Spanish governor in Belgium, or Louis XIV., by the revocation of his edict of Nantes—that our aristocracy was playing over again the same part in a different character—and unless prevented by the efforts of the suffering people, it would end as in Belgium, in the ruin of the empire. (Loud cheers.)

The suffering people will prevent such a consummation. It is impossible that the food monopoly can be longer upheld. The failure of last harvest, with its consequent high prices, and the speeches we have quoted, are exciting a spirit of resolute hostility to the monopoly, which nothing short of its total abolition will satisfy. The men who have struck so forcibly against the Corn Laws, will follow up their blows. They are evidently in earnest. These are not "flash" speeches, from which we have extracted so largely. They are not interlarded with scraps of English poetry, nor quotations from Virgil, like the orations of the grown school-boys in the House of Commons. The able petition drawn up by the Directors of the Chamber, and enforced by them and the Chairman at the two meetings, was unceremoniously thrust aside, on account of its dealing with the monster monopoly too gently, to make way for one by Mr Cobden, more expressive of the feelings of the Chamber. The same champions of commercial freedom have established a museum for the exhibition of articles of foreign manufacture, side by side with English manufactures of similar qualities, with the prices of each affixed; thus appealing to the eyes as well as the ears of the public. They have engaged a secretary with a liberal salary, to correspond with other places, and unite the whole mercantile community of England and Scotland in a general movement against the food monopoly. Above all, they have subscribed liberally towards the expense of the proceedings they have resolved on, including the obtaining a hearing at the bar of the House of Commons. In every respect, the leaders seem worthy of the cause. We have no doubt whatever of their success. Already the country has responded to their call. Meetings have been held in Leeds, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, London, Liverpool, &c., at all of which the total and immediate abolition of the monopoly was demanded, and everything like moderation or compromise in dealing with so pressing a question, denounced as culpable weakness.

The example of the men of Manchester should be followed everywhere, even in the little towns and villages. Meetings should be held, and strong resolutions passed, in favour of immediate and total abolition of all the food taxes. No place, where men know their grievances and dare raise their voices against them, should be thought too small to take part in this grand movement in favour of commercial freedom.

If any man can yet doubt whether what is called "a moderate fixed duty" might not be tolerated, we beseech him to recollect that a duty of even 1s. a quarter, imposes a tax on the community of no less than £2,600,000. By "a moderate fixed duty," some mean 10s. a quarter; some, 6s. or 7s.; and some 5s. a quarter. A duty of 10s. would tax the community to the extent of £26,000,000, a sum nearly equal to the interest of the National Debt, and in favour of that class by whom chiefly that stupendous debt was brought upon the nation. A duty of 5s. per quarter would rob the public of £13,000,000. After being plundered by the landowners since 1815 to a vast extent, are we now, instead of obtaining restitution of any portion of the plunder, to be robbed of £13,000,000 annually still, by a 5s. duty, because those who have been so long accustomed to prey on us, may find it inconvenient to live on their own means alone? He is a crawling slave who would longer submit to the smallest remnant of this robbery by Act of Parliament. Would the working men, on whom the burden chiefly falls, permit the food-tax to continue a single month, if they had the elective franchise? Assuredly not. And shall those to whom the franchise has been entrusted for the good of all, do the working men so great a wrong as to continue this grievous burden on them? It has been maintained that the working-man is deprived of one-third of his small income by the operation of taxes in the imposition of which he has no voice. This opinion has been held by Mr Hume, and by Sir E. Lytton Bulwer. (See "England and the English," vol. I., p. 187.) Other authorities have attributed to the food monopoly alone a robbery of the working-man, to the extent of one-fourth of his earnings. The calculation is, that the food-tax raises the price of bread, or the substitutes for bread, to double its natural price; and that, of the working-man's wages, one-half is expended on food for himself and his family. If this be true, how guilty are they, in the sight of God and man, who lay this heavy burden on the poor man—a burden, be it observed, which falls moderately, in comparison, on the middle classes, and very lightly on the rich, of whose expenditure only a small portion goes for food!

It must not be forgotten that the landowners have a "protection" against the foreign grower, independently of any duty, in the whole charges of freight, insurance, damage in transport, warehouse rent, and profit to the importer; amounting, according to the common notion, to 10s. per quarter, or £13,000,000 sterling. Their claim to even that protection is questionable. At least the sum that they realize in this way, by the mere increase of population, without any merit or cost of their own, is a peculiarly proper subject for taxation.

But it is commonly urged as a plea in favour of the landowners being protected by a duty of about 6s. or 7s. a quarter, that they are already taxed above their fair proportion. They unfairly taxed! They who have made all the laws, and imposed all the taxes! The idea is as ridiculous as untrue. If they are unfairly taxed, let them shew it, and claim, not a tax on the community to enable themselves to pay a disproportionate share of taxation, but relief by an equalisation of burdens. We maintain, however, and can prove it, that the landowners pay less, much less, than their fair share of the burdens of the State.

But should not the food-tax be reduced gradually? No. It should be abolished at once. The effect on prices will be gradual notwithstanding. Corn will not be grown for us in sufficient quantities for several years after the abolition of our Corn-laws. The best judges of the subject declare, that there is little reason to fear much land being thrown out of tillage. Our own belief is, that a great stimulus would be given to English agriculture, by the abolition of "protection," the never failing cause of slovenly management. Competition, and not protection, has been the grand source of improvement. According to Mr M'Culloch*—"A great future increase may reasonably be looked for, in the imports from Ireland. But, independently altogether of this, there is still very great room for improvement in Great Britain. We believe, it may be safely affirmed, that were the whole island as well cultivated as East-Lothian, Berwickshire, Northumberland, Lincoln, and Norfolk, its produce would be at least doubled." This is cheering information; for it shews, that there is no fear of many of the agricultural labourers being thrown out of employment, but, on the contrary, a prospect of their number being greatly increased, whenever the stimulus of foreign competition shall incite the British farmer to improved cultivation. For the farmer himself we have no fear: he will be in a much better position without the Corn-Laws, than he has ever been with them. Besides, only tenants under lease are liable to be affected by alteration of the present system; and for them provision can be made by a clause, converting their money rent into a grain one. Many such leases exist already. If the circumstances of either landlord or tenant are to be altered materially by abolition of the monopoly, it is for the interest of both that the period of transition from the one state to the other should not be prolonged; but that they should know as early as possible, what their new situation is to be, and accommodate themselves to it. A gradual change, if it be for the worse, is more painful, more destructive of a man's energies, than a sudden loss. But we are far from thinking that abolition of the monopoly will entail much loss on any class of agriculturists, except, perhaps, landowners whose estates are not their own. In the event of a fall of rents, the landowner might be made liable to those relations who have provisions secured in his estate, only in a sum corresponding to the reduced rent. But for the case of the landlord whose estate is mortgaged, we fear nothing could be done. Any interference of the Legislature between debtor and creditor would be highly objectionable. A man who has incurred debt has put himself into a false position, and cannot be saved from the consequences. Those landowners who are not in debt will benefit by the abolition of the Corn-

Laws. Their rents will be better paid than now, and, if somewhat less in nominal amount, will exchange for at least an equal amount of the necessities and luxuries of life. But it is not on account of its harmlessness that the abolition of the landlords' monopoly must be called for. The abolition, the total and immediate abolition, is demanded as an act of justice, and as a measure of proved necessity.

King-shaming Cromwell's throne !
Home of the Russells, Watta, and Lockes !
Earth's greatest are thine own :
And shall thy children forge base chains
For men that would be free ?
No ! by thy ELLIOTS, HAMPDENs, VANES, PYMS, SIDNEYS, yet to be !
No !—for the blood which kings have gorged
Hath made their victims wise,
While every lie that Fraud hath forged
Veils wisdom from his eyes :
But time shall change the despot's mood ;
And Mind is mightiest then,
When turning evil into good,
And monsters into men.

If round the sou! the chains are bound
That hold the world in thrall—
If tyrants laugh when men are found
In brutal fray to fall—
Lord ! let not Britain arm her hands,
Her sister states to ban ;
But bless through her all other lands,
Thy family of Man.
For freedom if thy HAMPDEN fought ;
For peace if FALKLAND fell ;
For peace and love if BENTHAM wrote,
And BURNS sang wildly well—
Let knowledge, strongest of the strong,
Bid hate and discord cease ;
Be this the burden of her song—
" Love, Liberty, and Peace !"
Then, Father, will the nations all,
As with the sound of seas,
In universal festival,
Sing words of joy, like these :—
Let each love all, and all be free, Receiving as they give :
Lord !—Jesus died for Love and Thee !
So let thy children live !

THE DAY-DREAMER.

A REVERIE.

A most delightful occupation is that of building castles in the air !—how noiseless-swift glides time over heads so engaged ! Not the poppy's black juice, nor the generous blood of the grape, yields so fine a madness ; pleasant while it lasts, harmless when gone. What is there in life which can equalize its conditions, soften its hardships, and charm away its cares, like this imaginative faculty ? Who so happy as the Day-Dreamer ?

Is he poor and of no account among his fellow-men ? He is lord of all—king or kaiser, if he pleases, in his own dream-world.

Has he no discernible tenement or messuage that he can call his own, in any town or county ? Probably not. Yet doth he retire at will to a noble air-castle, seated in fair-visioned pleasure, with clear lake and hanging woods—the centre of rich nebulous domains, well stocked with game, and yielding a princely revenue.

Is his housekeeping cold—his servants few or none ? Granted. Nevertheless, he supports an aerial establishment consistent with his air-castle ; and lives splendidly, and gathers around his table the great, and the wise, and the witty ; himself ever being (O rare privilege !) the greatest, and the wisest, and the wittiest in the company.

Is he an ambitious man, checked and kept under by narrow circumstances ? Very likely. Therefore, in his cloud-dominions, he builds for his friends and rivals as well as for himself ; and rewards or takes revenge by appointing them splendid lodgings or mean ; his own particular dwelling ever towering supreme, with glory piled on glory, in a Temple-of-Solomon sort of magnificence.

Does he bear a mighty mind in a pigmy body, and thirst for martial fame ? Straitway, then, he is dubbed Admiral ; waxes terrible on the high seas, vanquishes the combined navy of Europe, and becomes a second Nelson (in all but death) at another Trafalgar. Or his taste lies in the land-service ; and then beware, ye fortresses and towers of strength, for impregnability shall avail you nothing ! France and Russia, arise ! Prussia and Austria, to the rescue ! for here comes our hot dreamer, charging at the head of a hundred thousand cavalry, and dealing destruction not to be equalled till the fight of Armageddon.

Are politics and intrigues of state his dream? And is he hindered of success in that walk by the impediments of a narrow intellect, a poverty of language, a stuttering speech? Truly so. Yet in this, his hour of pride, he is standing forth before gods and imaginary men, delivering himself of an oration Demosthenes might envy, and no gainsayer may answer. Persuasion sits on his lips—by the wind of his mouth he has overthrown one administration, by the breath of his nostrils shall he build up another.

Is he addicted to the tender passion, soon vanquished by speaking eyes and soft voices, yet himself not likely to inspire love or obtain marriage—being short and ugly, shy and poor; and, in speech, purse, and bodily presence, altogether weak and contemptible? Pity him not!—such may be his hard fate in gilded saloons, not in his own dream-land. There he dilates into a

Hercules, softens to an Adonis; becomes the happy Romeo of some fortunate Juliet, or the Sir Harry Wildair of lighter loves. And there, moreover, his fictions are not wholly fictitious. His paradise of Dainty Devices is peopled with some realities; for there, fair familiar faces, whom he has secretly worshipped afar off, regard him with looks of love, and living bright eyes seek to rain influence only on him, and softest animate forms woo him to their arms.

Blest privilege, indeed, is this of self-retirement! Possession, more enviable than properties real or personal, is such a Happy Valley of Thought! Let the lord of this inheritance ever dwell and take his pleasure therein, basking in the sunshine and beauty of his own creation; let him recline, ever lapt in dreamy bliss, beneath his own imaginary vine, his own ideal fig-tree, nor envy the possessors of care-burdened realities, be they the proud halls of the Escorial, or the delicious gardens of Versailles.

MOUNTAINS.

YE proud old mountains, what dark spell
Have ye contrived, to chain
In love to you the souls that dwell
Beneath your cloudy reign?

Have your wild winds more melody
Than harp-awakening breeze?
Or sound more sweet your blasts on high,
Than lute 'mid orange trees?

Say, in your giant's lightning spear,
And cloud-wove billowy banner,
What magic charms the mountaineer,
And lures his soul to honour?

For far though from your eagle's nest
The Highland youth may roam,
His spirit clings around your breast,
No other spot his home.

The cit beneath a foreign sky
May court its gales of balm,
And, reckless, breathe his latest sigh
Beneath a foreign palm.

But your bold child, though round the sea
May gleam his battle blade,
Prays that his last, long home may be Within your solemn shade.

He sings the songs his father sung,
On golden Cathay's strand,
To which your echoes oft have rung—
The songs of father-land.

Old mountain echoes! mighty names
Are yours—from age to age
Sounding from crag to cavern—fame's
Undying heritage.

Wild tones ye on the winds have sped
To climes where bondsmen muttered
And clanked their chains in wrath and dread—
The tones which Wallace uttered,

And Annan Bruce and William Tell,
The glorious mountain three,
Whose names, wherever freemen dwell,
Are linked with liberty.

LITERARY REGISTER.

A Manual of Private or Ball-Room Dancing.
By Barclay Dun, Teacher of Dancing and Calisthenics.

AMONG the endless Manuals, Hints, Systems, Hand-Books, and Treatises on every imaginable subject, it is rather surprising that there are few or none upon DANCING, an art practised every day, and, at one time or other of their lives, by every individual in civilized society, which is more than can be affirmed of any other art whatever. Where there is one singer of any description, and however bad, there are fifty dancers. It is just so much the more necessary that the most universal and the most social of arts and exercises should be well understood; and though we do not go quite so far as Mr Dun in thinking that "the value of Dancing and Calisthenics depends entirely on the way in which either is taught,"

we at once admit that the more scientifically they are taught, so much the better. The lessons or rules laid down by Mr Dun are the result of many years' experience, and, as he states, of much thought. Far before mere dancing, or the knowledge of steps and figures, Mr Dun places the power which his pupils may possess to present themselves before company; or how easily and gracefully they may sit, walk, and comport themselves in dancing. This, undoubtedly, is the spirit of dancing as an art, and that which remains to charm when "dancing days" are long past and gone. Mr Dun propounds the true philosophy of his art in his preliminary remarks. The best dancer is not he who can leap high and perform so many tricks with his descending legs, as to astonish the groundlings; nor yet the dancer most skilled in intricate and new-fashioned steps and figures. Dancing he considers the art of showing a fi form, elegant taste, and graceful carriage to advantage. It has nothing more in truth than "to teach the lovely young woman to move unembarrassed and with peculiar grace through the mazes of the dance, either in private circles or public balls; in hours of happy pastime, or the celebration of festivity." A canon for ladies is, that "The utmost to which a gentlewoman need aspire in dancing is, an agile and graceful movement of her feet, an harmonious moving of her arms, and a corresponding easy carriage of her whole body." Some of the agile dancers are described as dancers only from the waist downwards—the nobler part of the person remaining either inanimate or in awkward motion; although the mere use of the legs is "not half the art." Mr Dun, who has long been a fashionable teacher in Edinburgh, remarks, "that ease and elegance of manner" is what he has always been anxious to inculcate on his scholars—

Being fully aware that the height of art is to conceal art, and that therefore ease, or at least the appearance of it, should accompany all the dancer's motions. There are, however, very few professional or public dancers who possess this happy art entirely; hence that astonishment which the performance of their most difficult and brilliant movements excites, is generally so blended with an idea of the uncommon toil to which they must necessarily subject themselves during their practice, that although our wonder may be for a moment extorted, yet compassion or regret soon follows. But our unalloyed admiration is reserved for the dancer whose steps are firm, yet flexible and well articulated—whose sinkings and risings are easy, soft, and unbroken, proceeding from a well-regulated employment of the strength and suppleness of the legs—whose body is erect (without stiffness), well balanced, and possessing an elastic power of rising and yielding, agreeably with the motion of the limbs—whose head is well set, and in perfect equilibrium, so that its moving may not disturb the unconstrained state of the body, with which, as well as with the arms and legs, it maintains an harmonious accompaniment. In conjunction with these acquirements, which may possibly result from art, it is presumed that nature has endowed the dancer with that feeling or sensibility of which I have already spoken; for it is impossible to exhibit through the medium of the body, what the soul does not feel. Thus accomplished, then, while "she floats through the mazes of [the dance," the simple, distinct, and varied movements of her feet, will be accompanied by an appropriate gesticulation of the body, head, and arms, rendering the tout ensemble a perfect combination of all that is beautiful and lovely: and then, and only then, can dancing be called the "poetry of motion."

There is the heart of the mystery. How to attain this perfection, we must leave to Mr Dun's instructions. They are scientific, practical, and minute. One general remark we shall quote, as we imagine that, by neglect or ignorance of the caution given, many a young lady has injured herself, and many a poor young gentleman has been needlessly pained and mortified—

I would recommend it, with every deference, to teachers of dancing to inculcate on the minds of their pupils the propriety of giving the hands, as it is called, in a free and easy manner; avoiding, while they are preparing to do so, all affected writhings of the neck, and all unnecessary writhings of the wrists; as I have often seen these faults carried to a ridiculous length by persons who could use their legs well. It is the fate of affectation never to escape detection. I would likewise recommend the giving of the hands in the dance always with an air of frankness and perfect good-will, which has a charming effect; for often there is not the slightest intention of wounding the feelings of parties with whom one has to dance, a careless attention to the matter I am speaking of may sometimes give offence, where perhaps none was meant.

Mr Dun conceives it the duty of teachers of dancing and calisthenics, to know something of human anatomy. To calisthenics, and exercises of older fame, he has devoted a portion of his work, and his brief treatise on Spinal Distortion, and its consequent deformities, contains whatever has been said by the most eminent physiologists on this fertile subject. Mr Dun disapproves of soft beds and high pillows; and where two children sleep in the same bed, he recommends that they should take different sides of the bed on alternate nights, and also lie on both their sides alternately. He gives many sound practical directions for the promotion of health, the development of the body, and the prevention of distortion and deformity, which may be useful to mothers and governesses, as well as to teachers.

The "Manual of the Ball-room" is, besides its more important qualities, a very neat and handy small tome, and an inexpensive one.

Ben Jonson's Works.

Mr Moxon has published an edition of this sterling English classic, in the same form as his late Falstaffian edition of Shakespeare. The whole works are contained in one handsome volume, printed in double-columns, and in a fine and clear type. From the style of the binding, it opens freely, so as to be comfortably read. Editions of this description, of standard works, uniting excellence with cheapness, and adapted to the rapidly-increasing number of persons of large literary desires and limited means, we look upon with great interest. An economical book-buyer can hardly make a better investment.

The memoir and dissertation are from the pen of Barry Cornwall, who does not seem to have that hearty sympathy with his author which is always desirable in the composition of a brief literary biography, where one naturally looks more to the works than their author. A good portrait of Ben, who looks as rough as he describes himself, and a pretty view of Hawthornden, are the embellishments of the edition.

The Pictorial Shakespeare.

The Second Part of this superb work consists of the play of King John; the Third, of Romeo and Juliet. Both are exquisitely embellished; and the variorum notes display the same critical and antiquarian learning and good taste, which augured so fairly for the edition on the appearance of Part I.

Records of the Kirk of Scotland, from 1638 downwards. By Alexander Peterkin, Editor of the "Compendium of Church Laws," &c. &c.

Nec tamen consumeatur, is the motto of our venerable national kirk—a burning bush its blazonry. The bush is fairly a-blaze again, whatever be the upshot, and therefore forms the appropriate ensign of Mr Peterkin's title-page. Most opportunely does his work appear, as if to beat the flame, and rake up the embers of our old controversy, not so much with Papists as with "prelatic malignants" and the "wicked hierarchy." Individually, the editor does nothing of the sort—though an ably written Historical Introduction breathes Presbyterianism "true blue"—but the purpose is more effectually accomplished by the publication of the Acts of Assembly and the Records of the Kirk. These documents are in every way curious and interesting; and convey a high idea of the political sagacity and capacity for public business of the Fathers of the Scottish Church. The work is to appear in a series of One-shilling Parts. It is very neatly printed, and must form a desirable book to all Scottish Presbyterians and their numerous offshoots, whether clerical or laical. From his peculiar line of research, and filial devotion to the Church of Scotland, we know of no man living so perfectly fitted for the task he has assumed as Mr Peterkin. The publication is exceedingly interesting, merely from its historical and antiquarian character, and also from proving in every page how true it is that

"New Presbyter is but Old Priest writ large."

To this work we shall probably advert hereafter. The formal sentences of Deposition of the Bishops, the Abjuration of Episcopacy, the "Bastard Sacraments," and such matters, are truly piquant now-a-days, when "the Sister Establishment" of England has grown so greatly in favour with Presbyterians.

The Booke of the Universall Kirk of Scotland.

This work is, like the above, edited by Mr Peterkin, with Historical Notes. It is the earliest record of the Church of Scotland known to exist; and to Mr Peterkin belongs the merit of rescuing it from the black-letter and MS. oblivion in which it has lain for centuries in public libraries. It embraces the period from 1560 to 1616. The original registers were, it would seem, filched by a Mr Campbell, a rigid Episcopalian, to whom they had been intrusted, and who bequeathed them, as if his private property, to Sion College, under an injunction that they should never be restored to the Presbyterian Church. They were destroyed when the Houses of Parliament were burnt down; but, fortunately, several transcripts existed, though somewhat abbreviated. It is from two MS. copies of "The Booke," which are in the Advocates' Library, that Mr Peterkin is printing, with literal fidelity, this curious work. His object is to render so important a record cheaply accessible to the country and the Church; and it is really surprising that, with so many leisured and zealous Churchmen, this duty should not have been performed long ago. It was indeed an object for the Assembly to have undertaken. A brief specimen will best explain the character of these happily rescued registers:—

Sess. 3a. December 28, 1567.

Ordaines that Superintendants and Commissioners appointed shall plant ministers vaikand in sic rowmes where the parishioners will gladly susteine them on their owne expenses, whill other order be had; and that they remove nane out of their rowme, being found qualifed, without the advyce and consent both of the ministrie, and kirk-worthie of the place.

Sess. 4a. December 30, 1567.

Anent the accusatione laid to my Lord Argyll's charge, touching the separation betwixt him and his wife; declared that he was not the occasioun thereof. As to other offences whatsoever, wherthrough he has been anyways scandalous to the Kirk, he was content to subject himself to the discipline of the Kirk at all tymes maist willinglie; and, therefore, the Kirk ordained the Superintendent of Argyll to take tryall of the saids scandalers committed be the said Earle, and thereafter to cause sic satisfaction be made, as God's Law appoints, and to report the order thereof to the next Generall Assemblie of the Kirk, together with his own diligence in executione of his office of Superintendencie.

Anent the marriage of the Queen with the Earle Bothwell, be Adam, called Bishop of Orkney; the hail Kirk finds that he transgressed the acts of the Kirk in marrying the divorced adulterer; and, therefore, deprives him of all functione of the ministrie, conforme to the tenor of the act made thereupon, ay and whill the Kirk be satisfied of the scandaler committit be him.

The same day Mr John Craige was bruitit for proclaiming the bands betwixt the Queen and the Earle Bothwell, who answered be word, justifying his proceedings thereanent, and was ordained to give in his purgation in write, to the effect his good mynd and proceedings may be knowne to all and sundrie that hereafter would be satisfied thereanent.

A passage in the purgation of Mr John Craige is to this effect:—

Being admittit, afternoone, before my Lord in Council, I laid to his charge the law of adulterie, the ordinance of the Kirk, the law of ravishing, the suspicion of collusion betwixt him and his wife, the sudden divorcement and proclaiming within the space of four dayes, and last the suspicioun of the King's death, whilk his marriage will confirme. But he answered nothing to my satisfacioun: Wherefore, after many exhortationes, I protested that I could not but declare my minde openly to the Kirk. Therefore, upon Sunday, after I had declared what they had done, and how they would proceed whether we would or not, I tooke Heaven and earth to witness that I abhorred and detested that marriage, because it was odious and scandalous to the world; and seeing the best part of the realme did approve it, either be flatterie or else be their silence, I desyred the faithfull to pray earnestly that God would turne it to the comfort of this realme, that thing whilk they intended againes reasone and good conscience. I, because I heard some persons gangand againes me, used their reasones for my defences: First, I had broken no law be proclaiming of thir persones at their request: Secondly, If their marriage was scandalous and hurtful, I did well for warning all men of it in tyme. Thirdly—

These were the palmy days of Presbytery, when Lady Argyll, for being present at the christening of the infant James, could be thus rated:—

Sess. 5a. December ultimo 1567.

Anent the complaint give in against my Lady Argyll, declaring how sche once being at the table of the Lord Jesus, and professing his Evangell, had revolted therefrae, in giving her assistance and presence to the baptizing of the King in ane papisticall manner. The said lady being present, grantit that she had offended to the eternall God, and been ane scandaler to the Kirk in committing the premises; and therefore willingly submitted herself to the discipline of the Kirk and discretioun of them. Therefore, the Kirk ordaines the said lady to make publick repentance in the Chapell-Royall of Stirling, upon aue Sunday in tyme of preaching; and this to be done at sick tyme as the Kirk hereafter shall appoint to the Superintendent of Lowthiane, providing alwayes it be before the next Assembly.

This work is surely well-deserving the patronage of the Church and of all its adherents. It is appearing in Parts, and will form a work worth any fifty of the Rox-burgh or Bannatyne-Club publications. Among the articles sent up by the Assembly to the Queen, in 1566, we find the following:—

Fourthly, For sustentation of the poor, that all lands founded to hospitalitie of old be restored agane to this same use, and that all lands, annuallents, or any other emoluments pertaining any ways to the friers of whatsum-ever ordour, or annuallents, altargies pertaining to Priests, be applied to the sustentation of the poor, and uphald of Schooles in the towns and others places where they ly.

What would the landed aristocracy of Scotland say if those lands were now reclaimed for these purposes—lands of which they have had the use for nearly three centuries?

The Law of Christ, respecting Civil Obedience, and the Payment of Tribute.

A Third Edition of Dr Brown's work has appeared, improved and enlarged! We should imagine, that those who, for some matter of a few shillings, or pounds, if it came to pounds, stirred up this affair, will now be disposed to cry—"Hold! Enough!" To say that we regret the issues which this strife has brought forth, would be gross dissimulation. From recent manifestations of the Established-Church clergy, both in Scotland and England, it is becoming evident that it is to the principles of dissent that the laity have now to look for the defence of civil liberty and of personal security. It is long since these reverend persons set themselves above the gospel—now they fairly set themselves above the law of the land.

Essays on the Apocalypse. By R. B. Sanderson. Second Edition.

It is not necessary to notice anything in Second Editions, save additions. Here a preliminary address to the Queen is the principal. Mr Sanderson wishes her Majesty to be a religious woman, and a liberal-minded Sovereign. He wishes her a good husband who shall be a friend to liberal measures; but, above all, he advises her to lay down her spiritual supremacy, which he does not consider fit for any human being, and, least of all, for a young female. And, if Henry VIII. could assume it of himself, why may not Victoria I. lay it down? Finally, he desires to impress upon her Majesty's mind that there is no safety for any potentate of the present day, save by an immediate dissolution of the partnership between Church and State. National churches are the parasite ivy which clings to until it undermines the crumbling tower—the incrustation which has enveloped, by gradual concretion, the diamond Christianity. The Church, the Queen is told, brought Charles I. to the block; and Queen Anne, through mental anxiety, to an untimely end. The Headship of the Church was certainly never more a source of amusement than now to those sour Presbyterians and vain jesters who do not acknowledge Queen Victoria's Spiritual Supremacy; and it does sound oddly enough—“Yesterday, the Head of the Church took a gallop on the downs in a dark-green habit and riding-cap, attended by the Master of the Buck-hounds, Miss Quentin, Lord Melbourne, &c.,” or, “Last night, the Head of the Church, at the court ball, danced a quadrille with Prince George;” or, “The Head of the Church went privately to Drury-Lane to see the pantomime of ‘Jack Frost,’ with which she expressed herself highly delighted.” If we do not greatly mistake his drift, Mr Sanderson, admitting the First Beast in the Revelations to be the Church of Rome, makes out the Second to be the Church of England.

Whistle Binkie.

Appropos to the season of festivity, when all sing who can sing, and, kinder still, many are willing to try whether they can or not, out comes to their aid, and the delectation of their friends, a Second Series of “Whistle Binkie.” Our edition, we are glad to find, comprehends both first and second, and is, moreover, edited by Sandy Rodger.

The songs are, we imagine, nearly all original; though, to say the truth, some of the bards are probably better known to oral fame than to the regular police of the press. The choicest contributions are those of the Editor and Ballantine of Edinburgh. A few sterling old songs find a place. Our selected specimen is anonymous, and in commemoration of the glories of the Glasgow deputation who attended upon George IV. on his visit to Scotland—but not the worse for wanting a name.

“Come aff wi’ your bonnets, huzza! huzza!
The provost is comin’, huzza! huzza!
The bailies and beddles, wi’ hammers and treddles,
An’ lingsles, and barreles, an’ a’, an’ a’.

“Gif in Embro our dwellin’ ye saw, ye saw,
Wi’ our ain Provost’s name on the Ca, the Ca,
An’ a’ that accords, ye wad tak us for lords,
An’ let them that win, laugh awa, laugh awa.

Come aff wi’ your bonnets, &c.

“We’ll hing up our signs in a raw, a raw,
Mong flunkies, and saulies sae braw, sae braw,
Wi’ goud and wi’ green, we’ll dazzle folks’ een,
An’ Let Glasgow aye Flourish! awa, awa.

Come aff wi’ your bonnets, &c.

“When to Majesty down we maun fa’, maun fa’;
Lik baillie sae gaucy and braw, and braw,
We canna we’ll guess how great George can do less Than to mak’e bits o’ us a’, us a’.

Come aff wi’ your bonnets, &c.

This we call a good song; so in general are all the humorous ones; but there is a selection of superlatively fine sentimental lyrics, which transcend us. We hope Mr Rodger comprehends them. Here is the closing stanza of—“Brightly is the streamlet flowing Brightly, oh! brightly, oh!”

“But what sun illumines the bushes,
Radiant, oh! radiant, oh!”

“Tis Matilda’s glowing blushes,
Radiant, oh! radiant, oh!”

Thus then, streamlet, run, and never
From thy mother river sever:

Oh! Matilda’s mine for ever—
Radiant, oh! radiant, oh!”

This beats “a Person of Quality” all to sticks; but we suppose it may be a parody of Whistle Binkie’s on some sentimental song.

The Comic Almanac.

In the II. Victoria, the pencil of Cruickshank is richer than ever; and Rigdum Funnidos, Gent., the editor of “The Comic,” no whit fallen off, either in his jest or in his earnest. The illustrations of the Months serve a double purpose; for they also illustrate the twelve principal adventures of “The Life of Robert Stubbs, the younger,” whose thread of story runs round the whole circle of the months, from January to December; by which time, notwithstanding the comic turn of his many disasters, one is quite sick of so pitiful and sneaking a scoundrel. It is, however, a clever story of the Jerrold school; and it renders the interest of the Comic continuous, and the incidental jokes and squibs so much the more piquant, for this kind of relief. Rigdum Funnidos dabbles this year in politics, in a small way, and is Conservative and satirical.

The minor illustration for September, of jarveys in all stages of despair, is followed by these lines:—

HARVEY versus JARVEY.

A Moloncholy Case.

“Well, here’s a fine beginning all along of these here Jarveys,

Sure-ly they’re getting the whip hand of all us honest Jarveys;

To rob us of our fare is like depriving us of vittles,
And giving us no meat to cut, but leaving us a Whittle.
The watermen are all in tears—it’s fitting you should know,
That the stopping of our going is to them a tale of ‘Wo;’
And the ‘oases stands, quite sad to see, beside the crib in vain,

And wonders whether they shall ever taste a bit again.
Now they’re gettin’ out of natur, for their raws is all a healing,

And soon they’ll be onsenseless brutes, without a bit of feeling,

Or else they’ll pine away so fast, the knackers scarce will skin ‘em,

For they miss the bits of thrashing just to keep the life within ‘em,

And the cuts that makes ‘em lively, arter waiting in the street,

For ‘tis but being on the stand, that keeps ‘em on their feet.
Now, blowd if I can understand this here licensious day,

Unless it means the taking all our license quite away;
And then, again, for characters, how very hard they use ‘em,

Both them as vainly strive to find, and those who’d gladly lose ‘em.

The cads look quite cadaverous, to think there’s such a fuss
At their stepping from the treadmill, to the step behind a bus;

But here’s the greatest grief, and sure it makes one choke to put on

A libel to one’s neck, just like cheap cag-mag-srag of mutton;

There’s nothing stares us in the face but rueful ruination,
So there’s my ticket, and I’ll seek some more genteel vocation.

One of the illustrations of August is a chess-board, with the pieces set out, and the motto “Black moves and wins.” It commemorates the abolition of Negro Apprenticeship, and tells of him—

* The dose-plate—the Glasgow Deputation occupied a whole house.

"Dozing in his easy chair,
Round his nose mosquitoes flitting,
Sweltering in the sunny air,
Was Nine-tail Joe of Kingston sitting.

"Now Nine-tail Joe loved cheerfulness,
And he chanced in a pleasant mood to be,
So he flogged his niggers, and played at chess,
And drank a full jorum of Sangaree.

"What can be the matter with flogging Joe?
His eyes are rolling to and fro,
And he rubs his nose with his finger and thumb,
And gasps to speak like one that is dumb.

"The forms that lately were pawns and knights,
And bishops, and queens, and kings,
Were reeling and wheeling, like so many sprites
Or other unearthly things.

"And beings all fearfully black were there,
And they roll'd their eyes at Joe,
And wildly flourished the cat in air,
And danced to 'Jump Jim Crow.'

"Before them fled both bishop and knight,
While pawn and king were seen
Rolling and tumbling in awful plight—
Decorum was gone, and they fled outright—
And surely it was a most terrible sight,
When the bishop fell over the queen.

"With burning head and aching heart,
Up from his chair did the planter start;
But the vision had fled, and there, instead
Of dancing niggers' furious tread,
Was seen the bill, the dreadful bill,
The Whiggish Act of Slavery,
That made him rich against his will,
And stopped him in his knavery.

"The planter's dream doth plainly seem
To point a moral deep:
If you choose to whack a nigger's back,
You should never go to sleep."

The "Annual Register," and the "Association of the British Illuminati at Birmingham," contain several good hits.

Hay on the Laws of Harmonious Colouring, as adapted to Interior Decorations, Manufactures, &c. Fourth Edition.

This volume, which, we believe, in its original form, was intended chiefly as a guide to housepainters and decorators, has, in its various editions, gradually grown into a scientific work, without, however, losing its practical character. The laws of colouring are illustrated by coloured plates. The entire work seems the result of patient study and long-continued observation. It will afford many useful hints to those who are fitting up and decorating their dwellings, while it forms a code of systematic knowledge to young designers and practical decorators.

Mudie's Mental Philosophy.

This volume is intended as an elementary treatise, or a first book in teaching the means and objects of the study of the mind. The arrangement is clear, and the illustrations are often felicitous. It will form a good introduction to the study of "Brown's Philosophy;" while to those young students who do not pursue the science of metaphysics deeply, it may, in some sort, supply the place of "Brown's Lectures."

The Entomologist's Text-book. By J. O. Westwood, F.L.S.

In this volume, the leading entomological articles, written by the author for the "British Cyclopædia of Natural History," are collected, and form a general outline of the science, or Elements of Entomology. New plates of insects have been added to those which originally illustrated the different articles in the "Cyclopædia."

Some of the insects, as gnats, moths, butterflies, &c., are very prettily coloured. The book will be found amusing to young persons, besides being instructive in the science which it expounds.

Todd's Student's Manual.

Among the many plain, sensible, and highly commendable works for the young which we owe to America, this is one of the best. The regular student in his college, or the youth anxious to improve himself, will find the general directions and the advice of this well-informed monitor equally valuable. Some may consider the author of the manual too sober-minded or too frugal of both time and money; but let it be remembered that he is of the country of Franklin. He is also a rigid moral disciplinarian; and, it may be thought, apt to be somewhat puritanical, narrow, or strait-laced in his opinions of certain popular books and authors. But, if there be error, it is on the safe side. The work seems carefully reprinted from the seventh American edition.

Scenery of Edinburgh and Mid-Lothian.

A second set of these engravings has been published, which, in every respect, keeps up to the promise of the first. To specify the various excellencies of the series, would, therefore, be only to repeat ourselves. The work is neatly and even handsomely executed, and surprisingly cheap. We do not mean low-priced, for many pictorial works are very low-priced, which we should not call cheap: The principal subjects of this set are Holyroodhouse and Burns' Monument; the interior of the Parliament House; and very pretty views of the classic and pastoral Habbie's How, Duddingstone Loch in the skating season, with Crichton Castle, Dalkeith, and a few more architectural plates and interiors. We have no doubt that the joint labours of the brother artists will find a cordial welcome with all Scotsmen, as well as with those who have found a temporary home among the beautiful, the grand, and the venerable scenes so tastefully delineated.

Every Man his own Butler.

Mr Cyrus Redding, the author of "A History and Description of Modern Wine"—a work of considerable reputation—has been induced to "get up a word of advice upon wine," giving honest counsel to everybody who buys wine and who drinks it. The previous knowledge of the subject possessed by the author has made him a full man, and he has put a great deal into narrow space, and produced, at the same time, a cleverly-written and entertaining book, at about the price of a single bottle of sherry, and well worth more money to all wine consumers who require a guide, and have the sagacity to follow a well-informed and sound one.

PAMPHLETS.

The "Letter to the Queen, by a Friend of the People," has formed a text for a set of trumpety or catch-penny pamphlets, the object of one of them being to apologize for her Majesty's Whig Ministers; of the others, to sell. They demand no particular notice. The apology goes over the beaten ground of what the Whigs, in their new Poor-Law, their Irish Poor-Law, the Abolition of Slavery, the Municipal Bill, &c., &c., &c., have done and the unimagined and unnamed blessings they may yet confer upon the country, if it will only maintain them in place.

Mr LISTER, the author of the LIFE OF CLAREN DON, has published a refutation of the gross misstatements and bold averments of The Quarterly Review, its late captious, shallow, and ill-informed review of his work.

We are glad to see that Colonel Thompson has sent abroad, at this time, a large sixpenny-worth of his acute exposure of Corn-Law Fallacies.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE sitting of Parliament is at hand, but no indication has been given of the policy of Ministers. That the dolce far niente, the do-as-little-as-possible system, will be persevered in, if possible, there can be no doubt. But the rumour is, that the Ministers will be forced into a decided course of conduct, at the very opening of the Session, by the 200 Members of the Commons who voted for the Ballot. If a Government opposition be again made to the Ballot, it is understood that these Radical M.P.'s will no longer "support the present Ministry," is the phrase is; by which is meant, keep them in power, at the expense of the principles which these M.P.'s profess to maintain. The Ministers are said to have resolved to oppose Reform, if the Reformers will force them to decide, and to lean on the Tories for support. No doubt the Tories will support them, until Tory support, no less than the opposition of the Reformers, shall have utterly ruined them with the country; and then their Tory supporters will quietly "walk into them," as the Yankees say. The alarm caused by the violent proceedings of the Chartists or Universal-Suffrage men in the manufacturing districts, has subsided, and even with the Tories in power there is not now materiel wherewithal to get up a green-bag committee. The fire and fury of the physical force men have expended themselves very innocently; the propositions of the supporters of it at the later meetings having dwindled down to the mere assertion of the right of the people to keep arms, and to use them if illegally attacked—propositions which nobody ever disputed, and which are laid down much more emphatically by the Tory writers of the last century than by the Ultra-Radicals of our own day. So far were our ancestors from being afraid of the people being armed, that they enjoined it under the most severe penalties; and the Statute-Books both of England and Scotland are filled with regulations on this head. The very tenure by which the citizens of burghs held the right to their tenements, was watching and warding, or the military defence of the burgh. Weapon-schawings, or reviews of the arms and armour of the population within their jurisdiction, were held yearly by the sheriffs of counties, and by the provost and magistrates of burghs. The arms of each particular class were religiously regulated, according to its presumed wealth: and we find it enacted, that "no manner of weapons be limited to weapon-schawings but spears, pikes, stark and lang, of six elnes in length, Leith axes, halberds, hand-bows and arrows, cross-bows, culverings, and two-handed swords." The claim of right in 1689 expressly set forth "the disarming of Protestants" as a grievance; and one of the first statutes passed under the Revolution settlement, was one declaring the right of the people to use arms for their defence suitable to their condition and degree; which, as the Tory Blackstone remarks, "is indeed a public allowance, under due restrictions, of the natural right of resistance and self-preservation, when the sanctions of society and laws are found insufficient to restrain the violence of oppression." The same writer elsewhere remarks, in talking of the liberties of Englishmen, that "to vindicate their rights when actually violated or attacked, the subjects of England are entitled, in the first place, to the regular administration and free course of justice in the courts of law; next, to the right of petitioning the King and Parliament for redress of grievances; and lastly, to the right of having and using arms for self-preservation and defence. And all these rights and liberties it is our birth-right to enjoy entire." It would be well to discover how our ancestors contrived to rule men armed in the way we have described, and what it is that occasions so much dread when a few of the population, in one or two counties, procure, like their richer neighbours, for their self-defence or amusement, a few pikes or pistols, acting up, in this respect, to the practice, as well as precepts, of our ancestors. One thing is obvious, that, as in those times there was no standing army in time of peace, the measures of the Government must have been more in accordance with the feelings of the people than at the present day; and, in truth, the system of taxation of articles of food, and of interference with the industry of the people, by prohibitions and restrictions on imports and exports, had hardly begun. We have little doubt that, when the burden of taxation is placed where it ought—where we hope it will soon be—on property and not on labour, and especially on the rents of land—a species of revenue derived, not from industry, but from the mere increase of population—the fears entertained by the higher for the lower classes of society will quickly disappear. Besides, it is well to consider, when we hear so much of foreign invasion, and when defences, are erecting on our coasts to protect the country, whether it is good policy to discourage the use of defensive arms.

SCOTLAND.

PUBLIC MEETINGS on the subject of the Corn-Laws have been held in Glasgow, Dundee, and Edinburgh; and we are happy to find that at all these meetings not only has the "total and immediate repeal" been advocated, but also the removal of all protective duties on manufactures and articles of subsistence. The Edinburgh meeting was the largest that has been held for many years; and the only interruption to the proceedings that arose was from those who, being disagreeably crowded, and unable to hear the speakers, wished an adjournment into the open air; but, on putting the motion to the meeting, it was negatived by ten to one. The Lord Provost was in the chair, and the Liberal party of all shades—Whigs, Radicals, and Ultra-Radicals—joined unanimously in the proceedings. There appeared to be some apprehension at first among the working men who were present that it was meant to substitute a fixed duty for the existing law; but when it was found that the resolutions clearly and explicitly asserted the principles of free trade in their fullest extent, as regards manufactures as well as agriculture, and prayed for the establishment of these principles, universal satisfaction was expressed.

FIRE INSURANCE IN EDINBURGH AND OTHER TOWNS.—It has often occurred to us, as a remarkable circumstance, that the owners of such property as the New Town of Edinburgh, and of the merchandise and furniture contained in it, should have been so long content to pay the same rate of insurance as persons who have property situated in the worst part of the Old Town. It is plain that the risk of fire in the case of the latter is much greater than in that of the former; for, to say nothing of the dissipated and profligate habits of the inhabitants of the closes, &c. of the Old Town, the number of fires constantly to be found in the houses there, where each apartment, in numerous instances, is inhabited by a separate family, greatly increases the danger of fire. It is well known, besides, that at least some of the fires which have taken place in the Old Town, arose from the profligate character of the inhabitants of the houses consumed. One of the great fires, which took place in November 1824, was distinctly traced to the throwing of a glass of spirits, by a man in a state of intoxication, into the fire of a whisky cellar; and another, that in the Parliament Square, was ascertained to have broken out in a garret brothel. For a great number of years, there has not been a fire of a serious nature in the west part of the New Town, and there never were any of the extent of those which have so often taken place in the Old Town. When a fire breaks out among crowded buildings, it is exceedingly difficult to extinguish it, from its being impossible to get access for fire engines, and from the great quantity of combustible matter in the form of wainscoting, &c., with which the old houses abound. The charge payable for ordinary risks at present—1s. 6d. per cent.—certainly seems, at first sight, very moderate; but where the system of mutual insurance has been tried, all loss and expenses have been paid for a much smaller sum. In the Canton of Neuchâtel, in Switzerland, a Mutual Insurance Society has long existed; and it is found that about 8d. per cent., per annum, covers all losses. Much less would, we are convinced, cover the loss in the new part of Edinburgh; for, in the Canton of Neuchâtel, the greater proportion of the houses is covered with shingles of wood, and, from the abundance and cheapness of timber in the Jura Mountains, much more wood is used in the construction of houses of all kinds than with us. In the Canton of Zurich, there is a general system of compulsory insurance. The Canton is the general insurer, and levies a tax on all the buildings in the Canton. We have often thought that, as Government cannot want, or at least will not take off, the heavy tax of 3s. per cent. on fire insurance, they ought to take the matter into their own hand; raise an insurance tax, and render the insurance of all buildings and furniture compulsory, and pay the losses which occur. It is, perhaps, the only tax which was ever invented that would be willingly paid; for it would be the only one for which every one would see he had some equivalent. The present set of surveyors and collectors of the assessed taxes would be able, with a little assistance, to manage the insurance tax; and hence, all the money expended at present in salaries, office rents, and other expenses, by the insurance offices, would accrue to Government. This must amount to a very large sum annually. In Edinburgh alone there are from twenty-five to thirty offices and agents for insurance against fire. We presume the proprietors of the stock of insurance companies would not seriously object to Government appropriating this branch of business to itself; for it is generally said, that the present rate of 1s. 6d. for common risks, is by no means an adequate remuneration for the risk.

But to revert to the scheme of mutual insurance. All that would be necessary would be for the owner of each property, in a particular street or district, to pay a certain per centage on the value of his property; and it would probably be advisable, that no one should be allowed to insure more than three-fourths of its value; for it is a very rare circumstance, indeed, that property is utterly destroyed; and such a regulation would be a check against fraud. We have no doubt that, in the course of a few years, so much money would be collected, that no farther payments would be required, or, at least, that they would be reduced to a mere trifle; and whenever this took place, not only the premium but the duty to Government would be henceforth saved. Provision should also be made for keeping up engines and firemen, and the efficiency of the protection would be greatly increased by having the engine and firemen constantly at hand; for the station of the one and residences of the other, would be within the district. The property insured in Great Britain is very great; for the duty paid being about £900,000 per annum, shews that property to the value of six hundred millions is covered; yet it is doubtful if there is not at least as much more unprotected at present, and great misery often arises in consequence. Any plan by which fire insurance could be extended, is worthy of consideration. Notwithstanding the numerous Scotch offices, a great part of the business in Scotland appears to be done by agents of English offices: for while the English offices pay £750,000 of duty, the Scotch pay only £50,000, one-fifteenth part; whereas the usual proportion of taxation of Scotland to England is 1s. from an eighth to a tenth part. It is impossible to close this subject without adverting to the unfair advantage given to the landed interest, by exempting farm buildings, stock, &c., from duty, while the duty is allowed to remain at a rate equal to double the premium on the property of every other class of the community. No thing but a parliament of landlords, having their eye blinded to every interest but their own, could have been guilty of so gross an act of injustice.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

PRODUCTIVENESS OF LOW DUTIES.—The mischief and hardship occasioned to the people of this country by high duties are incalculable. These high duties are imposed either with the view of raising revenue or of protecting the interest of some particular trade or class, at the expense of the whole community. In as far as the first object is concerned, high duties have signally failed as the history of many commodities shews. Our limit only permit us, at present, to advert to one—coffee. Previously to 1732, the duty on coffee was 2s. per pound in that year, it was reduced to 1s. 6d., and the duty thence arising averaged, for several years, £10,000 a year. The high duty, however, encouraged smuggling and the consequence was, that the revenue, in 1783, had declined to £2869. In 1784, the duty was reduced to 6d., and the revenue immediately rose to £7200—shewing an increase in the consumption of legally-imported coffee of eightfold. In 1807, the duty was 1s. 8d., the revenue £160,000; in 1808, the duty was reduced to 7d. and the very next year the revenue rose to £245,836, or 50 per cent. and upwards of eight millions of pound weight of coffee were consumed in 1809 more than in 1807. In 1819, the duty was again raised to 1s.—the consumption instantly declined two millions of pound below what it had been in 1817, and the revenue was under £400,000. In 1824, the duty was again reduced to 6d.—the consumption increased by three millions of pounds weight; and, in 1831, the consumption was three times what it was in 1819, and the revenue £583,000—being 50 per cent. higher with the duty at 6d. than with the duty at 1s. In 1836, the duty on East India coffee was also reduced to 6d.; and the total consumption last year exceeded 26 millions of pound weight, yielding a revenue of £650,000—the consumption being now twenty-four-fold, and the revenue fourfold what they were in 1807, under the 1s. 8d. duty, and the population during that period not having increased fifty per cent. This places the injurious effects of high duties on the revenue in a striking point of view. But it may be said that the increased consumption of coffee must have led to a diminished consumption of tea; and thus that the gain of revenue on the one was balanced by the loss on the other. This, however, is by no means the case; for, while the quantity of tea consumed in 1800 little exceeded nineteen millions of pounds weight, in 1833 it closely approached 32 millions of pounds; and the revenue from it rose, in the interval, nearly half a million. There can be no doubt, however, that the duty on coffee is still much too high, and that it is adulterated with roasted rye, chicory, and other articles to an immense extent. The profit on such adulteration is very great. It is only coffee of a very ordinary quality which can be purchased for 1s. 6d. a lb.; while chicory after paying a duty of 6d. per lb., is sold for 8d., and roasted rye cannot cost 2d. per lb. There is every reason to believe, therefore, that the reduction of the duty, which at present is equal to from 50 to 100 per cent., according to the quality of the value, would not diminish the revenue; as it would unquestionably tend not only to increase the number of consumers of coffee, but also the quantity made use of by those who drink it at present.

BAD EFFECTS OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.—The other object of high duties is to protect some particular class, for each class must have its protection as far as possible, leaving it to Providence to protect all those who do not belong to some favoured trade or pursuit. Hence foreign food is prohibited for the benefit of the landlords; foreign sugar, coffee, and rum, are loaded with heavy duties, to favour the West India interest; foreign leather boots and shoes, to protect our tanners and boot and shoemakers; foreign cottons, woollens, &c., to benefit our manufacturers; foreign timber, to enable the Canadians to assert their independence; and so on through the whole Tariff, the duties varying from 20 to 60 per cent. It appears to be quite forgotten that one-fourth of the families in Britain are employed neither in agriculture, manufactures, trade, nor handicrafts, and thus are excluded from protection. We are glad to observe that the Manchester manufacturers have expressed their willingness to consent to a repeal of these protecting duties; for it is unreasonable to ask the landlords to admit foreigners freely to compete with their manufacture, while other manufacturers insist on a duty averaging at least 25 per cent. on the value. Had the importation of grain been regulated in the same manner as that of manufactures, instead of importing foreign wheat at present at 1s. a quarter of duty, we must have paid 20s., and the duty on all other kinds of grain, except oats, would have been higher than at this moment. The landlords are quite aware of this, and if the present Corn Law be repealed, they will attempt to get an ad valorem duty substituted for the present fluctuating system; and if this be accomplished, it will be found that there will be anything but advantage from a change. But not only are the people of this country loaded with heavy duties for the purpose of protecting favoured classes at home, but they are also made to pay for the purpose of protecting class interests in our Colonies. Hence the heavy duty laid on foreign timber, the discriminating duties on sugar, coffee, rum, and other articles. St Domingo coffee can be purchased in bond at from 41s. to 45s. per cwt.; but its consumption is prohibited by a duty of 1s. 3d. a pound, or 140s. per cwt.—a tax of 350 per cent., and this at a time when the British possessions do not produce enough of coffee for our own consumption. We annually import upwards of fifteen millions of pounds weight of foreign coffee, but all of it is again exported owing to the heavy duty. The amount of the tax paid by the people of this country to support the West Indies monopoly, on the single article of coffee, may be judged of from a fact stated in a petition from Liverpool—viz., that coffee of a quality equal to what we pay £5 per cwt. for, could be imported from Hayti and sold for 44s., making a difference to the consumer of 6d. per pound, so that from this single article a tax of £650,000 a-year is raised for the protection of the West India interest, or precisely the same sum as our own revenue derives from that article. A much larger tax is raised by the West India monopolists on sugar, for as the consumption exceeds four millions of cwts., and the difference of the duty between British plantation and foreign sugar is 39s. a cwt., if we assume the cost is raised in Britain 10s. a cwt., we have two millions more exacted from sugar. We say nothing at present of other articles: but it appears to us that, with the view of introducing a system of free trade—an object which is justly considered of the utmost importance by the most intelligent men of all classes—a beginning should be made by abolishing all discriminating duties on articles imported, for however much our colonies may be injured by such an abolition, the mother country is sure to gain in a much greater degree.

AGRICULTURE.

The corn markets have of late shewn a tendency to fall, the prices of grain having risen so high that speculators are afraid to purchase. The average for the week ending 18th January was: wheat, 82s. 8d.; barley, 40s. 4d.; oats, 26s. 8d.—the highest prices since 1818. The best wheat in the Edinburgh market, on the 16th January, brought 90s., but the average was only 75s. 6d.; and at Haddington, the same week, 76s. 3d.; from which we infer that the Scotch wheat is this year very inferior to the English in quality. The efforts making for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws, do not appear to have deterred the farmer from proceeding with improvements of the most expensive nature; for the making of drains is now going on to so great an extent in our southern counties, that labourers are in great demand, and wages have risen. A great breadth of wheat has been sown, and is looking well. The last crop has not turned out so well as was anticipated; and although foreign wheat is coming in from many quarters, we do not think there is any probability of any considerable fall of prices till the new crop is reaped. At Leghorn, the best wheat, at the date of the last accounts, was selling at 66s.; and, allowing for freight, insurance, commission, and profit, it could not be sold in London under 84s.; so that, even high as prices are, there is little inducement to bring grain from the Mediterranean. It is now asserted that in the Baltic ports there is a larger supply of grain than was generally believed a month or two ago; but considering how little inducement there has been of late years to grow grain for exportation, it is not likely that any great supply is likely to be got from that quarter.

Absurd attempts are making by the Corn-Law advocates to decry manufactures and laud agriculture. But, of any class, agricultural labourers are the worst paid. Masons and joiners earn from 18s. to 24s. a-week, and many other tradesmen much higher wages; but an agricultural labourer can seldom if ever earn 10s. a-week, the whole year round. Suppose such a labourer has a wife and three children, were they to consume wheat bread, as most of them have done of late years, it would absorb at least 7s. of his earnings; the weekly rent of his house will take another shilling; so that he will only have 3½d. a day for clothing, fuel, and all other articles of food, except bread. Whether this be an enviable state of things, we leave our readers to judge. As the number of persons employed in agriculture is often exaggerated, we may notice, that it is considerably under one-third of the population; for it appears, from the census of 1831, that out of 3,414,175 families in Great Britain, 961,134 were employed in agriculture; and the proportion must be much less at present, for, while the population generally had, in the preceding ten years, increased 34 per cent., the agriculturists had added only 7½ per cent. to their numbers.

THE MANAGER OF THE SOUTH AUSTRALIAN COMPANY.

We have received a letter from Mr Wheeler, Manager of the South Australian Company, dated 9th January, complaining, that in Tait's Magazine for December we had noticed certain queries, addressed to him by a writer subscribing T. H. B. in the Times newspaper of 10th November, but had taken no notice of his reply, which appeared in that journal on the 13th November. The reason is plain: we had not time, although we had considered Mr Wheeler's unsupported assertion or denial—for it is nothing more—deserving publication. The Times of the 13th could not have reached Scotland till the 16th. Our contributors and correspondents cannot be always on the watch for statements in London journals; and the magazine for December was despatched to London on the morning of the 22d, having been, in the interval from the arrival of the Times newspaper, printed, stitched, packed, &c. Why did Mr Wheeler not complain earlier? and in the January number we should have with pleasure stated, what we do now—that he has never heard one word of “the rotten-horn,” a cattle distemper about which T. H. B. inquires; nor yet that emigrants, who had carried out a capital of £2000 or £3000 to Adelaide, were reduced to work as labourers. We did not reprint T. H. B.'s letter—we merely alluded to his queries; as we now do to Mr Wheeler's reply, or denial of the facts inquired about.

Mr Wheeler has also favoured us with a long communication in reply to our remarks upon Mr Gouger's book on South Australia, which, properly, should be addressed to that gentleman rather than to us. He is the Secretary for the colony. All his hopes and interests are bound up with it. He has made statements, which we have cited, and which the Manager of the Company denies. It is Mr Gouger, and not we, who states, at (page 82,) that "the Company's whaling business has proved unfortunate." It is Mr Gouger, among others, who alludes to the plague of insects, to the excessive heat of the climate, to the degraded state of morals, and to the idea of making the first settlement on Kangaroo Island, (page 18,) and to the Company possessing one-seventh of all the lands disposed of, and one-sixth of the town lots, (Gouger, page 81.) Mr Manager Wheeler should reply to Mr Secretary Gouger, and not to us: and yet no one will believe that Mr Gouger had any intention of depreciating the Colony or the Company.

As to this new disease of the "rotten-horn," we can say nothing. Cattle and flocks are liable to diseases everywhere, until knowledge and experience come to their protection. An epidemic may exist, or may not; and it would be unreasonable to doubt that cattle and sheep will thrive well in South Australia; but, as to small capitalists being reduced to the condition of labourers, we can less doubt of that, nor yet that it may have been owing to their over-rash folly, and too implicit belief in the delusions propagated by interested speculators. It is not, therefore, at "the rotten-horn," but at the outing-horn, we take alarm, if Mr Wheeler understands the nature of that prevalent affection among some of the Company's and the Commissioners' agents, and those speculators who are profiting by the loss of the emigrants.

We have no desire to say anything harsh or offensive to those gentlemen employed by the Company, whose situations are at present likely to be uncomfortable enough; but, judging between them and the public, we must take leave to consider them exactly on the footing of other agents, acting for other great trading companies; and, moreover, as agents for what at present looks to be an unprofitable or backgoing concern. The South Australian Company, in the eye of common sense, is to be viewed precisely in the same light as any other company trafficking for profit. They take ten per cent. interest as colonial bankers; and, no doubt, make as much profit as they can in all the other departments in which they are engaged. This is quite right, when fairly done. But if the Company and the Commissioners set up as philanthropists as well as traders, we are entitled to be suspicious—as we have ever observed that where Philanthropy and Traffic set up a joint-stock concern, poor Philanthropy, sooner or later, is sure to be driven to the wall. Mr Wheeler has favoured us with extracts of letters from Mr Stephen Hack, Mr Orr, &c. &c., which have done duty so frequently now, that, although we did believe them impartial, candid, disinterested statements, we should decline reprinting them, as Scottish readers may find them in the pamphlet entitled, "The Great Southland," which has been the means of propagating great and mischievous delusion in Scotland about this new colony—delusion which we have conceived it to be our bounden duty to try to dispel.

Mr Wheeler, we are bound to mention, sets us right as to the authorship of that pamphlet. It is not written by the local agent of the Commissioners, as we conjectured, but by a gentleman of Leith, who was in all probability the dupe of his own sanguine credulity, as Mr Wheeler states that he emigrated to "The Land of Promise" in September last, with his family; and, if he have money enough, the colony may do very well for him. We trust that when he has been as long in the colony as Mr James, he will afford mechanics and small capitalists something like an antidote to his previous fallacious statements.

Mr Wheeler will the more readily excuse us for not publishing his hackneyed facts and irrelevant remarks, when we inform him, that we have also declined communications of a character similar to his, from the friends of rival colonies. The great Company for which he has the honour to act, and the powerful Commissioners, cannot suffer from the want of a fitting medium in the press. Volumes have been already published by the friends, agents, puffers, and speculators interested in deluding or keeping up the excitement about the new colony. They had one newspaper—the South Australian Gazette, which has been persecuted for telling a little truth; they have now another—the South Australian Record. In The Spectator newspaper the colony has ever had a thorough-going and most zealous advocate; and we believe other London and provincial journals have been equally well disposed to the Commissioners and the Company; so that the manager, Mr Wheeler, need never lack a wide medium, though we reserve the few pages we have to spare for what we consider a far more pressing and sacred duty—that of warning our countrymen who are meditating emigration, entreating them to reflect on what they are about, when, in choosing a colony, they take a step which cannot be recalled, and which may precipitate their families into severe hardship, if not complete ruin.

Later accounts from the colony than Mr Wheeler could have received when he wrote us on the 9th January, have appeared in the city article of The Times of the 11th; and since the matter has been stirred, we shall copy them, omitting what is given from Sydney papers, as probably exaggerated, as it is in reply to other manifest exaggerations, in the South Australian Record.

Papers from South Australia have come to hand to the 22d of July. The installation of Mr George Milner Stephen, as acting governor of the colony, on the departure of Governor Hindmarsh, took place on the 14th. In the course of his speech, he took occasion to observe, that "there are no funds whatever in the Treasury, and that the quarter's salaries due to the whole of the public servants on the 20th of June last are at this day unpaid. We have, therefore, to fear that the tempting remuneration held out for the exercise of ability in private undertakings in this province, added to the distress which they are beginning to experience from the want of money, will induce many indispensable public officers to leave the service of the Government." He complained also that the marines had been taken away in Her Majesty's ship Alligator, by which the colony, numbering already 4,000 people, was left to the protection of 18 policemen, lately embodied, whilst there were then 21 prisoners confined "in the weather-boarded building used as a gaol," and "perhaps double that number of runaway convicts in the neighbourhood of the town." There were even no funds for the maintenance of the force actually on foot. A public meeting had been called to consider of the unprotected state of the colony, and the want of means for the present and future provision of a police force. An interesting account is given in these papers of Mr Eyre's second journey overland from Sydney to Adelaide.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

MARCH, 1839.

A NEW REMEDY FOR THE DISTRESSES OF IRELAND.

(No. I. By a Guernsey Correspondent.)

THE moral and political state of Ireland has long been regarded as the disgrace of the British legislature and the opprobrium of civilized Europe. Were the evils which afflict that unfortunate country confined to particular districts, or were they of a superficial or temporary character, the mere efflux of time might restore her to a sound and healthy vigour; but a retrospective view of her history destroys this expectation, exhibiting, as it does, one continued scene of commercial poverty and intellectual debasement. It is useless, nay, it is criminal, to deny the fact: the social malady of Ireland is not a mere local inflammation, it is not confined to the surface; on the contrary, it is a deep-seated disease, a pestilent virus, flowing through every vein and artery of the body politic. It is not our intention to examine any of the various plans hitherto recommended by various classes of Reformers—such as the Repeal of the Union, a domestic parliament, emigration, or the abolition of tithes—for none of these seem to us commensurate with the evils they propose to relieve, while they are, in many respects, clogged with insuperable objections. Neither shall we dwell on the system of Poor-Laws, because we think that a permanent duration of this character is a direct acknowledgment of the unjust division of national wealth. We speak not here of casual charity, as in the case of defective crops from which famine might ensue, nor of that aid which humanity renders to the aged or infirm; but we allude to an annual parochial assessment, specially enacted because the Legislature is conscious and precipient that the masses must starve unless this provision be made for their subsistence.

At the very root of the inquiry we are about to institute, lies the difficulty of determining in what consists the right of exclusive ownership in the soil. We have no intention to examine any of the various theories advanced as solutions of this problem, for they all rest on bare hypotheses which it would be a waste of words to discuss; and even that of Locke, in his "Essay on Civil Government," is rather an illustration of a doctrine, than a proof of its native soundness. It is far from true, as he contends, that individual proprietorship has been acquired by labour, or that man has mixed the sweat of his brow with the ground appropriated to his use; for immense tracts of land were forcibly seized by the ancestors of those who now hold them, without ever turning up the sod with plough or spade; and the continuity of possession has been preserved by the iniquitous law of primogeniture. Now, we maintain, as a general principle, applicable to all countries, and valid at all times and under all circumstances, that the concentration of land in a few hands tends to demoralize and pauperize a nation, corrupting the moral feelings of the privileged classes, and brutalizing the operative sections of society. That such a system is destructive of the increase of national wealth is admitted even by Malthus, whose writings bear abundant evidence of his attachment to the aristocracy.*

The position we shall endeavour to establish in this article, is, that the system of landed tenure which obtains in Ireland is the veritable cause of all the evils, moral, social, political, and commercial, which afflict that unfortunate country; and that the remedy is to be found in the introduction of the old Norman tenure, as it exists to this day in the islands of Guernsey and Jersey. We admit that the change would be most sweeping; but that is no argument against its usefulness—for we hope to shew that it is the interest of the landlords themselves to adopt this new system, which would secure to them a regular payment of their rents, and diffuse gladness and content throughout the whole population. But aware as we are of the extreme reluctance with which novelties are received, we shall preface our main subject with an appeal to the ancient principles of the constitution, as they bear on the questions of absenteeism, hereditary title, and hereditary privileges, which, if left unanswered, would entangle the future discussion, and open the door to quibbles and difficulties which we desire at once to obviate. It can be clearly shewn that the immense tracts of land anciently granted by the Crown to the Barons, were wholly in the nature of a trust, and that non-residence, as will be proved in the subjoined case of the Earl of Shrewsbury, involved their forfeiture. It also appears from Nevill's case, claiming to be Earl of Westmoreland, that every Peer lost his dignity if he lost the pecuniary means of supporting it; and the case of Isabel, Countess of Rutland, proves that the only reason why Peers and Peeresses were privileged from arrest for debt, was grounded on the presumption that they held sufficient freehold to meet all demands. These several cases, as reported by Lord Coke, and the arguments used in their discussion, with the judgments pronounced, we shall now lay before our readers.

“By force of certain letters, bearing date 28th Martii, 1612, of the Lords of the Privy Council, directed to Sir Humphrey Winch, Sir James Lay, Sir Antony Saint-Leger, and James Hulleston; they did certify to their Lordships the claims of Gilbert, Earl of Shrewsbury, to the dignities of the Earldom of Waterford and Barony of Dungarvon in Ireland, in such manner as followeth:—

“King Henry the Sixth, by his letters patent, in the twentieth year of his reign, did grant to his thrice-beloved cousin John, Earl of Shrewsbury, in consideration of his approved and loyal services in the city and county of Waterford, pro eo quoque eundem consanguineum nostrum prædictâ terrâ nostrâ Hiberniæ in partibus illis contra inimicorum et rebellium nostrorum insultus potentius defendat, ipsum in comitem Waterford, unâ cum stilo et titulo ac nomine et honore eidem debitis ordinamus et creamus, habendum to the said Earl and the heirs-male of his body, to hold the premises of the King and his heirs, by homage and fealty, and by the service of his being his Majesty's Seneschal in the realm of Ireland; afterwards in the parliament called Des Absentees, holden at Dublin in Ireland, the 10th of May, the 28th of Henry Eighth, by reason of the long absence of George, Earl of Shrewsbury, out of this realm; it was enacted that the King, his heirs and assigns, shall have and enjoy in the right of his crown of England, all honours, manors, castles, lordships, franchises, hundreds, liberties, count-palatines, jurisdictions, annuities, fees of knights, lands, tenements &c., and all other profits, as well spiritual as temporal whatsoever, which the said George, Earl of Shrewsbury and Waterford, or any other person or persons had to his use, &c. King Henry the Eighth, by his letters patent, the twenty-ninth year of his reign, reciting the said statute Des Absentees, Nos præmissa considerantes, et nolentes statum, honorem, et dignitatem prædicti Comititis diminuere, sed amplius augere, de certa scientia et mero motu, &c., did grant to the said Earl and his heirs the Abbey of Rufford, with the land thereto belonging, in the county of Nottingham, and the lordship of Rotherham, in the county of York, the Abbeys of Chesterfield, Shirbrook, and Glossadel, in the county of Derby, with divers other lands and tenements of great value, to be holden in capite; and the questions were—“1st, Whether, by the long absence of the Earl of Shrewsbury out of Ireland, by reason whereof the King and his subjects lost their defence and assistance there, the title of the honour be lost and forfeited; the said Earl being a Peer of both realms, and residing here in England.

“2dly, Whether by the said act, Des Absentees, anno 28, H. 8, the title of the dignity of the Earl of Waterford be taken from the said Earl, as well as the manors, lands, tenements, and other hereditaments in the said act specified.

“And afterwards, by other letters patent of the Lords of the Council, dated 27th of September, 1612, the two Chief Justices and Chief Baron were required to consider of the case which was enclosed within their letters, and were to certify their opinions of the same.

“Which case was argued by Counsel learned in the law, in behalf of the said Earl, before the said Chief Justices and Chief Baron; upon which they have taken great consideration and advisement, and after they had read the preamble, and all the said act of the 28 H. 8, it was unanimously resolved by them all as followeth:—

“As to the first point, it was resolved, that forasmuch as it does not appear what defence was requisite, and that the consideration executory was not found by office to be broken as to that point, the said Earl of Shrewsbury notwithstanding does remain Earl of Waterford.

“As to the second it was resolved, that the said act of the 28 H. 8, Des Absentees, doth not only take away the possessions which were given to him at the time of his creation, but also the dignity itself; for although one may have a dignity without any possession ad sustinendum nomen et onus, yet it is very inconvenient that a dignity should be clothed with poverty; and in cases of writs, and such other legal proceedings, he is accounted in law a nobleman, and so ought to be called, in respect of his dignity; but yet if he want possessions to maintain his estate, he cannot press the King in justice to grant him a writ to call him to the parliament; and so it was resolved in the case of the Lord Ogle, in the reign of Edward the Sixth, as the Baron of Burleigh, Lord Treasurer of England, at the parliament anno 35 Eliz., did report; and therefore the act, of the 28 H. 8, (as all other acts ought to be,) shall be expounded to take away all in convenience; and therefore by the general word of the act, viz., ‘of honours and hereditaments the dignity itself, with the lands given for the maintenance of it, are given to the King, and the dignity is extinct in the Crown.’ And the cause of the degradation of George Nevill, Duke of Bedford, is worthy the observation, which was done by force of an act of Parliament, 16 June, 17 Edw. 4, which act reciting the making the said George a Duke, doth express the cause of his degradation in these words—'And forasmuch as it is openly known, that the said George hath not, or by inheritance may have, any livelihood to support the same name, estate, and dignity, or any name of estate;' and oftentimes it is to be seen, that where any lord is called to high estate, and hath not convenient livelihood to support the same dignity, it induceth great poverty and indigence, and causeth oftentimes great extortion, imbracery, and maintenance to be had, to the great trouble of all such countries where such estate shall happen to be; wherefore the King, by the advice of his Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and by the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, ordaineth, establisheth, and enacteth, that from henceforth the same creation and making of the said Duke, and all the names of dignity given to the said George, or to John Nevill, his father, be from henceforth void and of none effect, &c. In which act, these things are to be observed:—

"1st, That although the Duke had not any possessions to support his dignity, yet his dignity cannot be taken away from him without an act of Parliament.

"2dly, The inconveniences do appear where a great state and dignity is, and no livelihood to maintain it.

"3dly, It is good reason to take away such dignity by act of Parliament; and therefore the said act of the 28 H. 8, shall be expounded, according to the general words of the writ, to take away such inconvenience; and although the said Earl of Shrewsbury be not only of great honour and virtue, but also of great possessions in England, yet it was not the intention of the act to continue him Earl in Ireland, when his possessions in Ireland were taken away from him, but that the King at his pleasure might confer as well the dignity as the possessions to any other, for the defence of the said realm. And the said letters patent, de anno 29 H. 8, have no words to restore the dignity which the act of Parliament has taken away; but it was not the intention of King diminuere statum, honorem, et dignitatem ipsius Comitiss, but augere his possessions for maintenance of his dignity, for so much appears by this word augere; for he doth by the said letters patent, with exceeding great bounty, increase the revenues of the said Earl in England, which the King did think was an increase of large possessions in England, instead of all that which was taken away from him by the act of the 28 H. 8.

"And whereas it was objected, that the general words honours and hereditaments are explained and qualified by the said words relative subsequent, 'which the said George or any to his use hath;' and therefore it shall not be intended of any honour or hereditament, but of such whereof others are seized to his use, and no man can be seized of the dignity, and therefore that the said act doth not extend to it; but that it is to be understood reddendo singula singulis, and these words, 'which the said George, Earl, hath,' are sufficient to pass the dignity; and with this agrees the opinion of all the Judges in England in Nevill's case, upon the like words in the statute of the 28 H. 8.*

It appears from this case that the spirit of the ancient constitution condemns absenteeism, as an evil both to the King and People. It is also clear that there was a legal condition annexed to the grant of these immense estates to the Barons, involving personal residence on the lands they held. They stood, as it were, between the Crown and the subject, acting on the one hand as local lieutenants for the sovereign to preserve his prerogative and coerce rebellion, and on the other hand as conservators of the rights of the people among each other. Their duties, therefore, were not confined simply to legislation, for they exercised an executive authority, and were obliged to see that the laws were enforced and obeyed in their respective neighbourhoods. "For those who are Earls," says Lord Coke, "have an office of great trust and confidence, and are created for two purposes—to advise the King in time of peace, and defend the King and country in time of war; and therefore antiquity hath given them two ensigne, to resemble those two duties; for first, their head is adorned with a cap of honour and a coronet, and their body with a robe in resemblance of counsel; secondly, they are girt with a sword in resemblance that they should be faithful and loyal to defend their prince and country."†

The only excuse for a Baron being absent from his estates, was personal attendance on the King either in the senate or the field; but with those two exceptions, it was a condition annexed, (as Lord Coke expressly declares) to the estate of the dignity that the possessor should reside on the baronial lands; for otherwise he would not have been able to advise the King in time of peace; for it was only by living constantly among his tenants, that he acquired a real knowledge of their wants and wishes, and had opportunities of collecting local information, which it was his duty to submit to the King when cited to attend at the royal council. In conformity with these principles, the Earl of Shrewsbury forfeited his Irish estates, being a notorious absentee, "by reason whereof the King and his subjects wanted their defence and assistance there." We may detect vestiges of the old system in modern practice. Noblemen quitting England for the Continent attend his Majesty's levée, to take leave, and again present themselves at their return; so that what was once compulsion has been softened down into courtesy. In Russia, to this day, the rule is stricter than with us, as no nobleman can quit that country for foreign travel without obtaining the formal permission, a practice quite consonant with the spirit of feudalism—"for no lord shall quit the realm without notice to the King, lest his services should be wanted."

Another wholesome provision in the ancient constitutional law deprived a peer of his rank and privileges when his fortune was dilapidated, as appears from the remarks in the case of George Nevill, Duke of Bedford, embodied in the report of the case of the Earl of Shrewsbury. It would be difficult to fix a pecuniary standard for the peers, which would be free from every captious objection, as in all questions of degree some line of demarcation must be drawn. Our ancestors, however, reduced the matter into arithmetical precision, as we learn from the remarks of Lord Coke in his report of Nevill's case, cited above. "And it is to be known that, as in ancient times the senators of Rome were elected a censu of their revenues, so here in ancient times, in conferring of nobility, respect was had to their revenues, by which their dignity and nobility might be supported and maintained. And therefore a knight ought to have £20 land per annum; a baron thirteen knights' fees and a quarter; an Earl twenty knights' fees, (for there was not any duke in England from the time of the Conquest until 11 Edw. 3rd, and the Duke of Cornwall was the first duke after the Conquest in England.) And that appears by the statute Magna Charta, c. 2. For always the fourth part of such revenue, which is requisite by the law to the dignity, shall be paid to the King as a relief; for the relief of a knight's fee is £5, which is the fourth part of £20, which is a knight's revenue; and the relief of a baron is 100 marks, which is the fourth part of his revenue—viz., 400 marks, and includes thirteen knights' fees and a quarter; and the relief of an Earl is £100, which is the fourth part of £400, which is the revenue of an Earl. And it appears by the records of the Exchequer that the relief of a duke shall amount to £200, and by consequence his revenue ought to be £800 per annum; and that is the reason in our books that every one of the nobility is presumed in law to have sufficient freehold ad sustinendum nomen et onus, for supporting his rank and the burthen of it."

It was this legal assumption which exempted Peers of the realm from arrest for debt. Of this we have a proof in the case of Isabel, Countess of Rutland, who, being a widow, was arrested by certain Serjeants-at-mace, in consequence of which the Attorney-General lodged an information against them for false imprisonment. The arrest, be it observed, was not on mesne process, but on a capias ad satisfaciendum, judgment in debt having been given against her in the Common Pleas. The arrest was set aside, and the Serjeants-at-mace punished, the Judges having decided:—

"That the person of one who is in law a Countess by marriage or descent, is not to be arrested for debt or trespass; for, although in respect of her sex, she cannot sit in Parliament, yet she is a Peer of the realm, and shall be tried by her Peers, as appears by the statute 2, 20th of Henry the Sixth, which was but a declaration of the common law. And there are two reasons why her person should not be arrested in such cases; one, in respect to her dignity; the other, in respect that the law doth presume that she hath sufficient lands and tenements in which she may be distrained. And both these points are well confirmed by our books, 11th of Henry the Fourth, 15 b, in a homine replegiando against the Lady Spencer. It appears that the Lady Spencer was a Peer of the realm, and that in debt or trespass, capias lieth not against an earl, baron, or baroness, et hujusmodi, for, because of their estate and dignity they are intended (presumed) to have sufficient; 3d of Henry the Sixth, 48 a. An action of debt was brought against a man, and his wife Countess of D., against whom an exigent was prayed. Newton: you cannot have an exigent against an Earl, and no more against a Countess; and Fulthorpe there said, that the reason thereof was not only because it cannot be intended (presumed) that an Earl can be without lands, but another reason is, for the dignity of his name."*

Abundant evidence has now been adduced to prove that absenteeism is unconstitutional, and we have dwelt strongly on the fact, to silence the objections of that party who rejoice in the title of Conservatives, who chatter about final measures, and resist all change in the existing system. We have shewn that the ancient law has been violated; consequently, a return to the old principles, if not in form, at least in spirit, cannot be condemned as an innovation. And here the legal argument stops: it remains to inquire how we may best remedy the evils of absenteeism, doing justice both to the landlords and the rest of the community—for we do not advocate any scheme of spoliation. And this brings us to the Norman landed tenure, as it has obtained in Guernsey and Jersey for ten centuries, and as it exists at the present day.

The relation of landlord and tenant, as it exists in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, is unknown in the Channel Islands. Neither tenancies at will, nor for a term of years, are recognised by their laws, excepting on houses in the towns. A single example will suffice to explain their system, which is extremely simple for a contract of sale seldom exceeds half a sheet of letter paper. Suppose that A possesses land valued at twelve hundred pounds, which he desires to sell, as we should say in England, or to give to rent, as the phrase runs in Guernsey—the following would be the process. A would either convey his estate to B, the purchase wholly in quarters, without receiving any cash, or, as is the more usual mode, he would receive one fourth of the price in money, and convert the remainder into quarters. One Guernsey quart is equivalent to twenty pounds sterling, local currency. In the first case, B would have to pay annually to A sixty quarters, the interest on £1200, the assumed cost of the estate, at fi-per cent; in the second case, he would have to pay annually forty-five quarters. The reason why it is usual to pay one fourth part of the purchase money in cash is, that such payment may be some guarantee to A that B will faithfully work the estate, and pay his rent regularly; for, should the rent fall in arrear, then A, by a process called saisiè, may totally eject B from the property, and the three hundred pounds paid by B when the contract was passed would be lost to him for ever. In this manner, then, is the seller or landlord secured in the receipt of the equivalent for which he has parted with the estate.

As soon as the contract between the parties is executed, B becomes, to all intents and purposes, absolute proprietor of the soil; and so long as he pays his quarters, he can never be evicted; nay, more, he can fell timber, convert meadow into arable, and arable into meadow, and perform any and every act that a tenant in fee-simple can do in England. The estate, thus acquired, descends to the heirs of the blood of the purchaser, lawfully begotten, and, on failure of direct issue, to his nearest of kin. Sometimes these annual quarters are made permanent, but most frequently they are redeemable by certain instalments, as the buyer and seller may have agreed. Their value may be fixed at a definite sum, as twenty shillings per quarter, or they may be fluctuating so as to depend on the current value of a quarter of wheat, which is the fairest mode of computation; for, if corn is high, then the farmer can afford a high rent; and, if corn is low, he is relieved from paying more than his crop warrants.

Having stated the nature of the system, we proceed to enumerate the practical results which have flowed from it; and these we shall class under the separate heads of commercial and moral results.

The territorial surface of Guernsey contains 15,866 English acres, of which 10,240 are under cultivation, the remainder being occupied by houses, roads, &c., with a large portion consisting of rocks, cliffs, and places not susceptible of culture. In the town parish, called Saint Peter's Port, there are 1728 inhabited houses; in the country parishes, 1748. The estates are small, none exceeding seventy acres; and the average amount of land attached to each house in the country, (including 252 nominally in the town parish, but which are really in the country,) may be computed at five English acres. This minute subdivision causes the whole island to be cultivated as a garden; not an inch of available soil is lost, and even the hedges are planted with furze for winter fuel. The crops are abundant, and far exceed those of England. The average produce of wheat per acre is thirty-three Winchester bushels; and as much as fifty-five to sixty have been raised. Five hundred bushels of potatoes per acre are the ordinary produce, and the hay crops average three tons and a half, English weight. Twenty-two tons of perennials per acre are considered a fair crop:

2,500 milch cows are kept, yielding an annual revenue, in milk and butter, of £32,620; 650 cows are annually exported to England, and the same number of cattle slaughtered for home consumption. Vegetables, fruit, poultry, eggs, and cider, are most abundant, and of excellent quality. Now, the question, the commercial question, arising out of these facts, is simply this: Where, in Great Britain or Ireland, can be found 10,000 acres equally productive? Let it not be said that the islands have richer land, a more favourable climate, or better implements of husbandry: this is not the fact: they have, moreover, many disadvantages, as tremendous gales of wind in winter, and scorching droughts in summer; but they have one paramount superiority, and that is their system of landed tenure—the true source of their agricultural wealth.

The rent of land in Guernsey, expressed in English terms, is never less than five pounds per English acre; and it is a very rare case indeed, if it ever falls in arrear. The landlord is seldom disappointed in the regular receipt of his income. Compare this state of things with that which obtains in Ireland. Let the landlords themselves, viewing this subject as a mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence, declare whether their interest would be best promoted by retaining the present system, or by adopting that which we recommend. Which affords the safest investment of capital? Which most securely guarantees the payment of rent? Which tends to raise the largest quantity of produce from the soil?

We shall now proceed to the moral influence produced on the people by this system of tenure. One of its first consequences is to raise the standard of virtue—to inspire the whole population with a manly and independent spirit—and to destroy that cringing adulation and fawning servility, which leases for years have necessarily engendered among the tenantry of England. All men, no matter to what political party they may belong, have admitted that the institution of property is the basis of civilization. This principle being acknowledged sound by universal consent, it follows that whatever counteracts its expansion must be vicious, and that whatever promotes its extension must be nationally beneficial. The bare possession of property on a doubtful tenure is scarcely a good: it is essential that the possession should be secure; and if security for a term of years be desirable, much more so must it be for permanent enjoyment. Now, the plan of leases for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, together with tenancies from year to year or at will, is bad in principle, as they merely convey a temporary interest determinable at a date specified; the working farmer thus becomes a bird of passage, without any fixed home. He may be prudent, industrious, and sober—a good father, a good husband, a good master, a good neighbour, and a good citizen; but these virtues avail him nothing; he lives in a state of agricultural servitude, and, at the expiration of his lease, the caprice or spite of his landlord may expel him from his farm. Far different is the condition of the Guernseyman. Once possessed of land, he can never lose it except by his own fault; he has only to pay the stipulated quarters of rent, and he continues absolute lord of the property: he feels proud of his position, and the spirit of independence is within him; he is not classed among the locomotive machines of humanity, who, in Great Britain and Ireland, are shifted from county to county, seeking a precarious subsistence from an insolent and grasping squirearchy. No; he has a solid stake in the country, though it may be small; he can say with honest pride, "This house is mine; that field is mine; and when I die, the law will give them to my children."

This system of tenure prompts to industry, encourages economy, and represses intemperance. A man having paid down in cash one-fourth of the value of the land he holds, is stimulated by the most powerful impulse to redeem the annual quarters, and disengage his estate from the payment of rent. In the eyes of a person so circumstanced, labour loses its repulsive character, for he feels that he is working for himself. He has an object constantly before his mind which he steadily pursues. The propensity to drunkenness, so fatal to the working classes of Great Britain, is counteracted with the Guernseyman by the desire and the opportunity of acquiring a disencumbered landed property. But the Irish labourer has no such incentive to moral restraint. Far from contemplating even the most remote possibility of becoming the absolute owner of an acre of land, he considers himself eminently fortunate if he can secure regular wages as a labourer. He passes through existence only one remove higher than the oxen which he drives at the plough. His feelings are deadened, his mind is brutalized, his energies are depressed. His life resembles that of a horse in a mill, confined within a circle, out of which he can never escape.

As an auxiliary to the usefulness of savings-banks, the Guernsey tenure deserves every consideration. The facility of obtaining a proprietary right to land, without paying down the purchase-money, is a strong incentive to early habits of economy and prudence. A farm, of course, requires to be stocked; and, with the prospect of future independence before him, a young man will deposit his earnings in the savings-banks, till he has accumulated sufficient capital to purchase seeds, cattle, and implements of husbandry. It is this hope, or rather, under Providence, we may say it is this certainty, that makes a Guernseyman the eminently careful, cautious, and far-seeing person that he is; while, on the other hand, it is fair to conclude that the absence of all prospective amelioration in his condition, renders an Irishman reckless, inconsiderate, and imprudent. We may with truth affirm that habits of prudence, economy, moral restraint, and the wisdom of appreciating in what consists a competency, and the disposition to live within one's income, are virtues indigenous to the soil of Guernsey, and rooted in the native character. Agrarian outrage is unknown; there is not on record an instance of machine-breaking, rick-burning, or hamstringing of cattle; all are interested in the preservation of order, for all have a property. But in Ireland there are no bonds of sympathy between the landlord and the labourer; in most cases they never see each other; the absent proprietor regards the tenant as a serf, and the tenant considers the landlord as a tyrannical usurper: thus the standard of morals is reduced to zero. How is it, indeed, possible that a nation can be prosperous, when the expansion and influence of the social virtues are forcibly repressed, and the elements of discord systematically roused into ceaseless action?

In support of the plan here recommended, we shall cite some remarks on the subject which have been communicated to us by Daniel de Lisle Brock, Esq., President of the States of Guernsey, whose accurate knowledge of all the details of the system, whose vigorous intellect and comprehensive mind, invest his opinion with the sacred character of an authority. "In England," says this great and good man, "they break up all the small farms, depopulate the country, and then cry up the surplus produce, as if that produce, consumed by a vigorous, happy race of yeomen, did not tend to the welfare of a kingdom as much as when carried to large towns to feed a miserable feeble population, living by the precarious returns of manufactures, instead of the certain rewards of agriculture. Besides, the main fact on which the sticklers for large farms rest their argument is absolutely disputed; the surplus produce from large farms is not greater than it would be from moderately-sized farms. There are larger estates in England than the whole of this island; but where will be one found that produces the same quantity of provisions as is sent by the small farmers of this island to market? Look at the hovels of the English and Irish; compare them with our cottages; and the effect of giving to the occupier an interest in the soil and dwelling will at once be seen. In this island, that interest is permanent: in England and Ireland, it is limited and precarious. The writers of the present day, on political economy, mention the subdivision of landed property in Ireland as the principal cause of the poverty and barbarism of the Irish: it is not the smallness, but the uncertainty of the tenure, which is the cause of all the misery. The land is indeed subdivided, so as to barely suffice, even in potatoes, to sustain the occupier's family; and thus the poor are made to outbid one another in the price at which they may obtain possession; and the term is so short, and the price so high, that the object of the occupier is not to improve the spot, but to procure a miserable existence for the year, by drawing from the land as much, and laying out upon it as little as possible, without any regard to the improvement of the premises. The wretched state of the dwellings, and the distress of the inhabitants, are not, therefore, to be wondered at, they remain the same from year to year, and from generation to generation. Some parts of the country under the management of proprietors, and of farmers with long leases, are well cultivated, and wear the appearance of comfort: from these are produced the large quantities of grain, cattle, butter, and other provisions, which are annually exported, and mostly consumed in Great Britain. The great body of the people are little benefited by these exports; and a year seldom passes without a famine, or a scarcity approaching to it, being experienced in one part of Ireland or the other, notwithstanding the export of so much produce, which the starving people have no means of purchasing. The causes of this misery and destitution are to be found in the want of employment for the peasantry, and, above all, in the absence of all interest in the soil; causes aggravated by the general use of ardent spirits of the most pernicious description that can be conceived. The obvious remedy is, to give to the peasantry a permanent interest in the soil—a permanent interest in the improvement, not only in the land, but of the dwelling and general premises—to render him sensible of the sweets of home, and to create in him a desire to retain their enjoyment during life, to impart the blessings and happiness of such a home to all who are dear to him, and leave them unimpaired to his descendants. A permanent interest in such a home, and the improvement of the land, would prove the best means of withdrawing him from the beastly habits of intoxication, and of elevating his ideas to the pure delight of contributing to the happiness of those about him.”

These remarks in favour of small farms appear to us unanswerable; but, as we wish to push the argument to the extreme of its legitimate consequences, and fortify it by every fact that we may be able to collect, we will exhibit it under another aspect.

Now, it follows from these two tables, if they are statistically correct, as we believe them to be, that, while every square mile in Guernsey (we reject fractions) supports one thousand persons, every square mile in Ireland only supports two hundred and twenty-three persons; so that the power of sustaining human life in Guernsey, when compared with the same power in Ireland, is nearly in the ratio of five to one. But this is not the only difference. Every Guernseyman has a comfortable home to live in, a clean bed to sleep upon, plenty to eat and drink every day in the year, and abundance of warm and decent clothing; but the Irishman is lucky if he can shelter himself in a mud cabin, find a soft plank to sleep upon with his pig, (if he is so fortunate as to possess one,) and get a dry potato, without salt, to ward off starvation. In the session of 1838, it was stated by Mr Poulett Scrope, and admitted by Mr O'Connell, that upwards of two millions of the people of Ireland, nearly one-third of the whole population, were without occupation—pauperized to the lowest verge of degradation—all but houseless, shirtless, and shoeless—and living on an inferior sort of potato, called “a lumper.” Now, in Guernsey there is no want, no beggary; a wandering mendicant is not to be seen in town or country. Let us, however, not be misunderstood: we have no desire to draw an exaggerated picture; truth, and truth alone, guides our pen. As in other communities, so likewise in Guernsey we find physical disease, moral delinquencies, and casual illness. Two hospitals meet these evils—one in the town parish, the other in the centre of the island; in these the old and infirm, the deaf, the blind, and the insane, find a refuge, and such a refuge as exists nowhere else on earth. It is not a poor-house: it is a home. There also the sick, whether from fever, fractured limbs, or any other accident, receive surgical assistance; and here also profligates and drunkards are confined, with a view to their moral reformation. But these are not receptacles of pauperism, in the English sense of the phrase; for, we repeat it, pauperism does not exist in the island. Compare this state of things with that which exists in Ireland, and let the burning blush of shame scorch the cheeks of the Imperial Legislators of Britain, when they contrast the asylums of Guernsey with the poor-houses of England.

The island of Jersey, in which the same system of landed tenure obtains as in Guernsey, supplies additional arguments in favour of the plan here recommended for the relief of Ireland. Jersey is more extensive than Guernsey, but still a small spot. According to Colonel Le Couteur, “the most accurate surveys give it a superficial extent of forty thousand English acres. Deducting about one-third for rocks, waste land, town, houses, and roads, there remain about twenty-six thousand six hundred acres fit for cultivation, more than double the arable land of Guernsey.” We learn from the same eminent authority, that the land near to St Helier's, the capital, “is worth nearly two hundred pounds the acre; in the country parishes it varies from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty pounds the acre, such land letting at from four pounds ten shillings to six pounds fifteen shillings the acre.” According to Mr Charles Le Quesne, whose admirable account of the commerce of Jersey has placed him in the first rank of political economists, “the population in 1831, when the last census was taken, amounted to thirty-six thousand five hundred and eighty-two, giving to each square mile nine hundred and fourteen persons.” The principal exports to England are stated by Mr Le Quesne, in each year, from 1829 to 1835, both inclusive: and at the last of these dates they were as follow:—

Cows and Heifers, . . .	1135 heads.
Potatoes,	3763 tons.
Wheat,	2990 quarters.
Apples,	131,770 bushels.
Cider,	402,443 gallons.
Pears,	2938 bushels.

Grapes, 4638 lbs.
Bricks, 180,206 tals.

As a maritime place, this small island has an extent of shipping which is perfectly astonishing. We again cite from Mr Le Quesne:—

	No. of Establishments or Fishing Stations.	Vessels.	Tons.
On the coast of Gaspé and Bay Chaleur (L. Canada),	11	31	3699
Labrador,	6	14	1343
Newfoundland,	2	23	1901
Arichat,	3	6	654
	22	74	7597

The following statement will surprise those who have been accustomed to view the islands as mere rocks. It is a comparison between the shipping of Jersey and some of the principal ports of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It is right, however, to observe, that it refers to the year 1832—Mr Le Quesne not having an account of each to a later date.

	Vessels.	Tons.	Men.
London,	2669	565,174	32,786
Liverpool,	853	166,028	9329
Hull,	557	68,892	4348
Bristol,	296	46,567	2460
Aberdeen,	355	41,671	3026
Glasgow,	241	41,533	3253
Greenock,	367	37,791	2553
Belfast,	255	25,151	1526
Dublin,	299	22,972	2172
Cork,	275	18,019	1465
Jersey,	216	20,250	1895

Compared to the English ports, Jersey would rank the fourteenth, and precede Poole; to the Scotch, the seventh; and to the Irish, the third—for the tonnage of Jersey is greater than that of Cork. The shipping of Jersey, viewed in relation to the population of the island, will give a proportion of half a ton to each inhabitant.

There, then, is a mass of evidence in favour of the small-farm system, which ought to carry conviction to every mind not absolutely barred against the reception of truth. To those who prefer authorities to facts, we recommend the following opinions:—"A small proprietor," says Adam Smith—"who knows every part of his little territory, views it with all the affection which property, especially small property, naturally inspires, and who, upon that account, takes pleasure not only in cultivating but adorning it—is generally, of all improvers, the most industrious, the most diligent, and the most successful." "Ce petit champ me suffit," said the virtuous Chancellor De L'Hopital; "je trouve plus beau de le cultiver moi-même que d'étendre au loin ses limites aux dépens de mes voisins. Une grande terre annonce les richesses, l'abondance excessive d'un maître puissant; un petit domaine cultivé avec soin, manifeste le caractère et l'intelligence d'un homme. Nous nous plaignons que nos champs ne sont pas assez féconds; nous en accusons le sol, le ciel, et les dieux: c'est uniquement notre faute. Un enfant ne sourit pas à son père qu'il n'a jamais vu, ni la terre à son maître qu'elle ne connaît pas; elle se plaît à se voir cultiver par ses mains."

"When I was," says Mr Le Quesne, "travelling on the borders of the Loire, in answer to my inquiries relative to the smiling productiveness of the land in Anjou and Touraine, the usual answer which I received was, that land was divided into small parcels; and with respect to the condition of the people, it was, "Ici nous ne sommes ni très riches ni très pauvres, mais nous sommes contents et nous vivons bien." The houses of the country people there are thickly studded; they are remarkable for their neatness, and indicative of the ease and comfort of their possessors; they are far superior to those which meet the eye in Normandy and Brittany, where land is not so much subdivided: in the former, besides being in greater number, they are built of white sand-stone, and no miserable mud cottage, with a heap of filth and dung lying before it, presents itself, as in Normandy and Brittany."

"Bulwer," continues Mr Le Quesne, "has also noticed the different effects produced in France by large and small estates; and the following extract fully confirms my preceding observations: 'In the northern departments of France, where land is less divided than in general, and cultivated with larger capitals, there is by far the greatest number of indigent; and in the towns of this division pauperism has even arisen to an alarming extent. There, says M. Villeneuve, the poor consist of workmen, ignorant, unprovided, brutified by debauchery, or enervated by manufacturing labours, and habitually unable to support their families.'"

A traveller in Spain gives a description of a part of that fine kingdom, that might have been applied to Ireland. "Beside Edija and Carmona, we met but few villages between Cordova and Seville, and no solitary farms or houses, other than the publicventas. Though the soil was everywhere fertile, yet it was in general imperfectly cultivated, and often abandoned to the caprice of nature. Nothing can be more painful than to behold this country, which rose to such a degree of prosperity under the Romans and Arabs, now so fallen, so impoverished. The principal source of this depopulation may be found in the landed monopolies; nearly the whole country being owned by large proprietors, to whose ancestors it was granted at the time of the conquest. They who preach the preservation of families and estates, and deprecate the unlimited subdivision of property, should make a journey to Andalusia."

The immediate effect of introducing the old Norman system of tenure into Ireland, would be the creation of a numerous resident proprietary, who would supply the present deficiency of a middle class. With the successful prosecution of agriculture that would necessarily accompany it, villages and towns would spring up in every district, filled with mechanics and tradesmen. Neat and comfortable dwellings would be substituted in place of the present mud hovels; and the pest of Ireland, the middlemen, would be swept away. Outrages on property would cease, because the possessors would be so numerous and so linked together by a common interest, that they would stand in the relation of a mutual insurance company. Thus would be saved a large portion of the expense now incurred for the constabulary force, and the standing army at present quartered in the sister kingdom.

It is also clear, from the results obtained in Guernsey and Jersey, that the agricultural produce of Ireland would be prodigiously augmented, which would enable her to supply the English demand for corn; and as the Irish rose in wealth, they would become large purchasers of British manufactures. It has been shewn that every acre of land in Guernsey and Jersey subsists in comfort fivefold the number of persons that an Irish acre does. If, then, the actual population of Ireland in round numbers be seven millions, why should it not increase to thirty-five millions? The amount may excite a sneer; but it is a fair inference from the premises. But were it the case, what a stimulus would it not give to the trade of England! Again: by this plan all the Irish would find permanent work at home on their own fields; and thus would a stop be put to that annual emigration into England, against which the English farm-servant, in the time of mowing and reaping, cannot compete.

Surely a plan which secures the landlord his rent—which raises the moral standard of a whole people—which encourages industry, temperance, and prudence—which represses crime—which economises the cost of the police and the soldiery—and which, while putting an end to the injurious competition of English and Irish labour, employs that labour as to make it the engine of mutual supply and demand—surely a system, holding out such advantages, reconciling all interests, and recommended by the practice and experience of ten centuries, at least deserves the calm and patient investigation of the legislature. Let politicians bear in mind, that every experiment hitherto attempted to remedy the state of Ireland has ended in the most miserable failure. How much money has not been expended in schemes of emigration, and the colonisation of different parts of New South Wales! In spite of all this outlay, Ireland still suffers. Is not then the time arrived when we should strike into a new path, and apply a radical cure to the evil?

We can only anticipate one objection to this plan—and that objection may come from the territorial aristocracy; but we cannot expect opposition from any other quarter; and we hope that even the enemies whom our imagination has raised up, may, on cool reflection, adopt the new system. It is clear that, were land let on perpetual leases, in the manner already explained, the occupier, having paid his rent, would have nothing to hope or fear from his landlord; consequently, he could and would vote at the elections of members of Parliament according to his conscience; he would no longer be dependent on the smiles or the frowns of a canvassing attorney; he would be a free citizen. Now, the aristocracy might be reluctant to part with this species of influence, and that is what we apprehend: it is, indeed, the only difficulty that we fear. On the other hand, they should set off against this surrender of power, which is as illegal as it is unjust, the innumerable other advantages which they would acquire in exchange. Besides, all the territorial aristocracy would be placed on the same footing, whether Whig or Tory, so that their relative strength would not be diminished. This plan would preclude the necessity of the Ballot, at least in agricultural districts; since no permanent occupier of a farm, which the law would transmit to his descendants, would require the shield of secrecy in exercising the elective franchise. Another immense advantage would be gained: no turbulent demagogue would be able to kindle sedition among a population who would be well fed, well housed, and well clothed; and thus the property of the very richest would be protected against the lawless passions of a mob.

"I am aware," says Mr Brock to us, "of the prejudices of the great landed proprietors against such a scheme of partition; they are unwilling to part with the land in perpetuity, and they will raise objections to the establishment of independent families around them as nurseries of a poor and more numerous population. Their fears and objections are not well founded: the system of selling for perpetual rents, secured on land daily improving in value, ought to remove their objections; and, at all events, nothing can possibly be worse for them than the actual state of society in Ireland. The great body of the peasantry, finding no employment from the rich, no land to till, except at prices which the utmost labour cannot enable them to pay, are driven to desperation, when, having attempted to cultivate a field of potatoes, they are called upon for tithes on those potatoes which are already insufficient for the sustenance of their families and the payment of rent. The law, the military, the police, are, however, called upon to force them to pay both rent and tithes, or, in default, to eject them from land and home. Seeing all the authorities and institutions of the country leagued against them, is it surprising that the peasantry should look upon those authorities and institutions with distrust? The situation of the landowners is not to be envied. It is true that, by coercive measures, they succeed in keeping down the spirit of discontent; but they do so at the expense of their own happiness and comfort. If there be, as we must suppose there is, a pleasure in the exhibition of pride and power, in the unlimited exercise of tyranny and oppression, the landlords of Ireland must experience that pleasure in the highest degree. The unexampled scenes of misery which they behold at every step, attest their arbitrary sway, and the extent of the mischief which that sway has occasioned. Nothing can be wanting to their triumph; but amidst that triumph, they cannot taste the sweets and comforts of a peaceful home—they cannot meet the smiles of a grateful tenantry—they are obliged to fly their country."

The law of inheritance which obtains in Guernsey, steers a middle course between the systems of England and France. In the former country, the law of primogeniture bestows all the patrimonial estates on the eldest son; in the latter, all the children, without regard to sex, are placed exactly on the same footing. In Guernsey the eldest son takes the principal house, and from sixteen to twenty perches of land, on which the outbuildings may be supposed to stand; this the law gives him exclusively, and he also has the right to keep all the land attached to the house in a ring fence, and not separated from it by a public road; but whatever he takes over and above the sixteen to twenty perches, he must account for it to his brothers and sisters, by paying them the value of this excess in money. By this plan the estates in Guernsey are never so subdivided as to produce inconvenience, nor are they ever so consolidated as to produce injustice.

We shall conclude with the following remarks of the Bailiff of Guernsey, which we earnestly recommend to the mature consideration of all statesmen, whether Whig or Tory:—

“All partial remedies that seek to bolster up the actual state of society and the precarious tenures of land, can be of no use: things have arrived to that degree of individual misery and general danger, that nothing but a mighty change can effect any permanent good. The removal of the law of primogeniture, some centuries past, might have prevented the accumulation of that great mass of distress now witnessed, and an equal law of succession would now produce great benefits to the country: but immediate relief is wanted; and to obtain that relief to the extent required, there appear but two measures adequate—the cession of land to poor families on the payment of perpetual rents, and emigration on a large scale. Both remedies combined must produce a great improvement. A poor-law is another remedy about to be tried, which alone can never restore Ireland to a happy state. The poor are too numerous to render it possible to give them sufficient relief, without the greatest sacrifice on the part of the landowners. Compare the sacrifices that must be made by them in the execution of the poor-law, with the sale of their superfluous lands on perpetual rents, and decide which plan of relief would be most advantageous to those owners. No doubt can surely exist on the matter. The poor-law, to be effective, will require pecuniary sacrifices to an enormous amount; the cession of land would require none—would be attended with no diminution of income. There is another consideration, which is the national expense requisite for the erection of poor-houses all over the country, independently of the moral degradation which is the natural result of crowding so many poor together. In every point of view, and especially the moral consideration, how desirable must that plan be which would give an interest in the soil to the great bulk of the population—which would remove discontent, and promote industry and content over the whole face of the country! How superior would such a state of things be to the system of wretchedness, idleness, and destitution which prevails! How superior, as a means of comfort and happiness, to the rich proprietor as well as to the poor labourer! How superior in point of general interest, and in point of even the interest of the proprietors themselves! Compared with the poor-law attempted to be introduced, the superiority of the present plan is most striking. The poor-law may give some relief, but no remedy to the poor—no prevention of poverty. The evil, the canker will remain, and the discontent also. So far from creating comfort to the proprietors, the poor-law will be the cause of their being assailed more than ever by the poor who surround them, and who will think themselves authorized by the law so to assail them. The poor-law, as a palliation of the evil, will cost to the proprietors immense sums of money, while the radical cure would in fact subtract nothing from their incomes. The palliation would greatly diminish that income, both by the sums levied for the maintenance of the poor, and by the sums levied for county rates, or national taxes for the erecting of houses for their habitation and occupation. The radical cure requires indeed the nominal sacrifice of part of the land, but no sacrifice of the property—no diminution of the income.”

Guernsey, January 1839.

J. D.

We leave the above paper, by an intelligent correspondent, to speak for itself. His doctrines will not be acceptable to one order of political economists, any more than to the aristocracy—economical bigots we may well call them, who have but one sweeping principle to apply to every varying set of circumstances. Nor do we regard his new remedy as a panacea, but as one of a class of remedies which might be brought into operation for the salvation of Ireland, and the security of Great Britain. Those of our readers who have not an opportunity of consulting Henry Bulwer's work on France, referred to above, will find the substance of it in whatever relates to land tenures, small farms, and the laws of inheritance, in this Magazine, for April 1836. We would also refer them to Mr Blacker's pamphlets, and to part of Colonel Napier's book “On Colonization and Small Farms;” although we conceive our contributor's scheme of perpetual possession an immense improvement on small farms held at will, or by the ordinary mode of leases, varying in duration. We shall give a short extract from Colonel Napier, as we apprehend his work is less known than it ought to be. He is arguing against the author of “England and America,” who, though a strenuous advocate for large, very large farms, and for capital, labour, and land in corresponding proportions, meanwhile confesses that the English farm-labourer is a miserable wretch. Of this, says Colonel Napier, No man doubts: he is not so miserable as an Irish labourer—but he is miserable—yes—very—“because,” says our author, “because he obtains but a very small share of the produce of his labour: but this is a question not of distribution, but of production.” But if the distribution be such as to make the production greater, and to give it all (except the rent) into the poor man's own hands: if it makes him the owner of what his labour produces; if such be the effect of "distribution," that, instead of "a very small share" given to him in the shape of daily and uncertain wages, the poor man should receive all the produce except the rent; and instead of buying from, sells to, the rich man, I ask my adversary, and all the world besides, if this is not essentially "a question of distribution" with a witness? The questions are inseparable: whoever possesses the production, (by virtue of the distribution of the land, in the hands of a few or of many) will give his neighbour the very smallest share of such production that he can, and this is one of the exceptions to that excellent rule of "doing as you would be done by;" which exception Mr Cobbett's "Bull-frog farmers" take especial care to adhere to most strictly! Thus we see, that when the few have large farms the many come off badly, and when the many have small farms the few come off badly.

Colonel Napier goes analytically into the economy of a farm, supposed the Duke of Devonshire's property, of 1000 acres, rented at £1000, and yielding Mr Middleman, the bull-frog farmer, £1000 per annum, to be spent in his bottle of claret, his wife's silk gowns, and his daughter's pianoforte. His management is contrasted with that of the labourers on that farm, converted into small farmers, with long leases, each holding twenty acres, and each obtaining £20 a-year as his share of Middleman's £1000 a-year of profit: The first advantage specified by the Colonel is the labourer become farmer, having constant work—though constant work, without adequate remuneration, goes for nothing. He brings forward better arguments.

Such is the hired labourer's destiny, that he may lose work by the invention of machinery, or from the pique of his employer, who may take offence at some hasty expression. The constant fear of this makes the hired labourer a slave and, it may be, a rogue, and starves him besides. But now we have divided the 1000 acres, the poor man is no longer a hireling, but a small farmer; and it is quite clear, that the £1000 which gave farmer Middleman the gout—fatted Mrs Middleman—made the farm ring with "tanti palpiti"—and supplied young cap-o'-one-side with cigars, would be divided among fifty hard-working sturdy spade-men, whose support and comforts would never cease. Thus, in addition to the wages they formerly received as day-labourers, each would have £20 a-year (that is to say, his share of the £1000) for managing his own portion of the great farm. These fifty men (and their families) would not drink claret—they would not sing "tanti palpiti"—they would not have hysterics—they would not have cigars (they might smoke a pipe)—but they would have plenty of food and beer, (if the malt-tax be repealed;) they would have a gradual increase of comforts; they would have constant occupation for themselves and their children; they would, one and all, scorn the thoughts of parish assistance, which they would consider as the right of the poor and miserable, and, not being either, they would consider any such assistance to be a degradation, revolting to their honest pride. The son would not marry a woman that he could not support, and the daughter would not marry a dissolute man. "No one," as Mons. de Sismondi says, "voluntarily descends from their condition." The small farmer, the English yeoman, bestows, but does not ask, alms.

The poor day-labourer, uncertain of work, cannot afford to put his child to school; if in harvest time he saves a few shillings, he puts them by to support his family in winter; his children idle while the father works, if he have work; or help him to poach if he have not work; thus they grow up ignorant from necessity, and idle from habit, and perhaps end, if they are males, by becoming thieves; if girls, by becoming prostitutes; and our wise men taunt them with being DEMORALIZED forsooth! Yes, they are "demoralized," which will always happen when people starve. Even the law admits starving to be an excuse for theft. Starving makes men eat each other! In short, what will it not make men and women do?

How different is the life of a small farmer's child! The farm is a school, and a noble school too, where he learns industry from HABIT: he grows up honest, because he is not driven to dishonesty by early and biting want; and he is proud and independent because he is honest: it is true, he may not have read the "Penny Magazine," and may never know the history of the Grand Chartreuse, or the Vatican, and other most pleasing histories, of deep import, no doubt, to English working men; but to make up for this misfortune, he will know right well how to manage a farm. The poor hired labourer sees his half-starved infant steal; he wishes it were otherwise, though he dare not correct it: who dares chastise a beloved and starving child? But the small farmer's son who was guilty of such an action, would tremble in the presence of his indignant family.

The admirable allotment system is an approach to the small-farm system; it does great good; but it is too limited to do all that the fearful state of things requires. As an accompaniment to small farms it is excellent; for there will be hired labour to a certain extent; and the hired labourer must have a garden and a cow.

There must always be hired labour, because the small farmers' sons will work for hire, though they will not wear a fool's cap and gold tassel over their ear; and his daughters, though they may not be able to play the piano-forte, will go to service, still having the respectability of their parents before their eyes, and deeply implanted in their hearts, brought up to make it their pride, their vaunt, their glory! The son of a yeoman will not labour for wages that are too low, nor will he burden his family by standing out for wages that are unreasonably high. There will, also, be plenty of competition, not among starving, "miserable wretches," but among honest and reasonable men.

Colonel Napier, like Mr H. Bulwer, places his own experience, the results of his personal observation, against the theories of the modern economists. Again he addresses the author of "England and America."

You say, that the great farmer's superiority is in the art of cultivating upon a great scale; and for the practice of this art, capital and labour in proportion to land, are indispensable. Yes; and so is the misery you describe, as being the portion of the great farmer's hired labourer. You then give us a note from Mr M'Culloch, in which the Professor says, that "French agriculture is 100 years behind ours; that two-thirds of the French people are employed in bad agriculture, while one-third of the English people suffice to carry on our good agriculture; and that in this our great superiority in domestic economy consists." Now, sir, what does this prove? Why, that two-thirds of the French are well fed, and that two-thirds of the English starve! You assert, and with truth, that our labourers are "miserable wretches." I assert, and no man knowing anything of France will deny the assertion, that the French agricultural labourer is very well fed, and clothed, and lodged, and that generally he is very happy. I lived a year in France; I saw no beggars except old people and cripples. In Normandy I was never, in a single instance, asked for charity by a man or a woman who was able to work. I have conversed with the labourers; they all told me they lived comfortably; they are extremely honest; everywhere you see linen hung out to dry on the hedges along the high road: no one thinks of stealing; you never hear of a robbery. I came to England; and, from the hour I landed to the present moment—a period of three weeks—I have not quitted my house once without being accosted by several able-bodied beggars, with their starving children; and as to leaving anything out of doors in safety, it is impossible! Why, locks and bolts fail in preserving what you have within! To live in England is to live in one constant state of suffering. In France, a man enjoys his comforts, because he sees every one else at their ease; in England he cannot. Who can button up his warm greatcoat, with any comfort, when he sees a dozen half-naked women and children shivering and half-starving? or an honest, industrious, powerful man, that cannot get work? This horrid sight he is sure to see in England; he is sure not to see it in France. Is this, let me ask Mr M'Culloch, a proof of the "great superiority of our domestic economy over that of France?" What does this prove? Why, that in despite of bad farming, the French are well-fed and happy with their small farms; while the English, though possessing great agricultural skill, are starving and miserable with their large farms. In short, whether in France, Belgium, or Tuscany, wherever we see small farms, united to skill in agriculture, the poor man is happy and honest. Wherever we see large farms, the poor man is miserable: and yet the author of "England and America," where he recapitulates all the remedies offered for our distress, (page 46), omits to mention small farms, which are among the most efficacious! He quotes Paul Louis Courier: he will find nothing in that extraordinary man's writings that advocates large farms. I will say more: the whole of his own book is one constant argument in favour of small farms, and small fortunes, in preference to great ones; and yet he strangely wants to combine, and combine, and combine heaven knows what, to create large farms. How is it possible for a man of his talents to avoid seeing, that what is called by the false and stupid expression, "national wealth," is nothing more than the accumulation of great fortunes?—great heaps of money in a few hands; and, that the greater these heaps are, the poorer and more miserable the mass of the people must be; and the poorer and more miserable England must be; and that it is the well-fed labourer that forms "national wealth," and not rich weavers and stock-jobbers, and so forth, with their "plum," who, like the upas tree, cast desolation around them.

This may be somewhat out of place, though strikingly corroborative of the facts and opinions brought forward by our contributor, both as to the equal or superior productiveness of small farms, and, above all, their moral effects. What we have now to adduce is more directly to the point.

Upon our table lies a thin quarto volume, entitled "Suggestions relative to Ireland and the Church of Ireland." It is printed for the convenience of circulation among the author's private friends. We are at liberty to transfer to our pages such of the facts and arguments as we deem useful, to be made generally known. The author is an Irishman, a landed proprietor, a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and in orders in the Irish Church—sufficient guarantees for his attachment to his country, and a competent knowledge of its interests. We do not know what he may think of the "New Remedy" suggested; but he, like every reflecting man, is fully aware of the existing evils. After noticing the evils which Ireland has suffered from the frequent change of rulers, and the imagined necessity of legislative interference upon all occasions, he suggests the propriety of throwing the country gentlemen upon the resources of their own legitimately acquired influence, and of abating the number of Parliamentary grants. Ireland, he states—

Is the land of expectation. Every Irishman, from the Peer to the coal porter, is a client.—The lesson in the family circle, dwells upon the cultivation of patronage, rather than the sure rewards of patient industry. Hence, there is no proper reliance on a man's own exertions.

Years are spent in calculating every possible contingency of expectation from a patron.

Every Irishman, whether from the experience of the political confiscations of former times, or the want of moral restraint upon the workings of a prurient imagination, would seem to prefer the incerta pro certis.

Legislation cannot cure this state of things as mere legislation; yet legislators who have to do with Ireland, are liable to catch the infection of the Irish notion, that legislation can do, and is to do everything.

To come to our immediate case, land-tenures and holdings, the "Suggestions" do not go so far as "The New Remedy," but they point to far-spread and deep-seated, cankering evils:—

It is obvious that the system of landlord and tenant in Ireland has much to do with the unhappy condition of the people, and requires to be ameliorated. In Scotland, the landlord builds and upholds the farm-house, &c. &c., divides and encloses the farm at his own expense, and the tenant is a mere merchant of the surface for the currency of the lease. In Ireland, on the contrary, the improvement of the farm is supposed to be with the tenant. The landlord sets the farm on the condition of the tenant building, ditching, &c. The consequence is, the tenant's capital is sunk at once; he has no means left to lime, or manure, or drain, or increase his stock. His crops are impoverished, his cattle distrained, and, at last, he is ejected for non-payment of rent. Still he thinks it hard that the house he built should pass to another. Hence bad blood, &c.; hence the claim of tenant-right is something more than the mere expression itself would convey to the ear, in England or Scotland. It is, in other words, a prescriptive right in the minds of the occupants of the soil, to what they hold, at a reasonable rent; bought by the outlay which they or their fathers have made on the premises, on an understanding with the landlord, though without a formal agreement on the subject, that, in some way or other, the tenant should be remunerated for his improvements; and the choice lies with himself whether he will receive the valuation in money assigned to him, or will continue to hold the farm. These bargains are, comparatively speaking, never fulfilled. A large rent is asked; and, to encourage the tenant, a long time is promised; the landlord is sanguine; the tenant no less so; one half year's arrears follows upon another; the tenant is wasted; the farm is wasted; the landlord is ultimately a great sufferer; but the tenant is ruined. He is to be driven forth; the landlord only claims his own: the tenant resists ejection, or, ejected, attempts to return to take possession, claiming the house, &c., as the produce of his own means. Hence an endless strife; the landlord ejects in the name of law; the tenant resists in the name of equity; and a whole district becomes disturbed.

Perhaps it would be difficult to remedy this miserable condition of things by an act of the legislature; still the moral and political incorrectness of such bargains, should be again and again pressed on the attention of Irish landlords; and they must at length come to see, that the tenant's strength is the strength of the landlord also.

Connected with the landlord and tenant system, are the Grand Jury assessments. These operate again to the depressing of the tenantry. When will the gentry of Ireland be content to tax themselves at once and directly, instead of suffering that amazing taxation which they inflict upon themselves mediately through their tenants? It was a sad mistake the removal of the assessed taxes. They fell upon the rich. Had they been retained and applied to local purposes, many benefits would have been secured, and many evils, to a certain extent, averted. [Why not re-enact them?]

Merchant-farm adventures as private speculations are recommended; and a plausible tabular statement is drawn up, shewing the profitable results. But what Company will adventure in Ireland? No, no. They will send their capital to Canada or Australia; and Irish labourers will follow at the public cost, and accomplish what cannot be attained at home, where every element of prosperity—land, labour, capital—abounds, and is rendered useless by the absence of quiet and security. In discussing other Irish questions, the writer of the "Suggestions" adverts incidentally to the turbulence of the Irish people, as an imagined symptom of that alleged innate disposition, and inherent love of riot and disorder presumed to belong to the national character, and said to wear frequently, if not always, a political aspect. This he denies, inquiring—

In the various insurrections, or demonstrations of insurrection, which have appeared within the last century, has it not been uniformly easy to trace them to intelligible and prominent causes? There certainly were many circumstances in the nature of the law, still more in the spirit of its administration, to engender a predisposition in the lower orders, when seeking to obtain the redress of grievances of which they complained, to have recourse to violence in defiance of the constituted authorities. But was there, in their social condition, anything to counteract this unhappy madness? Here was a people suffering from many local enactments made by their own Parliament—that is, by the landlords of Ireland; but where was the spirit of confidence binding together the different classes of society in the harmonies of intercourse; where was the attempt, on the part of the gentry, to apply a moral and intellectual cultivation to the people dependent upon them? There was much generous charity as far as money-giving was concerned; but it had no other aim than present relief to the objects of it; it sought not to raise them in their own self-respect; it smothered the spirit of independence. There is a charity which ennobles—there also is a charity which degrades; and it is to be feared, that the well-meant kindnesses of the upper to the lower classes in Ireland were, in general, of the latter character.

The landlord and tenant system was always bad. There were, indeed, many happy exceptions in the condition of the tenantry on some estates in relation to their landlords; but in these exceptions of persons, there was neither an excepting to, nor a correcting of, the system. A happy feeling was established, but the moral position was far from healthy. The tenantry acquired a blind and feudal confidence in their landlord, but they cared not for the cultivation of that personal independence which the law of England contemplates as the birthright of the merest subject; and which, in an instructed people, understood, and claimed, and acted upon, is the best defence against anarchy, an undoubted security for the maintenance of order, the due administration of justice, and the well-being of the whole community.

The author of the "Suggestions" before us, which our readers will remember are the same as M.S., has, with full knowledge of his own country, and no abatement of patriotic feeling, had the advantage of looking at Ireland from the shores of a more prosperous, because a more enlightened and tranquil country, one in which the mutual interests of landlord and tenant are much better understood. When we say more enlightened, we refer chiefly to the higher and middle orders; for the Irish peasantry are sufficiently acute.

His "Suggestions" for the removal of those Irish grievances, and those bars to the improvement of Ireland, which are likely to occupy the attention of the British Legislature during the present Session, embrace a field too wide for us to enter upon at present; but his leading views upon the subjects most pressing we may state. These are—the Municipal Bill, and Education.

The date of the paper of Suggestions from which we select, is the opening of the present Session.

Another year has passed away, and almost all the great Irish questions remain unsettled. The delay, at first sight so much to be deplored, will not, however, perhaps, have proved altogether useless. It certainly will not, if the consequences it has already produced, and is still producing, have their natural and proper effect on the mind of the legislature, if our legislators, of every shade of opinion, by whatever means they would consult for the good of the commonwealth, are taught by experience, the desirableness, not to say the urgent necessity of doing finally and at once, whatever is to be done for Ireland; and if so taught, they will consent, for a little while at least, to abandon that partisanship of prejudice, faction, and prepossession, which, at all times, in all circumstances, and under all parties, may be fairly said to have been, and to be, the bane of Irish affairs, the great incubus upon the prosperity of Ireland. It is now felt on all hands, and acknowledged by men of all parties, that the state of Ireland is a drawback to the prosperity of the British empire.

Assuredly, it will be a happy era in the annals of Great Britain, when those in power and those out of power shall cease to make Ireland the arena of political gladiatorship; when they shall select, at length, from the wide field of Britain's dominion and British legislation, some less vital spot whereon to hold the tournament of party chivalry. Ireland lies too near the heart of the empire for such a purpose. Let them change the scene of their operations, and, dealing with Ireland as she is, and not as she ought to be, but in reference to what she might be, let them consult, without party feeling or party views, how the condition of the people of Ireland can be bettered, and how the country can rise, and may be raised, in the scale of national resources. Patriotism demands this, party interest requires it; for, whatever be the party dominant in the councils of the nation, Ireland, unsettled, must ever prove a treacherous quicksand to the stability of their political power. It is a capital fault, then, in the legislators, of whatever party, to make Ireland and the affairs of Ireland the battleground of their political strivings.

After noting that the vexatious delay of Catholic Emancipation deprived that "healing measure" of much that was valuable, and all that was conciliatory and gracious, he warns legislators not to make shipwreck a second time on the same bar.

Now, in applying this sort of experience to that particular measure, the Municipal Bill for Ireland (without however, discussing the question of the exact amount of the franchise which it ought to fix), one is anxious that our Legislature should profit by the example of past times. Temporizing expedients will never do. Half measures, like the enactments of the Catholic Bill of 1821, will defeat themselves, will disappoint their projectors. The people of Ireland must be one with the people of England; they are one in interest, and in feeling—they must be one in privileges. The condition of the corporations under the proposed enactments, must be fairly looked at in the face. It must be unhesitatingly allowed that the Municipal Bill, as intended, would increase the Roman Catholic constituency to a great extent in most of the corporations; that it would even place some of the corporations in the hands of the Catholics. All this must be allowed unhesitatingly. Those who propose and those who support the measures must do so, not on the ground of attaching the Catholics to this or that administration; not even on the ground of attaching them to a Protestant Government as distinct from a Catholic population; but on the ground of acquainting them with their own interest in the constitution, and giving to them any part they are able to hold in the executive of a country whose Legislature has ceased to recognise any civil disability from religious distinctions; whose Government exists only for the good of all, and which emphatically would and ought to be one with all.

It is said in opposition to the Bill, and alleged as a sufficient ground for opposition, that the class of Catholics proposed to be enfranchised is made up of uneducated men; and that, therefore, not on account of their religion, but their want of education, they are unfit to possess the corporation franchise. Let this be admitted, and let it even be true, how is this condition of things to be remedied? Without education, with property, however, sufficient (but for the want of education) to be entrusted with the administration of their own civic affairs, is it to be supposed that they will just remain in statu quo?—Why, their very ignorance is more to be dreaded without than within the walls of their town-house. Are their instincts totally different from ours; are their hearts totally inaccessible to those appeals and motives which influence universally the human race? are the Catholics of Ireland a distinct species of the human family? Unless we are prepared to say so, let us remember that it is the very law of our nature, on which the well-intentioned and the well-instructed uniformly act with regard to their fellows, that to elevate a man in the scale of society, or improve his condition effectually in any of the moral and social relations of life, we must raise him in his own proper self-respect. This is the great principle which animates to exertion, which sustains the continuance of pursuit; and, when the object is gained, secures the possessor against the abuse of the possession.

Alas! how powerfully is the truth of this proposition demonstrated by its converse, as it is exhibited in the history of Ireland. Why are the middling class of the Catholics found inferior in cultivation to the same class among the Protestants; simply because the circumstances in which they were placed by the legislature of the country, had a tendency, and exercised a never-ceasing influence to deprive them of that self-respect to which we have just alluded. It is true these degrading laws are expunged from the statute-book; let the principle, then, which is now asserted in their place, be fairly carried out; if it is so, the Municipal Bill must pass at once; unless we are to go back to the days and deeds of other times; unless the cry of extermination be to be raised, and the war of extermination carried on.

After alluding to the tyranny of the English Parliament during the reign of the first Guelphs, and the abject suberviency of the native legislature to English views down to its very close, and giving a brief history of some of the enactments by which Ireland was held in political and commercial bondage, we meet these excellent general remarks upon the penal laws; and we beg the reader to bear in mind that they are from the pen of a Protestant Minister of the Church of Ireland:—

In speaking of these laws, the attention of men is too exclusively directed to the commiseration for the suffering Catholic; but, taking into account the demoralization which they undoubtedly produced in the Catholic, their effect in extending the same demoralization to the Protestant part of the community cannot be doubted, when attention is directed to the state of the ascendancy party, exulting in them. Tyranny, successful and irresistible, may make man abject, but the moral condition of the tyrant and slave is the same; reverse their relative positions, and you will have a slave and a tyrant still; the spiritless slave becomes in power the atrocious tyrant, and the vindictive tyrant, shorn of his prerogative, in turn becomes the dastard slave. Wide as the interval may seem between them, the extremes meet at last. It must, therefore, ever be kept in mind, that these penal statutes had the most unhappy influence upon the moral condition of the Protestant community.

The influence of the priests he attributes to the true cause. Mr O'Connell, in his fits of candour, sometimes honestly tells to what he owes his power—it is to the abuses, the misgovernment of his country. Take these away, and you deprive agitation of the fuel without which it could not long continue to spread. In like manner,

It is not surprising that the Roman Catholic priesthood exercise an unexampled sway over their own followers to do their political bidding—their priests had been their friends when the Legislature, the Executive, the Church, the Protestant gentry of Ireland, had treated them as aliens; and if, in 1792, it was declared by men anxious to incorporate the Roman Catholics into the Constitution of the country, that “the influence of the priesthood over the minds of the laity must be considerably reduced, before they could say, with truth, that an extension to all their body of the elective franchise would increase the virtual basis of election,” is it surprising that that influence has increased when nearly forty years were allowed to pass without any alteration in the system, and in circumstances, too, every year growing more and more favourable to its extension?

When, then, the party journals chronicle almost with exultation, the unhappy doings of the peasantry of Ireland; and when the lover of his Church and of Protestantism lifts up his hand to Heaven and utters his protestation against conciliation and confidence towards such a people, assuredly his horror had better give place to the distressed recollection, that Protestant legislation has had a fearful responsibility every way in the condition of the people of Ireland.

It is no answer to say, “The penal statutes are blotted out.” Thank God, they are! But, does not the bearing of the political Protestants in Ireland testify, at this moment, regret at the disappearance of these statutes from the code of the empire.

Our own views of the Irish Church Establishment differ so essentially from those of the author of the “Suggestions,” who, though a very enlightened and liberal man, is still one of its Ministers, that we shall not advert to his speculations upon Church reform. The sweeping principle, fast gaining ground, is “Reform it altogether;” and, though grateful for every item of good as it may arise, we should consider it waste of space to enter into such discussions merely upon their own merits. He admits that the proportion of Protestants has not kept pace with the increase of the population generally, and that, on the contrary, there is a marked falling off; and he enters fully into the abuses which have caused a state of things in the Church, which he laments, and which we believe to be far beyond earthly remedy. One passage we cite, as illustrative of the utility of a Church Establishment, in which the twenty-two Bishops—before the Irish-Bishop-nuisance had been partly abated—have, from the reign of Elizabeth, possessed estates of twice the value of the whole Establishment in Scotland. The Establishment in Scotland is rated at £300,000 per annum; the estates of the Irish Bishops were valued by Lord Althorp at £600,000. But these primitive representatives of the Apostles did not draw above £100,000 of this sum. What became of the surplus? It had been fined down to the lowest possible amount by their disinterested predecessors. The see of ——— may well be reduced to a poor £8,000 per annum, after a reverend Doctor, who came over to Ireland with a Lord Lieutenant, an unbeneficed clergyman, left personal property, sworn to in the Irish Prerogative Court, to the amount of £243,000! No, there was never anything so monstrous upon the face of the earth as the Established Church of Ireland. But while an Englishman, a Castle chaplain, or something of the sort, was picking up these pretty personalities, what were he and his fellows doing for their pretended charge?

What has the Church done for the three million of persons who, at this day, are fully accessible only in the ancient Irish language?—Literally nothing. Missionaries of various other denominations have, indeed, entered upon this field of labour; but the Church has looked on, and "passed by on the other side." By the last returns, it would seem that the population belonging to the Establishment in Ireland amounts to scarcely more than one-sixth of the number of persons thus inaccessible from the difference of language; and while millions upon millions have been expended upon this fraction, upon a population six times greater the Church has not spent one single farthing. The case is aggravated, too, by the circumstance that individuals of her own communion have come forward in the cause; they have done so as individuals—the Church has made no movement; they have done thankfully what they could, but they have done it not in accordance with the system, but in despite of it.

Inquiring still further into the conduct of the Church in Ireland, in former times, towards those of a different communion, how little has been attempted in the way of a comprehension. With regard to Protestant Dissenters; not only has nothing been done for it, but much has been done against it. Reverting to the period already alluded to, many now alive will recollect that exclusiveness was the order of the day. It was the great expedient which was to prove the palladium of the Church. To have intercourse with Dissenters was an obstacle to obtaining orders, and to preferment in orders.

One would have thought that with so great a population yet Roman Catholic, the hierarchy would have merged all distinctions in the great one of Protestants; that they would have encouraged, in the united efforts of all sects, the affectionate aggression of what all Protestants call truth, upon all who differ; but this was not the policy of those days; for a diffused Protestantism, they maintained a concentrated churchmanship;—and what has it accomplished for the Church and for the country? We retain a few fortresses and some garrison towns, in token of an abstract supremacy; but the spiritual dominion and spiritual commerce of the country is in the hands of men of another ritual.

Let the advocates of the Irish Church remember that this is not said by an enemy—not even by an Englishman, a Stanley, or any other reverend, but by an Irishman, and a Minister of the Establishment whose enormities he lays bare, while he entertains the fond hope that her redemption is still possible, and that, by adopting his suggestions, or measures of similar character, the Church of Ireland may yet be saved and the Irish people benefited by its ministrations. Does he not see that obstacles as formidable are opposed to his sweeping reforms as to O'Connell's abolition?—We may, at some future time, return to a fuller examination of the "Suggestions" for making the Irish Church in reality what it would now fain call itself. Until lately, its pride withheld even the poor homage of hypocritical pretence.

GIVE US BREAD!*

There is a wail throughout the land for bread.
 "Bread!" "Bread!"—on all sides rises up the cry.
 Here, even here, where daily tears are shed
 O'er "ruffled roses"—here in misery
 Must young and aged raise a hopeless eye
 For food—mere food, of which the earth is full—
 Which savages enjoy unto disgust;
 Here do the iron-hearted men who rule,
 Wring from starvation her tear-moistened crust;
 Here phantom Famine stalks in open day,
 And grimly triumphs in the land's dismay.
 Hark the blasphemer! Hear the ancient lie!
 "The law is just—is politic and wise;
 'Tis due the landowner; and, by and by,
 If war with other nations should arise,

* One of the merciful miracles of our Saviour was, blessing a few small loaves with increase, to feed a hungry multitude. How do the clergy and legislators of Great Britain imitate this divine example? They curse the bread of twenty-five millions of their fellow-creatures, and diminish that which is earned by the sweat of the brow, to the half of what might be obtained.

'Tis then you'll learn our prudent steps to prize."
 Thou selfish dotard—pseudo-patriot!
 The people, if ye would, ye cannot feed,
 Shall nature's bounties in the warehouse rot,
 That thou a life of shameless waste may lead?
 Shall they who toil for thy support, defence,
 Shall they not share the gifts of Providence?

O God! who, when, in stranger land of old,
 Thy people groaned beneath a tyrant sway,
 Raised up a Moses, wise at once and bold,
 To baffle Pharaoh, and to spread dismay
 O'er Egypt, wrapt in darkness without day—
 Who for a passage scooped the mighty sea,
 And showered down manna in the desert place—
 Raise up a Moses now, our land to free
 From this oppression done before Thy face,
 To strike the fiscal rock that hems our land,
 And pour thy treasures on the famished strand!

THE MOUNTAIN HERD-BOY'S SONG.

A HERD-BOY of the hills am I,
 The world o'erlooking from on high;
 The sun's most early beam I see,
 And day the longest dwells with me.

The birth-place of the streams is here,
 From them my drink is fresh and clear;
 Within the torrent's headlong speed
 I dip my hand, nor goblet need.

The mountains are mine own domain,
 Girt round with storms as with a chain,
 From North to South they roll along—
 The louder then must be my song.

While bright blue sky is o'er my head,
 The thunder clouds are 'neath me spread—
 I know ye well, your strength I dare;
 But, oh! my father's cottage spare!

If sounds the storm-bell from below,
 Full red my beacon-fires must glow—
 Then hence to join the martial throng,
 To wield my sword, and sing my song.

A herd-boy of the hills am I,
 The world o'erlooking from on high;
 The sun's most early beam I see,
 And day the longest dwells with me. L. F.

POVERTY.

OMNIPOTENCE of earth, all hail !
Hail, guardian of the giant-twisted bond
Of social order !—bond which not toil-hardened
Nerves, stirred by the impulse of a million hearts,
Can rend ! But what, though ruler, sovereign, Domination, potentate thou art ?—(thou,
Whose myriad subjects far out-number all
The Greek or Roman in his pride called his)— Thine are dearer names, kind parent ! fondest nurse !
Unseparating friend through life's long years !
For myself alone, what might I tell of thee !
But yet, not now. Thy sway of long, long ages,
Let me trace o'er man, o'er nations.

Spirit, all-ruling here below ! Some name
Thee heaven-born, some of birth infernal.
Dare I declare thy hidden origin ?
No ! Enough, I see thy traces all around,
I feel thy ever-present influence ;
Enough, to know that when our father Adam
Stood alone on earth in unclad dignity,
And roofless slept beneath the heavens, thou didst
Exist ; wert near him then to whisper—"Toil !"

And soon around that ancient ancestor
Of men, a great posterity arose ;
These, the first nurslings of great Nature's vigour,
Thy subjects were ; and they thy first behest
Obeyed. They toiled : but toil to them was life,
And health, and happiness, and mirth, and power,
And virtue. Gently didst thou rule ; for gay
As birds were then the human denizens
Of the broad, verdant fields, and smiling vales—
Those breathers of untainted airs from hill
And mountain ; it seemed thou hadst, in truth,
Thy sway resigned. Thus thought a hellish fiend,
Who sought thee then, and in thine ear her counsel Poured—"Why slumbers in thy heart ambition ?"
'Twas thus she spoke—"Seest thou not thy subjects,
Careless of thy rule, enjoy the goods of earth

As if thou reignedst not ? Arouse, arouse thee !
What though vast the teeming stores of Nature ?
What though from them now she pours with bounteous,
Loving, and maternal hand, her gifts to all
Who labour as thou didst at first command, Making their labour light ? Let her not thus Subvert thine empire ! She will give, fond fool, Enough for all earth's offspring ! Be it so !
But why shouldst thou permit that all should have Enough ?—Send thou into the hearts of some Desire to have more than enough ; and then
They soon will grasp the harvest of their brethren,
The fruit of others' toil. Give a dear name
To that which thus injustice seizes—
Let man call it his own. Sweet word ! Dost thou
Not thank me for it ? Breathe it in subtlest
Whispers, deep into his heart of hearts !
Then, then, thy sway will be more wide than Nature's,
More sure than hers. Yes ! thou shalt teach men things
At which she shuddering will recoil, and leave
The world to thee !" The fiend, prophetic
In these last words, took flight. There, Poverty,
She left with kindling lust for rule awakened—
She was obeyed. Behold, again, the world,
In ancient days, not as the first so distant !
Seest thou the landmark and the boundary ?
Hearst thou the cry—"This is mine own—that thine ?"
The storehouse and the granary arise,
The dwelling vast, the city, and the palace—
All, all, that Nature liberal has given,
There, see, by Poverty's great handmaid, Art,
Piled up in gorgeous heaps !—each heap, the own
Of one man solely. Hist !—What greet his ear
On every side ?—The voices of his brethren—
"We lack—we lack—naked, hungry, cold,
We perish !"—These, Poverty, thy million
Subjects, who to the hundreds cry whom thou Hast governed by the counsels of the fiend.

LAYS OF A NEW ERA.

IN A SERIES OF SONNETS.

I.

UPON the troubled and tempestuous ocean,
My little bark, I launch thee without fear :
With Justice at the helm, and Truth to steer,
We'll pass the shoals of life with calm emotion.
Bearing right onward, with the purest feeling,
We will espouse the right, the wrong defy ;
Hold up th' oppressor, tyranny decry ;
But, to the good, with lowly reverence kneeling,
We will award the praise that goodness claims.
The weak to shield, the poor man's lot t'improve,
And shew mankind "how beautiful is love ;"
These, these shall be our constant, fervent aims.
Spirit of Truth ! our guiding star be thou !
To thee, to thee alone, be paid the holy vow !

II.

A mighty spirit is abroad ; its cry
Is heard proclaiming equal rights to men.
The pampered votaries of corruption's den
Have heard it, and are issuing forth to try
How its resistless power they may defy ;
And fierce, with maddening shouts, they vainly strive
To stifle it ; but it hath reached the hive
Of men too long oppressed and cruelly.
A mighty spirit is abroad, proclaiming
The "wreck of old opinions ;" in the tide,
Mad Superstition, screaming loud, is aiming
To stem the current she had once defied !
Error and Bigotry, with torches flaming,
Light up th' impetuous flood, as down the stream they glide.

III.

Who shall resist the universal WILL ?
Who shall be deaf unto a nation's cry ?
An isolated faction ? Shall it still,
Tottering as in decrepitude, decry
All salutary changes, and defy
A people who have suffered, suffered long ?
Shall our born-lawgivers heap wrong on wrong,
Insult on insult with impunity ?
"Hereditary wisdom" must not sway
A mighty nation's destinies, and blast
Its fairest hopes. The fictions of a day
Gone by, have lost their charm, and men, at last,
Have dared assert their rights, and sworn to be
No longer slaves of hateful tyranny.

IV.

A TEMPLE OF THE LORD !—behold yon pile !
Its priests are men of war, of savage mien,
And appetite instigate and vile
For filthy lucre ! In the fray are seen
These holy men in conflict with the lean
And miserable peasant ! See they come,
Fresh from Rathcormac's slaughter !—stricken dumb ?
No ! they the mother's grief are mocking with a smile
Exultant ! And are these the men to win
Souls, that the living God may be adored ?
These, that profane the altar with the din
Of impious broils, and grasp the crimson sword ?
Then call it not a Temple of the Lord,
For 'tis a hateful mockery and a sin.

TOOKE'S HISTORY OF PRICES, AND OF THE STATE OF THE CIRCULATION FROM 1793 TO 1837.*

THIS is an enlarged and improved edition of a well-known work, and one of authority among political economists—namely, “Tooke’s Thoughts and Details on the High and Low Prices of the Last Thirty Years;” a period now extended to forty-five years, as fifteen more have elapsed since the date of the original publication. A brief sketch of the state of the corn trade for the last two centuries precedes the history. The remarkable fluctuations in that trade, and consequently in the price of corn, are attributed by Mr Tooke mainly, if not wholly, to the effect of the seasons, though a few incidental and temporary causes, such as war-demands and the blockade of ports, are admitted to modify prices in an inconsiderable degree, as well as improved modes of agriculture, rates of freight and insurance, and expense of land or other internal carriage. The imputed effects of a large or narrow circulation, or of currency in short, upon the prices of corn, he denies in toto; and the Corn-Tax, or restrictions on importation, he appears to consider a very unimportant element in the question, though he does not enter directly into its investigation. That the seasons are the main agent in raising or depressing prices, no one can seriously question; and if Mr Tooke could set aside the effect of the Corn-Laws as satisfactorily as he does that of the currency upon prices, his principle would be established. His detailed account of prices certainly tends strongly to establish his doctrine; but in much of the period of which he treats, the operation of Corn-Laws was unknown or unfelt; and England was a grain-exporting, not an importing country. Forty-five years of the eighteenth century, from about 1715 to 1765, were, with few exceptions, genial and productive years, and prices were comparatively low, and sometimes absolutely cheaper than in the former century. The reign of George II. was one of the most prosperous periods of labourers and handicraftsmen.

Every writer on national economy has his favourite theory, by which he satisfactorily accounts, at least to himself, for variations in prices. From about 1765 the prices of corn rose all over Europe, up to 1775, or later; and the rise was certainly coincident with ungenial seasons and deficient harvests. In the earlier period which we have quoted, the average was 32s. 1d.; but in 1765 wheat had risen to 49s. 9d., and in 1766 the quartern loaf sold in London at 1s. 6d. In 1767 wheat rose to 58s. 8d. From 1776 prices fell again, for the seasons were better. But it is impossible for us to go into minute details; and without these there can be no satisfactory demonstration of Mr Tooke’s theory. This investigation we therefore leave to the scientific inquirer, and turn to more general points.

Mr Tooke does not believe that an income or property-tax, equally levied upon all classes, would in any way tend to raise prices; and he rightly considers high prices a very fallacious test or symptom of national prosperity. Mr Tooke goes apparently upon narrower data in discussing wages than any other economical question; but, as this is not the least important among such questions, we shall glean a few of his own statements, and also of those he has collected, wishing they were fuller. For thirty years in the eighteenth century, (from 1720 to 1750,) while wheat fell wages rose; so that a labourer who, in the last forty years of the seventeenth century, could purchase only two-thirds of a peck of wheat with his day’s wages, could in the latter period obtain a whole peck.

From 1763, and for thirty years previously, a labourer’s wages had been 7s. a-week, which was seldom below and sometimes rather above the price of seven pecks of wheat. Previous to 1793, wheat had always been as cheap during war as in times of peace; nor were the wages of labourers affected by war, previously to the last long war. But wages appear comparatively high, in the eighteenth century, to what they are at present. From 1730 to 1790, and throughout times of war and peace, by the Greenwich Hospital prices, the wages of carpenters per day, were 2s. 6d. Those of bricklayers were 2s. 6d. a-day, up to 1765, (when wheat rose,) after which they fell to 2s. 4d. In the sixty years specified, the wages of masons gradually rose from 2s. 6d. to 2s. 10d.; and the wages of plumbers, after sinking from 3s. to 2s. 6d., rallied after the American war, and rose in 1785 to 3s. 3d. During this period it is, as we have noticed, remarkable, that agricultural produce was cheaper during war than peace; and the command over the necessaries of life, in reference to the rate of wages, must have been much greater than at many subsequent periods, and much greater than at present. The highest price of wheat, within the period, was £2 : 10 : 2½; the lowest, £1 : 11 : 6½. This must have been an interval of great comfort and prosperity to the working classes. But the severe, and almost starvation years, extending from 1795 to 1802, followed. The crop of 1795 was very deficient, and there was no stock on hand. Mr Tooke says:—

The prices of all other provisions having risen in a greater or less proportion to wheat, and there being a very general apprehension of a continuance of the scarcity, it had become manifestly impossible for the working classes to subsist on their ordinary wages. It was partly from a conviction to this effect, and partly in consequence of the tendency to disturbance and riots among the agricultural labourers, that the allowance system was at this time introduced. There was at the same time a general acquiescence on the part of employers in the necessity of some advance of wages, which, however, when conceded, bore still a very inadequate proportion to the increased price of the necessities of life. The distress, accordingly, of the working and poorer classes was very severe, and the privations of the classes immediately above them, and generally of all classes depending on limited money incomes, were great. The whole period, indeed, of this memorable dearth, was one of much suffering to the bulk of the community. But it was a time of great prosperity to the landed interests, that is, to the landlords, who were raising, or had the prospect of soon raising, their rents; and to the farmers, who were realizing enormous gains pending the currency of their leases. The following extract from an article by Arthur Young, in the Annals of Agriculture, for 1796, will serve as a practical illustration of the principle which I have had occasion to notice—viz., of the effect of a deficiency in raising the price greatly beyond the ratio of the defect, and of the consequent larger sum distributed among the growers, than could be derived from medium or abundant crops.

"The average price of wheat for the twelve months, from May 1795 to April 1796, has been, on an average, in England and Wales, 10s. 7d. per bushel, and that of barley 4s. 9d. Now the price for twelve years, ending 1794, was for wheat 5s. 10d., and for barley 3s. 3d. For the year above described, therefore, the price has exceeded that average 4s. 9d. per bushel for wheat, and 1s. 6d. for barley. Let us suppose the annual consumption of wheat to be 8,701,875 quarters, and that of barley 10,545,000 quarters; and, further, that the deficiency of the crop on the average, of the two years, so far as they affect the period in question, has amounted, in wheat, to one-fifth; and that the barley has, on an average of the two crops, been a medium: in this case there would have been consumed—

Of wheat 8,961,500 quarters, the extra price on which at 4s. 9d. the bushel, or 38s. the quarter, is	£13,226,840
Of barley, 10,545,000 quarters, at 1s. 6d. per bushel, or 12s. the quarter	6,327,000

If, therefore, these data are just, and they are ventured merely as calculation on uncertain foundations, the farmers have received in these two articles only near £20,000,000 sterling beyond the deficiency of the crop, supposing the deficiency to be one-fifth, which is a very great one, and without adding a word on the price of meat or any other article."

Is it surprising that farmers and landlords should openly rejoice in years of scarcity and dearth? In the spring of 1796, the dearth of provisions, and apprehensions of farther scarcity, raised wheat to the average of 100s.; but the rise of wages held no proportion to the increase in the price of all kinds of provisions; and although prices fell somewhat at intervals, yet between the spring of 1799, and in June 1800, they had reached the following quotations:—

Wheat, Gazette average,	134s. 5d.
Barley, - - -	69s. 1d.
Oats, - - -	51s. 1d.

In Smithfield market,

Beef sold for	4s. 6d. to 6s. 4d. per stone.
Mutton and Pork,	5s. 4d. to 6s. 8d.

In Newgate and Leadenhall markets,

Beef,	- - -	9d. to 1s. 2d. per lb.
Mutton,	- - -	8d. to 10d.
Veal,	- - -	9d. to 1s.
Pork in St James's market,	- - -	9d. to 10d.
Hay,	- - -	64s. to 122s. per 1d.
Straw,	- - -	54s. to 63s.

Every necessary of life was dear in proportion; and this always holds. The silly alliterative saying "Up corn, down horn," and its converse, is a gross fallacy, and so proved. In December of the same year (after a slight depression from favourable appearances in the harvest) the average of wheat again rose to 133s.; barley, 76s. 7d.; oats, 41s. 8d. The sufferings of the people were very great; but prices still advanced, until, in March 1801, wheat had reached 156s. 2d.; barley 90s., and oats 47s. 2d. Meat and dairy produce rose in proportion; and also wool and tallow; and, in addition to the general dearth of necessities, came the first excessive taxation of Pitt upon secondary necessities, as malt, tea, sugar, tobacco, spirits, &c. We shall now quote Mr Tooke:—

Such and so great being the rise of prices of provisions, and of nearly all consumable commodities, it was quite impossible that the lowest of the working classes could, upon their wages, at the rate of what they were before 1795, obtain a subsistence for themselves and their families, on the lowest scale requisite to sustain human existence; and the classes above the lowest, including some portion of skilled labourers, could do little, if at all, more than provide themselves with food, clothing, and shelter, without any of the indulgences which habit had rendered necessities. If under these circumstances there had been no rise of wages, no contribution by parishes and by individuals, in aid of wages, great numbers of the people must have actually perished, and the classes immediately above the lowest would with difficulty have preserved themselves from the same fate. In such case the suffering from dearth would have been correctly designated as a famine, a term which has been somewhat loosely applied to the period under consideration. For, severe and intense as were the sufferings and privations of the people of this country, in the dearths of 1795 and 1796, and of 1800 and 1801, there were few recorded instances of death from actual destitution.

A rise of wages was imperatively called for by the urgency of the case, and was complied with to some extent in most of the branches of industry, the claims for increase being aided by the resource which workmen and labourers had of enlisting in the army and navy. There had already been an advance of wages in 1795 and 1796, and the allowance system had been begun and carried to some extent in these years. A further advance of wages took place in 1800 and 1801; but still so inadequate, compared with the prices of provisions, as, even with parish allowances and private contributions, to leave a vast mass of privation and misery.

Mr Tooke cites a statement made by Arthur Young in 1801, who mentions that he once knew a labourer near Bury in Suffolk, who, when he had worked for 5s. a-week, could with his 5s. purchase a bushel of wheat, a bushel of malt, a pound of butter, a pound of cheese, and a penny-worth of tobacco; while in 1801, the same articles cost £1 : 6 : 5. Suppose that his wages had risen from 5s. to 9s., and that as a pauper he received, by the parish allowance system now first introduced, 6s. a-week, he was still deficient 11s. 6d. as compared with his original condition when he had no parish allowance.

There was a rise also in artisan and manufacturing labour, between 1792 and 1801; but in a small proportion only to the rise in the prices of necessities. Various statements were put forth by different classes of artisans, setting forth the inadequateness of the rise of wages, including the most recent advance in 1801. Another statement was one from the journeymen tailors by which it appeared that their wages, from 1777 to 1797, had been £1 : 1 : 9 per week, which, at the price of 7s. for the quarter loaf, would purchase thirty-six loaves while the utmost advance of wages, which, in 1795, was to 25s., and, in 1801, to 27s. per week, would purchase only eighteen loaves and a half in the latter year.

statement from printers' compositors, whose weekly wages were advanced from 24s. to 27s. in 1795, and to 30s. in 1801, gives a similar proportion of the advance of wages to the rise of necessities.

By the Greenwich Hospital table, the wages of carpenters, bricklayers, masons, and plumbers, appeared to have experienced very little advance, according to the quotations of 1800, as compared with the twenty years preceding.

The expense of housekeeping, as shewn by a table kept by an inhabitant of Bury St Edmunds, rose, between 1773 and 1800, about 200 per cent., or in the net proportion of £8 : 4s. to £25 : 14 : 1½. Taxation had its share in this rise as well as the years of dearth. Prices fell in 1803 in consequence of better seasons, and instantly the alarmed landed interest stepped in, to secure, by statute, those high prices of which they had had a delicious foretaste, and which they could no longer obtain from panic and really deficient crops. A bill was brought in by Mr Western, and an act passed, by which a duty of 24s. 3d. per quarter was to be imposed when the price of wheat should be under 63s., certainly a very hopeful beginning.

Before 1812, Mr Tooke thinks wages had reached their maximum; but with the statements we have already given on his authority, and the tables of Greenwich Hospital, which we have quoted, he surely goes rather far in asserting that by that time—

The wages of agricultural labourers and artisans had been doubled, or nearly so; salaries, from the lowest clerks up to the highest functionaries, as well as professional fees, had been considerably raised, on the plea of the greatly increased expenses of living—the expense of living having been increased, not only by the increased price of necessities, but by a higher scale of general expenditure, or style of living, incidental to the progress of wealth and civilisation. Thus, upon the recurrence of the seasons of dearth, between 1808 and 1812, there was more of an adjustment, although still inadequate, of the pecuniary means of a large part of the different classes, which prevented so great a degree of the pressure of distress as had been observable in the previous scarcity.

But, while the wages of agricultural labourers and of artisans had been raised in a considerable, although still inadequate proportion to the increased price of necessities, this was not the case, or only partially so, as regarded the wages of the working people in manufactories. Considerable numbers of these had no advance of wages; or, if they had, the advance was more than compensated by reduced hours of work. In the branches of trade which were affected by the state of stagnation and discredit in 1810 and 1811, and in those which depended upon a demand for export, many workmen were thrown wholly out of employ. The distress, accordingly, among these classes, was very severe, and was the cause of considerable disturbances in the manufacturing districts.

Mr Tooke has a note here which is worthy of attention :—

Never was there a greater delusion than that which prevails under the influence of the currency theory, representing this period as one of great and increasing prosperity. It was, indeed, a period of agricultural prosperity, but of great privation and suffering to the bulk of the community.

Wages and salaries would, however, have required to have reached their maximum, or some high rate; for 1811, 1812, and the greater part of 1813, were years of exceeding dearth, though great improvements had now been made in agriculture, and a vast quantity of new land brought into tillage. Between 1795 and 1804, no fewer than 782 enclosure bills had passed; another bonus to the lords of the soil, who, directly or indirectly, first or last, have gotten the whole of such enclosures into their hands. In 1814, cattle and sheep were dearer than ever they had before been in this country, save for a few months during the starvation period of 1800—1801; but in 1815 they fell in price, and Mr, now Lord Western, again called piteously upon the legislature for protection! He has obtained it, in high duties upon salted meat, and by the absolute prohibition of the importation of fresh meat or live cattle.

Is it not melancholy to find any sensible writer subjected to the humiliation of propitiating ignorance and conceit, by averments like the following? Mr Tooke is speaking of the rapid reduction of prices from 1817 to 1819.

That the great mass of the community was greatly benefited by the transition from dearth to abundance, there is not, there cannot be any reasonable doubt. Indeed, to call it in question, and to suppose that war and dearth can be blessings, and peace and plenty curses, never entered into any imaginations but those which have bewildered themselves in the mazes of the currency theory, which supposes high prices and general prosperity to be convertible terms. What but the privations and sufferings of the great bulk of the community led to the popular discontents and commotions which prevailed, and were with difficulty repressed, in the great dearths at the close of the last and the beginning of the present century, and again in 1812, in 1817, and 1819?—dearths which, after their natural cessation, these legislators would, as far as in them lay, have artificially perpetuated; while, on the other hand, the contented state of the working classes in 1821 and 1822, and not to mention the great increase of the revenue in those years, attest the comparative well-being of the bulk of the community in periods of what those who are interested in high prices and high rents are pleased to characterise as agricultural distress.

In a note—and this work is peculiarly rich in admirable illustrative notes, gathered far and wide, in the course of many years' study—we find a striking passage, from a speech delivered by Lord Liverpool :—

When the Noble Earl (Stanhope) says that the low prices, incident to the distress which agriculture suffers, benefit no man, I answer, that, although I sincerely wish the distress did not exist, I cannot be blind to the fact that they certainly do benefit a great majority of the people. Do they not benefit the annuitant and mortgagee? who were, during the war, the principal, and almost the only sufferers. In all large towns, they have occasioned considerable benefit by the fall of the poor rates. I have been at some trouble, my Lords, to ascertain the real state of the case, and I can pledge myself to the accuracy of this statement. In this metropolis in which your Lordships are now sitting, never were the lower orders of the people in a better condition than they are at the present moment. So that, when the noble earl says that the low prices incident to the distress of the agriculturist have not been beneficial to anybody, he certainly labours under a great mistake; for that distress, however much to be lamented in itself, is accompanied by a considerable benefit to a great proportion of the people.

What an argument this for the abolition of the Corn-Laws! A little temporary distress to the whole agricultural body, above labourers—how richly would it be compensated “by a considerable benefit to the great body of the people!” The well-being and comfort of the millions, promoted at some small expense in wealth or luxury, to the thousands !

What is to ensure us this season (one more unfavourable than 1830-31) against the same disturbances which broke out then, and from the very same causes, which are stated by Mr Tooke to have been the high price of provisions, though the complaints were of the inadequateness of wages, which means the same thing in the long run—as learned economists truly tell us—though a poor man may perish while the abstract question is in course of adjustment? Let us here give one of Mr Tooke's maxims:—"According to all experience, whether within modern observation or recorded by history, it may be laid down as an established maxim, that labour is the last of the objects of exchange to rise in consequence of dearth or depreciation." So much for the labourers. Now for the farmers:—

That much farming capital has been lost by the pertinacity with which, in many instances, rents, calculated upon long periods of dearth, were maintained, after the return of abundance, and, its necessary consequence, cheapness, cannot admit of any reasonable doubt. But the most gross exaggeration has prevailed, in representing the farmers as being very generally in a greatly impoverished state. That many are so, where rents continue to be strained, may easily be supposed; but that they are generally so, may fairly be doubted—seeing the state of improved and improving cultivation; but more especially may it be questioned, upon the single fact of the large stocks of wheat held over of the crop of 1834.

In December 1835, wheat reached the lowest point of depression. It was about two-thirds cheaper then it is now, or not much less. It was 34s. 11d. for the Winchester quarter. Select Parliamentary Committees were instantly appointed by the Houses of landed legislators. Their proceedings were noticed in this Magazine at the time. They could not, by any art, make out a feasible case of distress. Mr Tooke says—

The tenor of the information elicited by these committees was little calculated to bear out the views of the persons who had moved for them. The consequence was, that no report could be agreed upon by either House; and the evidence only was laid upon the table of each House, and eventually published. It seems, however, that the chairman of the Commons' committee had prepared a report, which, not being palatable to the promoters of the ultra-agricultural claims, was negatived.

While prices were thus reasonable, owing to fruitful seasons, trade and manufactures were also brisk. Mr Tooke quotes the wages of cotton-spinners in 1833, which, in relation to the then prices of wheat and meat, certainly look high; but the foreign demand for cotton yarn, for some years back, makes the wages of this class of workers no fair criterion of general wages; and this, besides, was the most prosperous time of the spinners. We may remark the singular fact, that from 1831 to 1837, no foreign wheat was entered, save 150,000 quarters, and even that in consequence of the miscalculation of certain speculators. There were, in succession, six productive years, in which the native agriculturists had a virtual monopoly, an exclusive trade in corn; and yet, in the middle of that period, they cried out distress, and obtained Parliamentary Committees, though they were unable, with all appliances and means, to make out a plausible story, when they had got them. No Corn-Bill, or tax, or restriction on the importation of agricultural produce, can keep up prices in favourable seasons, to the desired pitch, though it is undeniable that they do keep them up.

Surely something more must be done for poor farmers, as a protection against good seasons, against too much warmth and sunshine, in our cloudy, humid island, and harvests too superabundant. Mr Tooke has not formally discussed the Corn-Laws, as an element affecting prices; and he reckons them, it would appear, of little if of any account. In his general summing up, he considers the causes of the comparatively low range of prices from 1814 to 1837, to be, first, a succession of very favourable seasons. From 1818 only, in five seasons, was the produce deficient; and, while agriculture was much improved at home, the bad seasons had not extended over Europe, as was the case at the end of the last, and the beginning of the present century. The reductions of freights and insurance, cheaper and more easy internal carriage, a rise of the foreign exchanges, the reduction in the price of all imported commodities, and of the rate of interest, with improvements in machinery, chemistry, and the arts in general, are, he conceives, enough to account satisfactorily for the lower prices, without, having recourse to the cessation of war-demand or the currency. As Mr Tooke's work appeared before the results of the last harvest could be known, we regret that we must go without the benefit of his opinion or speculations on the prospects of the opening year. Though gloomy apprehensions prevail, there were never more contradictory opinions afloat as to the relative productiveness of any harvest for forty years past.

We would recommend Mr Tooke's valuable work to all who are in pursuit of information upon the important subjects of which it treats; but especially to those who are mystified, perplexed, or wavering in their opinions on the currency question.

MRS TROLLOPE'S WIDOW BARNABY.*

Let us hope it may be something else than the mere corruption of human nature which makes us always relish the works of this shrewd and lively authoress best, when, as the Yankee book-seller phrased it, she "Trollopizes a bit." She is nothing if not satirical, or little more than the herd of ordinary fictionists; while, in her own peculiar walk of design, she approaches an H. B.

The Widow Barnaby's portraiture is no doubt exaggerated into extravagant caricature, despite which, we fear, there is strong, true, and staring resemblance. The Widow's coarse rouge, laid on as with a trowel, and her prodigality of false ringlets, do not more outrage nature than many traits of her character; yet the real woman is there: not that nature is ever chargeable with producing so thoroughly selfish, heartless, and audacious a piece of femininity, though a certain concurrence of circumstances does, in a vitiated society, tend to form female characters in many points strongly resembling that of Mrs Barnaby, with her low ambition, her paltry pride, her impudent and palpable dissimulation, her intense, mean selfishness, her brazen audacity, her cunning and quick wit, and her falsehoods, gross as the mother that bore them. The adventures of so odious a personage must be cleverly and skilfully managed to prevent fatigue and disgust in the reader, in spite of the constant efflux of the amusing or the broadly ludicrous. Without contrast and relief, it might not be easy to proceed far with the Widow Barnaby, as the key to her mean and vile character is obtained at once, instructively and divertingly as she is afterwards developed in many a well-imagined incident. The relief is found in the sentimental involvements and adventures of the widow's niece, Agnes Willeughby, a heroine of the shy, timid, and fascinating Evelina cast, with the beauty of an angel, the voice of a seraph, a fund of latent enthusiasm under the meekest, simplest guise, and the power of fascinating every creature that comes within the sphere of her varied attractions, save only the hard and brazen Barnaby. That matchless widow is, however, the true heroine of the piece, and we have neither eyes nor ears save for her.

Miss Martha Compton was the daughter of the curate, and the belle of the pretty town of Silverton, in Devonshire—a place which, during the war, was always blessed with the presence of a battalion of some infantry regiment. Balls, racketing, the mall in the morning, and eating queen-cakes and buns at the confectioner's, with flirtations, singing, the band, and such other diversions, were the order of every day; but one battalion followed another, while very few proposals were made, and the affectionate mother of Martha and her pretty sister Sophy was often sadly puzzled to obtain finery for "her dear girls." Wonderful were her shifts, more wonderful her invention, though both quailed before the superior genius of her elder daughter—the strapping, bright-eyed, high-complexioned, bold-spirited belle of Silverton—the future "Widow Barnaby." The most brilliant ball that ever had been imagined was at hand, and the affectionate mother set off in a hot sun, to beg a few pounds, to equip her girls, from their little, crooked, stingy, and rich old maiden aunt, Miss Betsy; who would not come down one farthing, but sent her nieces advice, that, if their dresses were so dirty and trumpery as their mother said, they had better avoid disgrace by staying at home.

Mrs Compton was proud of her daughters, and anxious for their establishment; and by "her needle and her shears," and stinting in every necessary—substituting brown sugar for white, and eating dinners of tripe thrice a-week, and lowering the quality of the home-brewed—she made the very most of an income of less than £400, and so contrived to obtain glazed calico slips, and long white gloves, with carnations for her dark beauty, and lilies of the valley for the pale one, to an extent that must have astonished many mothers. But, in prospect of the great ball, she was completely nonplussed by the point-blank refusal of that "ram's-horn, little, ugly, skin-flint sister-in-law, Betsy." Martha had a scheme of her own. "If I were you, mother, I would go to Smith's shop at once, and tell him confidentially that I want a little more credit till Christmas, when all should be settled." That would not do. Smith already held a doubtful bill of the curate's for thirty pounds; Smith would not again be caught napping in money matters;—and this produced Martha's debut as an intrepid swindler, keeping, however, without touch of the law. She sallied forth; repaired to that part of the little town where belles did most frequent, and red-coats congregate, in quest of Captain Tate, from whom she had parted only a half hour before.

Nor did she long wish in vain. When her tall person, straight ankles, and flashing eyes first entered upon the "High Street Parade," Captain Tate was swallowing the fourth spoonful of a raspberry ice; but, ere she had reached the middle of it, he was by her side.

"Oh! Captain Tate!" she exclaimed, with heightened colour and brightened eyes, "I did not expect to see you again this morning. I thought, for certain, you would be riding with the colonel, or the major, or some of them."

"Ah! Miss Martha! you don't know what it is to be ordered from quarters where—you don't know what it is to be torn heart and soul and body asunder, as I shall be in a few days—or you would not fancy one should be riding out of town, as long as one had the power of staying in it!"

"Oh, dear!—you won't mind it, I'm sure—you will like Plymouth quite as well—or perhaps better than you do Silverton:—we shall all remember you longer than you will remember us."

"Do not say so!—do not say so!—beautiful Martha!—you cannot think it."

"I'm sure I do," responded the young lady, with a very distinct sigh.

* London: Bentley. 3 vols.

It was exceedingly wrong in Captain Tate (yet all his family and intimate friends declared that he was as worthy a fellow as ever lived)—it was exceedingly wrong in him to offer his arm to Miss Martha the moment he heard this sigh: for in fact he was engaged to be married to his cousin, and the marriage ceremony was only deferred till he should be gazetted as a major; yet he scrupled not, as I have related, to offer his arm, saying, in a very soft and even tender accent—

"I know it is not the etiquette of dear, quiet little Silvertown, for the officers to offer their arms to the young ladies; but just at the last—at such a moment as this, not even the Lord Mayor of the town himself could think it wrong."

This reasoning seemed quite satisfactory; for Miss Martha's arm was immediately placed within his.

In this order they reached Smith's shop. Miss Martha took effectual care to shew that destined victim the terms on which she was with the stylish-looking officer, while she whispered of mull-muslin, and said, with an air of laughing embarrassment, and withdrawing her arm—

"Upon my word and honour, you must go, Captain Tate—I can no more buy anything while you stand talking to me than I can fly."

"Did not you promise me?" said the Captain, reproachfully, and not knowing what in the world to do with himself till it was time to dress.

"Yes, I know I did," she replied; "but the truth is," and she pressed both her hands upon her heart, and shook her head—"the thing is impossible. You must leave me, indeed!—we shall meet to-night at the Major's, you know—farewell!" and she stretched out her hand to him with a smile full of tender meaning.

The Captain looked rather puzzled, but fervently pressed her hand, and, saying "Au revoir then!" left the shop. The young lady looked after him for a moment, and then, turning to Mr Smith, with a look, a sigh, and a smile, not at all likely to be misunderstood, said—

"I suppose, Mr Smith, you have heard the news about me? There never was such a place for gossip as Silvertown."

And now Miss Martha became confidential with Smith. He saw how things stood. She wanted a few articles, on her own account, at this particular crisis, and Smith, careful tradesman as he was, could not resist a bride's appeal. "Was there ever such a girl!" cried her mother; and the Misses Compton were decidedly the best-dressed young ladies at the ball. Martha danced the last dance with Captain Tate, and the regiment marched for Exeter next morning. What could Smith do? She had been betrayed, jilted, monstrously used; but, after Martha had flirted with the officers of many other regiments, he was paid at last; for the handsome Miss Compton, now turned of thirty, deigned to accept the addresses of Mr Barnaby, the apothecary of Silvertown; and had, indeed, almost persuaded herself that it was nearly as good a thing to marry a middle-aged, country apothecary with a good house and a good income, as a beautiful young officer. In her maidenhood Smith had fought shy; but the lady of Mr Barnaby might now have had all the goods in his shop. Her feathers and frills were nowadays no sooner seen approaching any counter than all eyes and arms were in motion to serve Mrs Barnaby.

Any bride might have found matter for rejoicing in such a change; but few could have felt it so keenly as Mrs Barnaby. She was by nature both proud and ambitious, and her personal vanity, though sufficiently strong within her to form rather a conspicuous feature in her character, was, in truth, only a sort of petted imp that acted as an agent to assist in forwarding the hopes and wishes which her pride and ambition formed. . . . Mrs Barnaby burned with ambition to find herself in a situation that might authorize her giving herself the airs of a great lady; and her pride would have found all the gratification it sought, could she have been sure that her house and her dress would be daily cited among her acquaintance as more costly than their own.

Mrs Barnaby had, moreover, a fine natural genius for stratagem and manœuvring, which made her aim at accomplishing her objects by any means save the simple and natural.

Her bridal triumphs and little parties were cut short by the death of her mother, whose illness, of a whole week, proved rather troublesome to her daughter's excessive sensibility; and though it "was a blessing," and "a happy release," Mrs Barnaby also knew that mournings never became her, and that her white satin and silver fringe would be yellow before she could wear them again. Her father, the henpecked curate, followed next, and then, suddenly, "dear Barnaby," a worthy, kind-hearted man, who had been fond of his bride, who, though no longer so slender and delicate as she had once been, looked, with a slight tinge of rouge, giving brilliancy to her eyes, almost as handsome as ever; while the total absence of mauvaise honte, peculiar to the experienced belle of a well-officered country town, had enabled her to preside at his supper parties, and act her part as bride, with a brilliancy which he had felt truly fascinating. He was, indeed, as his widow declared, "a perfect model of a husband," and made "such a fuss about her"—"quite spoiled her." Mrs Barnaby was really sorry for the death of her husband; and, between the death and interment, wept often, and with little or no effort; but she was not a woman long to despise the goods the gods provided. She was left sole executrix and legatee; and, proud and happy as she thought of her independence and wealth, she resolved to make good and immediate use of both. Never had her temper been so amiably placid, so caressingly kind, as in the first month of her widowhood; and, while she lamented her "dear lost Barnaby," she vowed to be a mother to his adopted child, the orphan daughter of her own sister, Sophy. The girl had been educated in a respectable clergyman's family, at the expense of that "little, crooked, miserly monster," Aunt Betsy. It was solely for the sake of her dear niece, Agnes, that Mrs Barnaby resolved to give up "the tranquil consolations of retirement," to go out into the world, yea, to lay aside her weeds, and introduce her niece into society in the manner she was entitled to expect. Agnes was sincere and straight-forward, yet she knew she must not give voice to the thought—"Pray don't pretend to lay aside your weeds for me; I don't believe you half so sorry for uncle Barnaby's death as I am;" and she only said "You are very kind, aunt."

By managing the young man who wished to succeed to "dear Barnaby's" business, the clever widow contrived to realize an income of £4 a-year from funded property—a handsome, if not large income—"which, with my person, if properly made use of, may lead to all I wish." She was resolved to marry high and fashionably, and to marry soon; and for neither was Silverton the proper place, nor her hatefully unbecoming weeds the proper dress. Dear Barnaby had a sister, Mrs Peters, moving in genteel life at Clifton; but it was impossible to appear at Clifton until the proper time for "lilacs and greys" had arrived. She, therefore, fixed on Exeter as her place of coming-out, but by no means of residence. She engaged as a "my maid" a gawky, charity-school girl, recommended by her great height, whose name of Betty Jacks she changed to Jerningham. Herself and Agnes inside the stage-coach, and "my maid" on the top, travelled forthwith to Exeter, where she endeavoured to astonish the head-waiter and chamber-maid of the hotel, by acting the part of "a real grand lady;" but the thing would not take. Smart Mrs Tompkins' first floor-lodging was secured, with a garret for Jerningham, for three months; by which time Widow Barnaby had resolved to leave off both greys and lavender. She knew not a soul in Exeter; yet was determined to make her way into its beau monde—not, indeed, as an apothecary's widow. To her landlady she told that her name was

"Barnaby!" with an emphasis that gave much dignity to the name. "I am the widow of a gentleman of large fortune in the neighbourhood of Silverton, and finding the scene of my lost happiness too oppressive to my spirits, I am come to Exeter with my niece, and only one lady's-maid to wait upon us both, that I may quietly pass a few months in comparative retirement before I join my family and friends in the country, as their rank and fortune naturally lead them into more gaiety than I should at present like to share."

Once rid of her "nasty gown and hideous cap," she had no fears; and she disdained all Silverton introductions.

"There can be no use, Mrs Tompkins," said the doleful widow, "do you think there can—in my going on wearing this dismal dress, that almost breaks my heart every time I look at myself?—It is very nearly six months now since my dear Mr Barnaby died, and I believe people of fashion never wear first mourning longer." Mr Barnaby, however, had been alive and well exactly three months after the period named by his widow as that of his death; and that, too, Mrs Tompkins knew as well as she did; but Mrs Tompkins's sister was a milliner, and family affection being stronger within her than any abstract love of propriety, she decidedly voted for laying aside the weeds immediately, there being "no yearly rent," as she well observed, "in any woman's going on breaking her heart by looking at herself in the glass." So the sister was sent for, and after a long consultation in the widow's bed-room, it was decided that the following Sunday should send her to the cathedral in a black silk dress, with lavender-coloured bonnet, fichu, gloves, mûcle, and so forth.

Some reason was yet to be given to Agnes for this breach of decorum; and the widow declared that, though mourning suited her niece very well, the sight of it on herself made her perfectly wretched. Thank God! no one in Exeter knew her; and it was like rebellion against the arrangements of Providence to punish herself with weeds.

"The dress of a widow is indeed very sad to look upon; no one can doubt that, Aunt Barnaby."

"Good Heaven!—then you also suffer from the sight of it, my poor child!—Poor dear Agnes! I ought to have thought of this before;—but I will wound your young heart no longer. This week shall end a suffering so heavy, and so unnecessary for us both; and I trust you will never forget what you owe me."

The widow kept her word, and was soon seen flaring-up in all the colours of the rainbow. It was a maxim with Mrs Barnaby, that nothing makes so great a difference in a lady's dress "as a profusion of good work;" so, when not parading the streets, or shewing off her finery in church, as Agnes could not do satin-stitch, her education having been, in this accomplishment, entirely neglected, the widow plied her own needle on collars, and cuffs, and pocket-handkerchiefs.

Agnes, in her weary existence, durst not speak of the hire of a piano-forte; but she took courage one day to ask if she might not go on with her French and Italian, while her aunt was at work. She was afraid, she said, that she might forget all she had learned.

"I am sure I hope not, and it will be very stupid and very wicked of you, Agnes, if you do. Your teaching is all we ever got out of that hunch-backed Jesabel of an aunt; and you must always recollect, you know, that it is very possible you may have to look to this as your only means of support. I am sure I am excessively fond of you, I may say passionately attached to you—it is quite impossible you can ever deny that; but yet we must neither of us ever forget that it is likely enough I may marry again, and have a family; and in that case, my dear, much as I love you, (and my disposition is uncommonly affectionate,) it will be my bounden duty to think of my husband and children, which would probably make it necessary for you to go out as a governess or teacher at a school. . . . I must say it was a most abominable shame in that Mrs Wilmot not to teach you satin-stitch, which, after all, is the only really lady-like way in which a young woman can assist in maintaining herself. Just look at this collar, Agnes;—the muslin did not cost sixpence—certainly not more than sixpence, and I'd venture to say that I could not get the fellow of it in any shop in Exeter for two guineas.—It is long before French, or Italian either, will bring such a per-centage as that."

The three months allotted to the intermediate state of Exeter, wore away, and Mrs Barnaby had made no acquaintances, save her dress-maker. But her wardrobe, her embroidery, were all ready for display at Clifton; and Betty Jacks, alias Jerningham, with her mistress's cast finery, and her two pounds a-year of wages, had learned to iron out tumbled dresses, and look like a disreputable young woman. Before the widow made her next grand move, an elaborate epistle was indited to her "dear unknown sister Margaret," her "lost Barnaby's" sister, whose friendship was her only glimpse of earthly comfort.

"My lost Barnaby's sister! Beloved Margaret! So let me call you, for so have I been used to hear you called by HIM! Beloved Margaret! Let me hope that from you, and your charming family, I shall find the sympathy and affection I so greatly need."

"Your admirable brother—my lost but never-to-be-forgotten husband—was as successful as he deserved to be in the profession of which he was the highest ornament, and left an ample fortune—the whole of which, as you know, he bequeathed to me with a confidence and liberality well befitting the perfect, the matchless love which united us. But, alas! my sister, Providence denied us a pledge of this tender love; and where, then, can I so naturally look for the ultimate possessors of his noble fortune as amongst your family? I have one young niece, still almost a child, whom I shall bring with me to Clifton. But, though I am passionately attached to her, my sense of justice is too strong to permit my ever suffering her claims to interfere with those more justly founded. When we become better acquainted, my dearest Margaret, you will find that this sense of what is right is the rule and guide of all my actions; and I trust you will feel it to be a proof of this, that my style and manner of living are greatly within my means. In fact, I never cease to remember, dear sister, that, though the widow of my poor Barnaby, I am the daughter of the well-born but most unfortunate clergyman of Silverton, who was obliged to sell his long-descended estate in consequence of the treachery of a friend who ruined him. Thus, while the high blood which flows in my veins teaches me to do what is honourable, the unexpected poverty which fell upon my own family makes me feel that there is more real dignity in living with economy, than in spending what my confiding husband left at my disposal, and thus putting it out of my power to increase it for the benefit of his natural heirs.

"This will, I hope, explain to you satisfactorily my not travelling with my own carriage, and my having no other retinue than one lady's-maid. Alas! it is not in pomp or parade that a truly widowed heart can find consolation!

"Let me hear from you, my dear sister, and have the kindness to tell me where you think I had better drive, on arriving at Clifton."

The reader now begins to have a notion of Widow Barnaby. Simple Mr Peters, a wealthy Bristol clothier, was enchanted; while his shrewd, lively little lady read the epistle, and saw the whole case at a glance. The letter was canvassed at the breakfast-table, by an amiable and well-bred set of young people, after it had been read aloud by the son, who, as he proceeded very demurely, often sent laughing glances to his mother.

"That's an aunt worth having, isn't it?" said old Peters, standing up, and taking his favourite station on the hearth-rug, with his back to the grate, though no fire was in it.—"Now I hope we shall have no airs and graces, because she comes from a remote part of the country, but that you will one and all do your best to make her see that you are worthy of her favour."

"I will do all I can to shew myself a dutiful and observant nephew.—But don't you think, sir, that 'the lady doth protest too much'?"

"Oh! but she'll keep her word," replied his mother, laughing.

"Keep her word?—to be sure she will, poor lady! She is broken-hearted and broken-spirited, as it's easy to see by her letter," observed the worthy Mr Peters; "and I do hope, wife, that you will be very kind to her."

"And where shall I tell her to drive, Mr Peters?"

"To the York Hotel, my dear, I should think."

"Do you know that I rather fancy she expects we should ask her to come here?"

"No!—Well, that did not strike me. Let me see the letter again.—But it's no matter; whether she does or does not, it may be quite as well to do it;—and she says she likes to save her money, poor thing."

The father and son then set off to walk to Bristol, and Mrs Peters and her three daughters were left to sit in judgment on the letter, and then to answer it.

Mrs Barnaby cunningly put away all her greys, lavenders, and pink-whites on her first appearance before "Beloved Margaret."

"My life passes, Agnes, in a constant watchfulness of the feelings of others.—It was for your sake, dear girl, that I so early put off this sad attire, and the fear of wounding the feelings of my dear sister-in-law now induces me to resume it, for a few days at least, that she may feel I come to find my first consolation from her!"

"Shew me to my sister!" said the widow, as soon as she had counted all her own packages; and with a cambric handkerchief, without an atom of embroidery, in her hand, her voice ready to falter, her knees to tremble, and her tears to flow, she followed the servant up stairs.

Mrs Peters came very decorously forward to meet her, but she was, perhaps, hardly prepared for the very long embrace in which her unknown sister held her. Mrs Peters was a very little woman, and was almost lost to sight in the arms and the draperies of the widow; but when at last she was permitted to emerge, Agnes was cheered and greatly comforted by the pleasing reception she gave her."

Mrs Peters shewed her sister-in-law to the door of her chamber at the hour of retiring, but was not permitted to escape without another sisterly embrace, and being held by the hand until the widow delivered a very long speech, ending thus:—

"I so much wish you to understand me, dearest sister!—I so long to have my heart appreciated by you!—Step in for one moment, will you?"—And the request was seconded by a gentle pulling, which sufficed to bring the imprisoned Mrs Peters safely within the door.—"I cannot part with you till I have explained a movement—a rush of sentiment I may call it—that has come upon me since I entered this dear dwelling. The time is come, is fully come, you know, when fashion dictates the laying aside this garb of woe; and as my excellent mother brought me up in all things respectfully to follow the usages of society, I have been struggling to do so in the present instance, and have actually already furnished myself with a needful change of apparel—never yet, however, dearest Margaret!"—and here she pressed her handkerchief to the eyes—"never yet have I had the courage to wear it. But, thank Heaven! I now feel strengthened, and when we meet to-morrow you shall see the influence the sight of you and your dear family has had upon me. And now, good night, my sister!—I will detain you no longer; but do explain to your charming family, dear Margaret! how this sudden change in my appearance has been wrought.—Good night! But where is Agnes?—Poor love! she will not sleep, even in your elegant mansion, till she has received my parting kiss. She perfectly dotes upon me!—Will you have the kindness to let her be sent to me?"

Next morning Jerningham underwent a strict catechising about the style of the family. There was a footman to be sure, and also a coachman, and a world of maids, and everything elegant.

"I dare say it is, Jerningham; and you must be very careful to keep up your own consequence, and mine too, in such a house as this. You understand me, Jerningham: I have already, you remember, given you some hints. You have not forgotten, I hope?"

"No, that I haven't, ma'am," replied the girl; "and—I mean to tell 'em"—But looking at Agnes, she stopped short, as it seemed, because she was there.

"Very well, that's quite right, and I'll give you these gloves of mine. Mend them neatly to-morrow morning, and never be seen to go out without gloves, Jerningham."

Observe, Agnes, I have explained to my sister all my feelings about my mourning, and you must take care to let the young people understand that you keep on with crape and bombasin some time longer, because you like it best.—And, by-the-by, I may as well tell you at once, my dear, that as you look so particularly well in deep mourning, and are so fond of wearing it, you had better not think of a change for some time to come. I am sorry to tell you, my dear, that I find everything as I come up the country a vast deal indeed dearer than I expected, and therefore it will be absolutely necessary to save every penny I can. Now the fact is, that my mourning has been taken so much care of, and altogether so little worn, that the best gown is very nearly as good as new, and the worst has still a deal of wear left in it. So, I think the best thing we can do, Agnes, is to have both of them made up to fit you, that is, when your own are quite worn out;—and my bonnets, too, if I can teach Jerningham to wash the crape nicely in a little small beer, they will come out looking quite like new,—and they are so becoming to you!—and, in this way you see, my dear, a great many pounds may be saved.”

“Thank you, aunt,” meekly replied Agnes.

“Well, there’s a good girl; go to bed now, and be sure to make the young ladies understand that you go on with crape and bombasin because you like it.”

And so poor Agnes goes on, until her deliverance comes, to wear her generous aunt’s cast-off mourning, because it so particularly became her, and she had such a fancy, her aunt affirmed, to go in black. The clever, impetuous, and sincere little Mrs Peters contrived to get rid of her gigantic painted and plumaged sister-in-law next morning, and Widow Barnaby settled in pretty lodgings, where there was a closet in which Agnes—dear privilege!—could be alone. “For her niece’s sake” Mrs Barnaby subscribed to the library, and went to balls; and, with the occasional use of the Peters’ carriage, and Mrs Peters’ fashion and knowledge of life, fancied she had opened the Clifton campaign with great advantage. Her first promenade—taken with Elizabeth Peters, who, unlike her sisters, persisted in believing “Aunt Barnaby” a good kind of person, who meant to leave them her great fortune, and to whom they were very ungrateful—shewed her a gentleman, “tall, stout, gaily dressed, fully moustached, and with an eye that looked as if accustomed to active service in reconnoitering all things.” He bowed to Miss Peters. He was Major Allen, and the Widow declared him, “upon her honour,” a very fine, fashionable man. He kept, she learned from Miss Peters, a horse and groom, was no dancer, but played cards. “Then of course he cannot be a poor man,” said Widow Barnaby, who was disposed to lose no time. Nor was the bold and dashing Major Allen at all indifferent, though he liked to be sure. Mrs Barnaby having dipped deep in the books of a remarkably well-bred, obliging milliner, appeared at her first ball in much grander style than she had ever appeared before. Her blonde, her rouge, her feathers, her ringlets, and her scarf of real French blonde, cost hours in arranging, while poor Agnes looked, in five minutes, like an angel, in a crape robe, fashioned, by her own taste and industry, out of the widow’s old flounces. At the ball, the dashing Major Allen managed to have a little conversation with simple Elizabeth Peters, while she was separated by an accident from her party:—

“Good evening, Miss Elizabeth. You are just arrived, I presume. An excellent ball, is it not? I told you it would be. What an exceedingly fine woman your aunt is, Miss Peters! It is your aunt, I think?”

“Yes, our aunt, certainly; the widow of my mother’s brother, Major Allen.”

“Ay, I understood she was your aunt. She is a woman of large fortune, I hear?”

“Yes, very large fortune.”

“But she is in lodgings, is she not? She does not seem to have taken the whole house.”

“Oh, no; only quite small lodgings: but she does not spend the third of her income, nor near it.”

“Really?—then, I suppose, handsome as she is, that she is a little in the skin-flint line, eh?” and here the Major shewed his horse-like teeth by a laugh.

The Major put several more fishing questions. The property of the widow he ascertained was real, not income. He contrived to be introduced, and got the widow, with small difficulty, to allow him to make up a card-table. She protested prettily against high play—but, “at the table, Major Allen should have the honour of forming for Mrs Barnaby, the stakes were to be of her own fixing.”

“Ah! sure a pair were never seen,
So justly formed to meet by nature,” said the lively little Mrs Peters, as he led off the widow. And, as they gently won their way, thus they talked—

“And what may be the stake Mrs Barnaby permits herself?” said the Major, bending forward to look into the widow’s eyes.

“Very low, I assure you, Major!” replied the lady, with a wave of the head that sent her plumes to brush the hirsute magnificence of his face.

“Shorts and crown points, perhaps?” rejoined the Major, agreeably refreshed by the delicate fanning he had received.

“Oh, fie, Major! How can you suspect me of such extravagance? No, believe me, I know too well how to use the blessings of wealth to abuse them by playing so high as that. But, I believe, gentlemen think that nothing?”

“Why, no, my dear madam, I cannot say that men—that is, men of a certain fashion and fortune—think much of crown points. For my own part, I detest gambling, though I love whist, and never care how low I play—though, occasionally, when I get into a certain set, I am obliged to give way a little; but I never exceed five-pound points, and twenty on the rubber.”

Widow Barnaby was not to be easily done. She was the Major’s match, yet not, as it proved, a match for the Major. By means of Jerningham—fee’d with “the cap I wore yesterday, with the pink ribbons”—she instituted a prudent inquiry as to the means, fortune, and prospects of handsome Major Allen. They were ample, noble. William, his groom, vouched for it; and the Major soon afterwards related to the widow his own strange eventful history; while, in return, Mrs Barnaby gave him the tender confidence of her lonely heart, on the very day following the ball. On that happy morning, he did not arrive till the widow—properly dressed and set out, her pink-lined work-box open, and her album and her annuals displayed—had for three full minutes expected him:—

“I need not ask my charming Mrs Barnaby how she rested after her ball. Eyes do not sparkle thus, unless they have been blessed with sleep.” And the lady’s hand was taken, bowed upon, and the tips of her fingers kissed, before she had quite recovered the soft embarrassment his entrance had occasioned.

“You are very kind to call upon me, Major Allen. Do sit down! I live as yet, comparatively, in great retirement; for, during Mr Barnaby’s lifetime, we saw an immense deal of company—that old-fashioned sort of country visiting, you know, that never leaves one’s house empty. I could not stand it when I was left alone; and that was the reason I left my beautiful place.”

“Siverton or Silvertown Park, was it not? I think I have heard of it.”

“Yes, Silvertown. And do you know, Major, that the remembrance of all that racket and gaiety was so oppressive to my nerves, during the first months of my widowhood, that I threw off everything that reminded me of it—sold my carriages and horses—let my place—turned off all my servants—and, positively, when I set off for this place in order to see my sister Peters and her family, I knew not if I should ever have strength or spirits to enter into general society again."

"Thank God, dearest madam, that you have made the effort! Though the hardened and war-worn nature of man cannot melt with all the softness of yours, there is yet within us a chord that may be made to vibrate in sympathy when words of true feeling reach it! How well I understood your feelings! and how difficult it is not to envy, even in death, the being who has left such a remembrance behind! But we must not dwell on this. Tell me, dear Mrs Barnaby—tell, as to a friend who understands and appreciates you, do you regret the having left your elegant retirement? Or do you feel, as I trust you do, that Providence has not gifted you so singularly for nothing? Do you feel that your fellow-creatures have a claim upon you, and that it ought not to be in secret and in solitude that the hours of such a being should be spent? Tell me, do you feel this?"

"Alas! Major Allen, there is so much weakness in the heart of a woman, that she is hardly sure for many days together how she ought to feel. We are all impulse, all soul, all sentiment; and our destiny must ever depend upon the friends we meet in our passage through this thorny world."

"Beautiful idea! Where is the poet that has more sweetly painted the female heart? And what a study it offers when such a heart is thrown open to one! Good God! to see a creature so formed for enjoyment—so beaming with innocent cheerfulness—so rich in the power of conferring happiness wherever she deigns to smile—to see such a being turn weeping and alone from her hospitable halls, and from all the pomp and splendour that others cling to! What a spectacle! Have you no lingering regret, dearest lady, for having left your charming mansion?"

"Perhaps there are moments—or rather, I should say, perhaps there have been moments—when something of the kind has crossed me. But if I had not disposed of my place I should never have seen Clifton. My spirits wanted the change, and I feel already better in this delightful air. But, I confess, I do regret having sold my beautiful greys. I shall never meet any I like so well again."

"A set, were they?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Four greys—and all well matched?"

"Perfectly! Poor Mr Barnaby took so much pains about it. It was his delight to please me. I ought not to have sold them."

"It was a pity!" said the kind Major, with a sigh.

"Don't talk about it, Major Allen!" And here one of the widow's most curiously embroidered pocket-handkerchiefs, delightfully scented with musk, was lightly and carefully applied to her eyes.

This is quite enough. We touch not on the Major's romantic Spanish adventures. The loves so auspiciously begun, flourished more and more, until one day, in badinage, the enamoured Major, being, lover-like, doubtful of his happiness, and wishing to make assurance doubly sure, pleaded for a written promise of the felicity already a million times pledged. The widow playfully demanded a similar proof of eternal fidelity, which was frankly and gallantly accorded. Late, very late, one night soon after this, when Mrs Barnaby returned from a party at the Peterses, who, detesting her bold vulgarity and audacious pretensions, were yet compelled to invite her for the sake of pretty Agnes, Jerningham was found from home—that favourite "my maid," whose talents for flattering and espionage now made her a person of consequence with her mistress. Hours passed, Jerningham did not appear, and Mrs Barnaby discovered that she had been robbed—her money, her forks, her spoons, her cream-jug, and mustard-pot!—ruined, robbed!

Mr Peters found that the delinquents were Jerningham and William, Major Allen's groom; and, horror of horrors! the officers also dragged forward before Widow Barnaby and the bench of magistrates, not indeed Major Allen, but his faithful friend, Captain Maintry, he who had told her of Allen's large estates in Yorkshire, and who was found to be the accomplice of William, the groom, in the robbery. Horror of horrors! The widow recovered her money, her forks, and spoons; but how was she to get back that fatal promise of marriage, which the gallant Major, now at Bath, had safely in his possession? At the worst, she was not so foolish as to expose herself. When her business before the Bristol magistrates was done—

Mr Peters offered his arm to lead her out, and, with a dash of honest triumph at having so ably managed matters, said, "Well, madam, I hope you are pleased with the termination of this business?"

What a question for Mrs Barnaby to answer! Pleased! Was she pleased? Pleased at having every reason in the world to believe that she had given a promise of marriage to the friend and associate of a common thief! But the spirit of the widow did not forsake her; and, after one little hysterical gasp, she replied by uttering a thousand thanks, and a million assurances that nothing could possibly be more satisfactory.

At Bath, the Major, who could be very frank with his particular friends and associates in certain little matters, was one evening boasting of his late conquest—"Mrs Barnaby of Silverton Park." A young man present knew very well Mrs Barnaby, the widow of the Silverton apothecary. The Major took alarm. The park, the four beautiful greys had vanished, and he did not give himself time to reflect if anything solid remained behind them.

To say the truth, he rated his own price in the matrimonial market rather highly—had great faith in the power of his height and fashionable tournure, and confidence unbounded in his large eyes and collier Grec. It is true, indeed, that he had failed more than once, and that, too, "when the fair cause of all his pain" had given him great reason to believe that she admired him much; nevertheless, his self-approval was in no degree lessened thereby, nor was it likely to be so long as he could oil and trim his redundant whiskers without discovering a grey hair in them.

How was he to get back the promise of marriage? It was the very idea which occupied the widow; and the thing was managed in an admirably comic scene. Mrs Barnaby vowed that he might have shewn, given, her weak, fond, promise, in jest, to some rival.

"Good Heaven!" he replied, "what a moment have you chosen for the expression of this cruel suspicion! I was on the very verge of telling you that I had deemed such a promise unworthy a love so pure, so perfect as ours; and, therefore, if you would indulge my fond desire, you would let each of us receive our promise back again."

The Major was really and truly in a state of the most violent perturbation as he uttered these words, fearing that the fond and jealous widow might suspect the truth, and hold his pledge with a tenacity beyond his power to conquer. He had, however, no sooner spoken, than a smile of irrepressible delight banished the frowns in which she had dressed herself; and she uttered, in a voice of the most unaffected satisfaction, "If you will really do that, Major Allen, I can't suspect any longer, you know, that you have given mine to any one else."

"Assuredly not, most beautiful angel!" cried the delighted lover; "thus, then, let us give back these paper ties, and be bound only by!"

The widow stretched out her hand for the document which he had already taken from his pocket-book; but to yield this, though he had no wish to keep it, was not the object nearest his heart; holding it, therefore, playfully above his head, he said, "Let not one of us, dearest, seem more ready than the other in this act of mutual confidence!—give mine with one hand as you receive your own with the other."

"Now, then!" said Mrs Barnaby, eagerly extending both her hands, in order at once to give and take.

"Now, then!" replied the Major joyously, imitating her action; and the next instant each had seized the paper held by the other with an avidity greatly resembling that with which a zealous player pounces upon the king when she has the ace in hand at "shorts."

"Now, Mrs Barnaby, I will wish you good morning," said the gentleman, bowing low as he tore the little document to atoms. "I have been fortunate enough, since I last enjoyed the happiness of seeing you, to discover the exact locality of Silverton Park, and the precise pedigree of your beautiful greys."

The equanimity of the widow was shaken for a moment, but no longer; she, too, had been doing her best to annihilate the precious morsel of paper; and, rising majestically, she scattered the fragments on the ground, saying, in a tone at least as triumphant as his own, "And I, Major Allen, or whatever else your name may chance to be, have, since last I had the felicity of seeing you, enjoyed the edifying spectacle of beholding your friend Captain Maintry, alias Purdham, in the hands of justice, for assisting your faithful servant William in breaking open my boxes and robbing me. Should the circumstance be still unknown to you, I fear you may be disappointed to hear that both my money and plate have been recovered. There may be some fanciful difference between Silverton Park and a snug property at Silverton; but I rather suspect that, of the two, I have gained most by our morning's work. Farewell, sir! If you will take my advice, you will not continue much longer in Clifton. I may feel myself called upon to hint to the magistrates that it might assist the ends of justice if you were taken up and examined as an accomplice in this affair."

The lady had decidedly the best of it, as ladies always should have.

From the time of Major Allen's perfidy, Bristol and all that it contained of "nasty, vulgar, and merchandizing," became hateful to the Widow. She had been bound over to prosecute Betty Jacks, which she felt would be awkward and inconvenient. For this and other good reasons, she resolved to shift the scene to Cheltenham, to take higher ground, to dash out, to give parties, which the unexpected discovery that Agnes had a superb voice, would be sure to render fashionable and attractive. Instead of the lost Jeringham, she resolved to engage a tiger; and Agnes, besides being prima donna at the musical parties, which were to bring all "the best men" to the feet of the widow, was to perform the part of lady's maid.

Behold the widow installed in a boarding-house at Cheltenham, with a separate drawing-room and a tiger, waited upon by the medical men, and compelling Agnes, who, she affirmed, was very bilious, to drink the nauseous waters that she might have an excuse for shewing her own person and morning dresses at the pump-room and promenade, without swallowing the bitter draught herself. In the boarding house, Mrs Barnaby made the acquaintance of an exceedingly obliging Miss Morrison, an old maiden, and a regular visiter to Cheltenham, who was up to everything, in customs, manners, and characters belonging to the town, and who, the widow having first confessed, in strict confidence, that she did wish to change her state, gave her a catalogue raisonnée of the most eligible marriageable men of the season, with the best idea of their rents and expectancies which her industry could obtain. Mrs Barnaby assured her dear new friend that it was not for fortune she wished to marry, her own being amply sufficient for every luxury.

"But a widowed heart, my dear Miss Morrison—a widowed heart is a heavy load to bear, where the temper, like mine, is full of the softest sensibility and all the tenderest affections. Therefore, as I said, it is my wish to marry again; but God forbid I should be weak and wicked enough to do so in any way unbecoming my station in society—a station to which I have every right, as well from birth as fortune. No attachment, however strong, will ever induce me to forget what I owe to my family and to the world; and unless circumstances shall enable me rather to raise than debase myself in society, I will never, whatever my feelings may be, permit myself to marry at all."

Widow Barnaby's first great conquest was made in the sale-room. It was a flight beyond all her former imaginings. The wit of the auctioneer had afforded her an opportunity of being so energetic and animated that more than one eye-glass was levelled at the dashing newcomer; and—

The more the gentlemen and ladies looked at her, the more Mrs Barnaby talked and laughed; the more the gentlemen and ladies looked at her. Flattered, fluttered, and delighted beyond measure, the eyes of the widow wandered to every quarter of the room; and, for some time, every quarter of the room appeared equally interesting to her; but at length her attention was attracted by the almost fixed stare of an individual who stood in the midst of a knot of gentlemen at some distance, but nearly opposite to the place she occupied.

"Can you tell me, sir, who that tall, stout gentleman is in the green frock-coat, with lace and tassels? That one who is looking this way with an eye-glass?"

"The gentleman with red hair?" returned Mr Patterson, to whom the question was addressed.

"Yes, that one, rather sandy, but a very fine-looking man."

"That is Lord Mucklebury, Mrs Barnaby. He is a great amateur of beauty; and, upon my word, he seems exceedingly taken with some fair object or other in this part of the room."

The sight of land after a long voyage is delightful; rest is delightful after labour, food after fasting; but it may be doubted if either of these joys could bear comparison with the emotion that now swelled the bosom of Mrs Barnaby. This was the first time, to the best of her knowledge and belief, that she had ever been looked at by a lord at all—and what a look it was!

One proof of the youthful freshness of her emotion was the very naive manner in which it was betrayed. She could not sit still; her eyes rose and fell, her head turned and twisted, her reticule opened and shut; and the happy man who set all this going must have had much less experience than my Lord Mucklebury, if he had not immediately perceived the effect of himself and his eye-glass.

"Singleton," said his Lordship to his ever-useful friend, Captain Singleton, "go and find out who that great woman is, in the green satin and pink feathers." The person interrogated by Captain Singleton, was so provoking as not to know.—"Gracious heaven! how provoking!" murmured Widow Barnaby; "he will leave the room without finding out my name." The unsuccessful messenger returned, and, for a few minutes more, the amused Peer continued his fascinating gaze.

And then, giving a signal with his eye to Singleton, that it was his pleasure to move, that active personage cleared the way before him; and the fat viscount, with his hands in his waistcoat-pockets, stalked out of the room, but not without turning his head, and giving one bold, final, open-eyed, steady look at the agitated widow.

"That man is my fate!" she softly whispered to her soul, as the last frog on the hinder part of his coat has passed from her eye.

They next met at a ball, where Lord Mucklebury, after staring at the widow with marked impertinence, begged to be presented, and forthwith placed himself on the sofa beside her, where, for full twenty minutes, he talked in a style which lapped her in Elysium. He then joined a group of fashionable men, who stood in a corner, quizzing the company, after the approved good custom of many high-bred persons. "Who and what is she, in God's name?" said one.

"Who is she? Barnaby! Bless her!—Miss Barnaby! What is she? A widow—darling creature! A widow, fair, fat, and forty—most fat!—most fair! and, oh! a pigeon, a dove, a very turtle-dove for kindness!"

"She is really handsome, though; isn't she, Mucklebury?" said one.

"Yes, upon my soul she is!" replied the Viscount more seriously, "and bears looking at too remarkably well, notwithstanding the pot-full of coarse rouge that it pleases her to carry about on each of her beautiful cheeks. . . . The history of our loves was in this wise. It is said of me—I know not how truly—that my taste in beauty tends somewhat towards the Blowzabella order. Be this as it may, it is certain that yesterday morning, between the hours of two and three, being actively employed for the good of myself and my country in Johnson's sale-room, I felt myself penetrated, perforated, pierced, and transfixed by the very bright eyes of this remarkable lady; whereupon, overpowering my constitutional timidity, Digby, I fixed my regards, eye-glass and all, upon her; but the result was astonishing. Did any of you, gentlemen, ever happen to watch the effect of the sun's rays when thrown upon some soft substance (a pound of butter for example) through the medium of a burning-glass?"

While the gentlemen were thus merry, the widow was in the third heavens. The flashy compliments and audacious eyes of the Peer, had already given birth to the most sanguine hopes, and the firmest intentions of Mrs Barnaby becoming Viscountess Mucklebury. But, in her wildest delirium of ambition, the widow never forgot the main chance, and the result of inquiry was perfectly satisfactory. His Lordship was a widower, as capable of settling a good jointure "as a widow's heart could wish."

Were the point submitted to us, of whether the fortune-hunter Major Allen, or the gay man, "in every sense of the word," Lord Mucklebury, were the greatest scamp, we should, as is always right, where it is possible, certainly give judgment in favour of the Peer; who fancied the best privilege of the aristocracy, the leisure which they had for amusing themselves; and who, to an aptitude at probing the absurdities of his fellow-creatures, joined a most unshrinking audacity in exposing them. With Mrs Barnaby he was most successful. She, indeed, did more than half the business herself. The Widow was playing for no ordinary stake. She consulted with Miss Morrison, and engaged, for the season, a carriage, a footman, and a lady's-maid. Stock and more stock was sold, and the widow was at the high-topgallant of her hopes. One of the facetious Peer's modes of extracting amusement out of the widow, was writing her notes, which drew forth answers that threw him into ecstasy, and which he carefully preserved, to share with his friends under the title of "The Barnaby Papers." This went on for a few weeks, the Peer fooling the widow to the top of her bent, until the time arrived for his departure, and when his collection of "Barnaby Papers" was full enough even for his taste. He parted with her, on a Saturday night, with a thousand expressions of passionate admiration; protesting that he would be early on the walk, to look for her, next day. During the whole of that black Sunday, the widow, who had ordered yet another new bonnet, and another richly laced mantlet, roamed the public walks, "like a turtle whose mate had been shot;" and, sad, cross, tender, and angry by turns, it was not till the following Wednesday, that she learned from a London paper, that "the noble Viscount was about to set off for the Continent, and to spend the winter in Rome; but rather with the intention of kissing the hands of the beautiful Lady M—— S——, than the toe of his Holiness."

"Mong Dew!" exclaimed the confidential Miss Morrison, whose cue is to speak a mongrel dialect of French, or rather of French phrases.

"Gracious heaven! What is to become of me!" cried the widow. "Ought I to set off instantly for London?"

Miss Morrison thought not, as restive Lords are not easily held; but she thought better of an action of damages, and she had a younger brother, a clever attorney in London. Were there any proofs—any letter? Mrs Barnaby had lots of letters, and, if she obtained nothing else, she should have revenge!—and she was ready to shew Miss Morrison the letters, only she had a prodigious deal to do just then, and, moreover, she was thinking—

And very much to the purpose too. She was thinking, that though she had squandered about seventy or eighty pounds in trifling purchases, by far the greater part of the expenses her noble lover had induced her to run into were still in the shape of debts, the money with which she proposed to discharge them being as yet paying her interest in the funds. Could she contrive to leave the heaviest of these debts unpaid till she knew the result of her intended attack upon Lord Mucklebury's purse, it would be very convenient. Perhaps some vague notion that she, too, might visit the Continent, and thus escape the necessity of paying them at all, might mix itself with her meditations; but at any rate she very speedily decided upon leaving Cheltenham the following day, without mentioning her intention to her milliner, mercer, tailor, shoemaker, boiler, perfumer, livery-stable keeper, librarian, or even to her hair-dresser. If she got damaged, she should return and pay them all with great caut; if not, circumstances must decide what it would be most advisable for her to do.

Our widow improves on us—she got dexterously away from Cheltenham, bag and baggage; leaving the tiger, the tall footman, and the lady's maid, to take care of each other.

The letters, the ground of action, were duly submitted to Mr Magnus Morrison; though the widow was obliged to regret that delicacy had made her—But she explained the matter charmingly herself, when the attorney hinted that such notes as this from his Lordship were shy proof:—

“BELLA DONNA!—Should I find the Barnaby disengaged in her saloon, were my audacious feet to bear me across its threshold this evening?” “M.”

Mrs Barnaby was most grateful for Mr Morrison's frank opinion—rejoiced to find herself in the hands of a friend rather than a lawyer. She would be equally frank with him, and she declared—

“I have loved Lord Mucklebury most sincerely!—loved him with all the pure disinterested ardour of my character; but the same warm heart, Mr Morrison, which thus surrenders itself without suspicion or restraint, is precisely of the nature most prompt to reject and forget a being proved to be unworthy of it. Therefore I may truly say, that this poor bosom” (pressing her two hands upon it) “suffers more from the void within it, than from tender regret; and I am greatly inclined, since I cannot benefit by your able services as a lawyer, to urge my friendship with your dear sister as a claim upon your kindness as a gentleman. Will you assist to cure the painful void I speak of by giving me your help in my endeavours to see all that is best worth looking at in London?”

The lawyer, without being in the least taken in, fell into the scheme of attending the widow to the Tower, St Paul's, and so forth: but the final attempt to melt the flinty spirit of Lord Mucklebury—“The bold measure”—was secretly undertaken by herself. A golden sovereign opened the way to the door of his apartment in Mivart's Hotel; the waiter durst not go farther than the door, and the Widow took courage to announce herself and her wrongs. The scene is very good, though, like many in this work, overdone. We shall quote the Widow's capital rally, after his Lordship's cool effrontery. It is, we think, her masterpiece:—

The widow was at a loss what to do or say next. Had he been rude or angry, or even silent and sullen, or in any other mood in the world but one of such very easy good humour, she could have managed better. But a painful sort of conviction began to creep over her that Lord Mucklebury's present conduct, as well as all that had passed before, was merely the result of high-breeding and fashionable manners, and that lords and ladies always did so to one another. If this were so, rather than betray such rustic ignorance as to appear surprised at it, she would have consented to live without a lover for weeks and weeks to come.

Fortunately Lord Mucklebury was really hungry, and he ate so heartily for a minute or two, that the puzzled lady had time to settle her purpose.

“Well!—I see how it is, my Lord,” said she; “I came here to ask you to do a commission for me at Rome, where the papers told me you were going; but you are too busy and too hungry to spare a moment to an old acquaintance.”

“No! upon my soul!” said Lord Mucklebury, throwing some of his former homage into his eyes as he bowed to her. “There is no commission in the world you could give me, from New York to Jerusalem, that I would not execute with the fidelity of a western or an eastern slave. What are your commands, bewitching Mrs Barnaby?”

“Merely, my Lord, that you would buy a set of shells for me—as nearly like Lady Stephenson's as possible; and I dare say,” she added, very cleverly drawing out her purse, to avoid any misconception respecting the object—“I dare say your Lordship, who has travelled so much, may be able to tell me pretty nearly what the price will be. About ten pounds, I think.”

And ten golden sovereigns were immediately thrown from the purse upon the table.

Lord Mucklebury, perfectly delighted by this brilliant proof of the versatility of her powers, gaily took her purse from her hand, and, replacing the money in it, said—

“It is not so that I execute the commissions of my fair friends, Mrs Barnaby. I will note your orders in my pocket-book, thus—‘A set of the handsomest shells in Rome for the charming Mrs Barnaby.’ See!—I can hardly overlook it; and when I have the pleasure of presenting them, we will settle about the price.”

He replaced her purse in her hand, which he kissed with his best air of Cheltenham gallantry; upon which she wisely rose, and saying, with every appearance of being perfectly satisfied with her reception, “Adieu, my Lord!—forgive my intrusion, and let me hope to have the pleasure of seeing you when you return,” she took her departure, perfectly convinced that her new-born conjecture was right, and that lords had privileges not accorded to other men.

Mr Magnus Morrison had, for the present, become the Widow's pis aller.

Agnes pleaded headache, that she might not be her dashing aunt's companion in sight-seeing; and the Widow entirely approved her desire to remain at home in their lodgings in Half-Moon Street, while she roamed about with the gallant but cautious lawyer of Red Lion Square. After their daily perambulations, Mr Magnus generally partook of the Widow's nice little drawing-room dinners; at which there were rump steaks and juicy cutlets, and wine and a little brandy, and her favourite beverage, porter; and thus all things went merry as a marriage-bell.

The Widow was, meanwhile, meditating a trip to the Continent, partly to evade Cheltenham bills, unless the lawyer speedily shewed cause for a change of tactics. He was, in fact, no great temptation to her ambition in the way of matrimony, though he answered quite well for a temporary squire. Half her coarse selfishness, her impudent dissimulation, her harshness, and, at last, brutal tyranny to her angelic niece, we have not alluded to. Its repetition becomes tiresome at last; and one is often left with no feeling about the audacious Widow, save the desire to send her to the treadmill. Agnes is all this while involved in as perplexed and vexed a course of “true love” as ever bewildered poor heroine, on to nearly the end of the third volume. And when Cupid's old game of cross-purposes is at the height with this timid, sensitive, and most delicate of gentle-blooded feminine creatures, bitter upbraidings for ingratitude, and threats of being turned into the streets, are her hourly fate—hers who had just before nobly refused a most unexceptionable match with a high-born and most amiable young man, with seven thousand a-year!

Meanwhile, the delay of the jilted Widow, who was to be only two days absent from her Cheltenham lodgings, had caused alarm in that town of gay birds of passage and sensitive tradesmen; and, to cut short our tale, the dashing Widow Barnaby was arrested in the streets of London, at the suit of the livery-stable keeper from whom she had her carriage! "You shall live to repent this treatment of a lady!" cried the enraged Mrs Barnaby; but the dogged livery-stable keeper heeded not; and the paltry Mr Magnus Morrison, when asked to be bail till Mrs Barnaby's broker could sell stock, took fright, and, forgetting all the steaks and cutlets, cheesecakes, brandy-cherries, and black wine he had swallowed at the Widow's cost, was "very sorry that it was out of his power." The Widow was now really in agony. In vain she assured the Bow-Street officer of the fact that she had thousands in the funds, which her broker could sell out at an hour's notice; he grinned in her face; and having rather impatiently waited Mr Morrison's reply, would delay no longer; so, the amiable, wronged Mrs Barnaby, scolding and entreating, was forced to submit to the degradation of going to the Fleet prison for one day. She instantly wrote to her broker, and knew it could not be more than one day. But, when the coach and the horse hire had been paid, other writs came forward, and the amiable widow was still held in durance. She wrote, ordering her niece to come to her, giving her minute directions as to the route; but the delicate Agnes could not venture to thread the streets of London, nor yet visit the prison where her coarse-minded aunt was detained. She had prudently applied for protection in this emergency to "Aunt Betsy," and she found it; and thus was Mrs Barnaby left to shift for herself, unburdened by her ungrateful niece.

One "charming man" Mrs Barnaby had seen in the Fleet, during her three days' detention, for it was thus long before her broker, by selling the seventh hundred pounds of her original stock, obtained her release. This "charming man" was Mr Patrick O'Donagough, the natural son of an English peer, by a poor Irish girl, named Nora O'Donagough; a very handsome man, about thirty, whom misfortune had sent to the Fleet prison more than once or twice. And no sooner was Mrs Barnaby left to soliloquize, after "crooked Aunt Betsy" had carried off the ungrateful Agnes, than she recalled the elegant, interesting man, whom she had frequently met in the passages, and whose eyes, as she said to herself, "spoke plainly enough what he thought of me." And "here am I," thought Mrs Barnaby, "six months on my travels, and seven hundred pounds poorer, and without having advanced an inch towards a proper alliance;" and then came the idea of Pat O'Donagough—

"Poor fellow! His being in misfortune ought not to produce ill-will to him in a generous mind! How he looked as he said, 'Adieu, then, madam! With you vanishes the last ray of light that will ever reach my heart!' And I am sure he said exactly what he felt, and no more. Poor O'Donagough! My heart aches for him!"

So, next day, the benevolent widow, less fastidious than Agnes, took her way on foot to the Fleet prison.

We have gone along with Mrs Barnaby's clever biographer up to this point with great pleasure and no remorse, thorough-paced jade as the heroine is. But we can proceed no farther on amicable terms. The noble father of Mr O'Donagough had originally secured him a good appointment in the Customs, after the manner of kind aristocratic fathers. And Mr Patrick made money, which he as quickly squandered, with those gentleman-like "sporting characters" in the neighbourhood, who, moved by his fine person, good address, and half-blood, were inclined to grace him with admission into their society. Having lost his money, his appointment, his noble father's favour, and, moreover, his personal freedom, the peer was, on promise of repentance, once more moved to advance his profligate offspring £500, on condition that he went off immediately to Australia, and was never heard of more. The young man lost the fresh £500 at ecarté, in a very natural manner. The vessel sailed, and he was again in the Fleet, where, by the kindness of his stars, he met Mrs Barnaby—not, however, before he had been converted by an old friend, once, like himself, on the Turf, but now the preacher of an independent congregation, who assured him that, if he assiduously studied the calling of preaching, he would lend him a helping hand to turn it to account.

Mrs Trollope has completely marred the effect of her clever story, by the outrageous absurdity of her attempt to make another dead-thrust at the evangelical party, in doing which, she has not merely violated all decorum, but all probability; and excited disgust, where she either intended to create amusement, gratify a party, or convey instruction. There may be wild fanaticism, folly, absurdity, nay, gross hypocrisy, among the persons she tries to satirize and ridicule, but assuredly there was never one Mr Pat O'Donagough received as an angel of the church.

He loved change, novelty, and excitement, and manifested great talent in the facility with which he mastered the mysteries of this new business. He was soon seen rapidly advancing towards lasting wealth and independence: one of the wealthiest merchants in London had offered him the place of domestic prayer and preacher at his beautiful residence at Castaway-Saved Park, when an almost forgotten creditor, who had lost sight of him for many years, unluckily recognised him as he was delivering a most awakening evening lecture in a large ware-room, converted into a chapel, near Moor Fields. Eager to take advantage of this unexpected piece of good fortune, the tailor (for such was his profession) arrested the inspired orator in the first place, and then asked him if he were able to settle his account in the next. Had the manner of transacting the business been reversed, it is probable that the affair would have been settled without any arrest at all; for Sir Miles Morice, of Castaway-Saved Park, was one of the most pious individuals of the age, and would hardly have permitted his chaplain elect (elect in every sense) to have gone to prison for thirty-seven pounds, nine shillings, and eightpence; but being in prison, O'Donagough was shy of mentioning the circumstance to his distinguished patron, and was employed, at the time Mrs Barnaby first made acquaintance with him, in composing discourses "on the preternatural powers over the human mind, accorded to the chosen vessels called upon to pour out the doctrine of the new birth to the people." There is little doubt that these really eloquent compositions would have sold rapidly, and perfectly have answered the object of their clever author. But accident prevented the trial from being made.

Yes, accident, happy accident, prevented this; for Mrs Barnaby threw herself in his way, and Mr Pat did not this time fly in the face of his good fortune. Even here, young and handsome as Pat was, and converted as Mrs Barnaby had been by one of his sermons or tracts, she never lost her senses. She heard the story of his noble father, of the probability of another outfit being obtained, and, through the kindness of Mr New-birth, a religious bookseller, the appointment of a missionary to Sydney; and on this she generously furnished the means—£37 : 10 : 8—of liberating her pious young friend, lest the appointment should be lost. She afterwards made the draught an even £40.

"The Reverend Mr O'Donagough" would look very well in the paragraph which she was determined should record her marriage in the Exeter paper; and being quite determined that the three hundred and twenty-seven pounds per annum, which still remained of her income, should be firmly settled on herself, she received her handsome friend, when he arrived at the hour of dinner, in a manner which showed he had lost nothing in her esteem since they parted.

Pious Pat forthwith waited on his noble papa, and represented to him that the very best thing he could do, would be once more to furnish the means of his departure from Europe.

"That you may spend it again at the gaming-table, you audacious scamp!" responded his noble but incensed progenitor.

"Not so, sir," replied the soft-voiced young preacher; "you are not yet aware of the change in my principles, or you would have no such injurious suspicion."

"As to your principles, Pat," replied his Lordship, beguiled into a smile by the sanctified solemnity of his versatile son, "I do not comprehend how you could change them, seeing that you never had any."

"Then, instead of principles, sir, let me speak of practice: it is now several months since I exchanged the race-course, the billiard-table, and the dice-box, for the course of an extemporary preacher."

This is too much. Suffice it, that Mr O'Donagough made his love known; and his noble progenitor, satisfied that the widow had enough of her own to feed his son, took especial care that her fortune should be fixed beyond the likely chance of any relapse of Mr Patrick. The bride-elect was forthwith introduced to the heads of the congregation at tea and prayers; having first, on the suggestion of O'Donagough, straightened her ringlets and paled her rouge; and she conducted herself with such dexterity that a leader declared "that any one going to Sydney, in the holy and reverend character of a missionary, with such a wife in his hand as this good lady was sure to make, would do more good than all the Bishops and Archbishops that ever were consecrated after the manner of the worn-out superstitions of bygone ages;" and immediately proposed the election of Mr Patrick to the important office. Very improbable, and not a little indecent, is the scene that follows; so we shall drop Mrs Trollope's satire and her odious heroine, till we find her at Bristol, about to embark with her pious young husband.

While a large dinner-party were one day assembling at Mr Peters', including Agnes, Aunt Betsy, and all the other dramatis personæ, more visitors were announced.

"Mr and Mrs who?" said Mrs Peters to Mary.

"Mr and Mrs what?" said Elizabeth to Lucy.

But, before the parties thus questioned could have found time to answer, even had they been possessed of the information required, a lady in sober-coloured silk, with little rouge and no ringlets, followed by a handsome young man in black, entered the room, and considerably before many who had seen that lady before could recall the name by which they had known her, or reconcile her much changed appearance to their puzzled recollections, Mrs Peters was enfolded in her arms.

"My dear sister Peters!" said Mrs O'Donagough, "you are surrounded by so large a party, that I fear these last moments which I mean to dedicate to the affection of my kinsfolk, may be more inconvenient than pleasurable to you. But you cannot, I am sure, refuse me some portion of your society this evening, as it is probably the last one we shall ever pass together. Give me leave, sister Peters, to introduce you to my husband, the Rev. Mr O'Donagough. Mr Peters, Mr O'Donagough; Mr James Peters, Mr O'Donagough; Mr O'Donagough, my dear Mary; my husband, young ladies; Mr O'Donagough, my dear Elizabeth and Lucy! Good Heaven! Agnes here? and my aunt Compton, too! Well, so much the better, my dear Patrick; I shall now have the pleasure of presenting you to more relations, and as I should be proud to introduce you to all the world, this can only be an increase of pleasure to me. Agnes Willoughby, my dear, I can't say you behaved very well to me when the cheerful sort of life I indulged in, solely on your account, was changed for sorrow and imprisonment."

But we have had enough, and indeed a surfeit, of Mrs Barnaby. For some months O'Donagough was the most popular and eloquent preacher in Sydney; but the old man was not vanquished, and one unlucky race-day, the ruling passion returned in pristine force. The reverend Pat took a bet with one of his congregation of more than he was worth in the world; mounted in a blue and yellow jacket, took a desperate leap, and left a weeping Widow, O'Donagough; who this time wore mourning only a month, because the death was accidental! The gay, handsome, and clever Pat, scamp as he was, had been far too good for her. After his death, she fell sadly off in her religious profession, met her true counterpart, Major Allen, who had come to Sydney in the course of his travels, and was able to expatiate to him on the handsome income which "my Lord," her father-in-law, had taken care to secure upon herself. We hope her third husband may contrive to outlive her, and outwit her too.

So ends Mrs Trollope's best novel, the History of Mrs Barnaby—the most odious, unredeemed, and unredeemable of all the heroines of fiction; compared with whom Moll Flaggon or Madame Duval—to take opposite extremes—are, if not respectable, yet amiable, female characters.

Mrs Trollope's grand and lofty perfection, Colonel Hubert, the lover of Agnes, is to the full as tiresome as many of our old acquaintances of the Grandisonian family. But she has produced an excellent group in the Peters family; and the character of "Aunt Betsy," with a spice of originality, is both clever and pleasing. Of the style of the novel, the reader is enabled to judge by our specimens. If chargeable with any fault, it is the affectation of being too easy and off-hand.

AUSTRALIAN EMIGRATION.*

ALTHOUGH the South-Australian mania should be somewhat abated, which we trust it is, its consequences are not yet over; and, as the season of the sailing of "the regular packets for Port Adelaide" is again at hand, we return to the subject, in the hope that our warnings may save some unsuspecting intending emigrants from the consequences of their own rashness and credulity, and the delusions diligently propagated. There is evidently a strong reaction in the public mind. The system of puffing has been overdone; the colonial agents, and those absentee speculators interested, at least in the temporary vogue of the colony, are more discreetly silent; and even the book of the Colonial Secretary, Mr Gouger, steered clear of the gross and inflated misrepresentations and exaggerations which had so long been made.

Our former article on South Australia erred, we are inclined to think, upon the side of leniency and excess of candour. We received the statements of Mr Gouger too implicitly, though, through his elaborate showings up, we could not help perceiving the many drawbacks, temporary and permanent, attending the new settlement.

The work of Mr James, which we formerly stated that we had not seen, and which, indeed, we could not have seen, as it was not published, ought to be impartial. The author appears to have no personal connexion with any of the southern colonies, though a traveller in all of them; and of South Australia he tells only what he has seen with his own eyes. Before going into an examination of his book, we beg of our readers, and particularly of our Scottish friends, some of whose usually cool and sober heads are "in the bees" about this Land of Promise, to ponder the subjoined closing paragraph, and then, if our short analysis of Mr James's account of his residence in the colony, does not satisfy them, to turn to the original. The book is a dear pennyworth in one sense; but it states what may be worth fortune and happiness to some of those meditating emigration. The writer left the colony in June last, and consequently later than Mr Gouger, who has lately, we understand, returned to his official duties. Since the month of May, the Governor, Captain Hindmarsh, of whom Mr James speaks in the handsomest terms, has been recalled, and Colonel Light, the Surveyor-General, has thrown up his appointment. The colony has, in short, been revolutionized. He says—

Upon the whole, the Colony is getting on rapidly—perhaps too rapidly, and the existing disposition in England to emigrate to South Australia, can hardly be termed anything short of madness. In another six months there will be bitter disappointments; and no doubt many gloomy accounts will be received from the Colony from parties who have gone out under strongly excited expectation. Five thousand people by this time, Christmas 1838—, are congregated in the miserable village of Adelaide, and without growing a potato, are dependent for every meal of victuals upon foreign supply. The chances are, therefore, for the present, greatly against the Colony; and it is to be feared, that in some articles of first necessity, scarcity may arise very much to the prejudice of the middling classes of the community—or that portion who have very little capital in money, and who are unused to labour.

Swan River was overdone at first by the same injudicious rush of settlers, emigrating principally from London; and a similar reaction will take place in South Australia, if some means are not adopted to check this eagerness for emigrating to what is very foolishly called "The Land of Promise."

So concludeth Mr Horton James. He, no more than ourselves, is so unreasonable or uncandid as to assert that South Australia will not in time become a fine grazing and wool-growing country, and that it may even now be an eligible resort for a particular description of emigrants; but that at present it is not eligible for the promiscuous hordes who are eager to rush into what has been characteristically termed "the New Utopia."

Let us turn to our author's first impressions. They were not delightful. Kangaroo Island is denounced as the "worthless and inhospitable island," where there is nothing worth seeing but the wreck and ruin of the Company's expensive machinery. He approached Port Adelaide:—

The shores resemble the worst parts of the Coast of Essex below the Nore, and at high tide the little mangroves are half covered with the water. You look out for a landing-place in vain, though the ship now anchors again, and you are at the end of your voyage. The boat is being lowered to put the passengers ashore, and you see two or three small vessels at anchor higher up the creek, which the pilot says have lately arrived from Van Dieman's Land with sheep, potatoes, flour, &c. &c. It is now ten o'clock, and unless you make haste you are informed there may be some difficulty in landing, as the tides are here very unaccommodating, being always low water in the middle of the day, which is a phenomenon not yet satisfactorily explained. You ask if this is Port Adelaide, and the answer is yes! You step into the boat with a number of other passengers, carpet bags, band-boxes, and parcels, and four hands from the ship shove off, and pull up the creek. The landing place is about a mile higher up, and you already see the bottom, and in a few minutes you stick fast in the mud.

We cannot follow the poor ladies in their best dresses, new shoes, and silk stockings, wading through the Slough of Despond, up to the knees in mud, and the sailors with the children on their shoulders, and heavy bundles in their arms.

One comfort, however, is, that there is nobody to look at you. The shore is an uninhabitable swamp, and the few people who are living in the wigwags at Port Adelaide, are too busily engaged in landing boards and rolling up casks, to take any notice of a party of ladies and gentlemen up to their knees in mud trying to reach the shore. This is at last managed, without the loss of either life or limb: but it is certainly anything but pleasant.

* Six Months in South Australia; with some Account of Port Philip and Portland Bay, in Australia Felix. By T. Horton James, Esq. London: J. Cross. 1 vol.

ant. Arrived on the dry land—the party wash the mud off their legs, and put on their shoes and stockings, then carrying their trunks as well as they can, the sailors having all gone back to look after the boat and get her afloat, they all walk up the side of a little canal, as it is called, which brings them to the only spot of land at the creek free from inundations, which is called the Sand Hill, where one or two grog shops, made of branches of trees, are seen, a few native blacks stark naked, and a large iron store painted white belonging to the commissioners. This is Port Adelaide! Port Misery would be a better name: for nothing in any other part of the world can surpass it in everything that is wretched and inconvenient. Packages of goods and heaps of merchandise are lying about in every direction, as if they had cost nothing. Stacks of what were once beautiful London bricks crumbling away like gingerbread, and evidently at each returning tide half covered with the flood; trusses of hay, now rotten, and Norway deals, scattered about as if they had no owner—iron ploughs and rusty harrows—cases of door frames and windows that had once been glazed—heaps of the best slates, half tumbling down—winnowing machines broken to pieces—blocks of Roman cement, now hard as stone, wanting nothing but the staves and hoops—Sydney cedar, and laths and shingles from Van Dieman's Land in every direction; whilst, on the high ground, are to be seen pigs eating through the floor sacks, and kegs of raisins with not only the head out but half the contents; onions and potatoes apparently to be had for picking up. The sight is disheartening. What with the sun and the rain—the mud and the floods—the thieves with four legs and the thieves with two—the passengers hug themselves at the recollection that they have brought no merchandise for sale, glad enough to be able to take care of themselves. The sooner they get out of this horrid hole the better; so they inquire if there is any coach to the town—they are answered by a careless shake of the head, and so, like good settlers, they determine to set off and walk, carrying their light parcels with them and leaving the heavy things with a friend, who refuses to go any further. They ask for a drink of water, before starting—there is not such a thing to be had; but the bullock carts are expected down every minute with the usual supply! What! no water? exclaims our passenger. No, sir, but the commissioners are sinking a well, though they have not yet found any but salt water; but they are going to dig in another place, shortly, we understand.

The city of Adelaide, the beau-ideal of all possible cities, so elegant and vast in the design that one blushes for the comparative insignificance of London or Paris, Constantinople or Canton, is seen at last; and, as the bullock waggon with the water for the port are met by the way, every one obtains a refreshing draught in pursuing the warm and dusty, but agreeable journey. Glimpses of the mountain range are obtained; and a few huts and marquees begin to appear, with people walking about. The emigrants step across that famed river the Torrens, which makes so good a figure in ground plans and in Mr Gouger's book, without knowing it is a river. They inquire for the inn, and are directed to the Southern Cross Hotel, then kept by a German Jew of the name of Levy, considered the best house in this settlement; and here we will leave them for the present, hungry, thirsty, and fatigued—covered with dust and perspiration—and with feelings of shame and disappointment at being so taken in."

Mr James decidedly disapproves of the site of the capital, and prophesies that, unless it be speedily abandoned, or left as a village, and the headquarters of the colony planted at Port

Lincoln, speedy ruin must overtake the settlement. We do not pretend to decide the point; but, although Port Lincoln were the preferable spot, we can easily understand the injunction—"You must not say anything against the town of Adelaide till I have sold, or otherwise got rid of my town acres."

Those who have speculated in town lands at Adelaide, will not listen to any, the least breath of, objection to the beauty and suitability of that spot for a great commercial city. If you hint at the long walk from the port, or shew them the long bill sent in by Mr Cock or Mr Hack, for the carriage of goods or luggage—you are stopped immediately by a scheme of a joint-stock railroad or navigable canal-company. Where the money is to come from, in a little society that has not yet raised a potato, and much less a bushel of grain, they do not inform you.

For a canal, he demands, where is the water? Why, it is coming by Mr Hack's bullock waggons, which, in return take up goods from the Port to the city at the moderate rate of 40s. a-ton! Mr James cracks some hard jokes on the City of Promise. It was already eight miles in circumference, with a population of 3000. This he remarks, from persons who are all for concentration, seems strange; and the consequence is, that in the day-time people are constantly losing themselves; and dare not stir out at night alone, unless they make up their minds to sleep under a tree, in some place, which, on the map figures as a square or crescent, though at present you may

Lean against any tree in the city and exclaim—

"This shadowy desert, unfrequented woods,
I better brook than flourishing peopled towns."

And yet there are sprinkled up and down the place a few substantial buildings; one belonging to the Company, on an enormous scale—another good brickhouse to Mr Hack—another to the enterprising Mr Gilles—one to Mr Thomas, and a couple of new taverns. The rest of the dwellings are made of very slight materials, and the number of canvas tents and marquees give some parts of the settlement the appearance of a camp. Most of the new comers settle down on what is called the Park Lands, where they are handy to the little rivulet, and they run up a Robinson Crusoe sort of hut, with twigs and branches from the adjoining forest; and the climate being fine and dry, they answer well enough as temporary residences.

It is probable that there may yet be considerable loss on town-lands; but that concerns the speculators only, whose market for building-lots Port Lincoln would spoil. "Serve them right," Mr James thinks, for asking a monopoly price of respectable new comers:—and we say, Amen! These, however, are all matters that will right themselves with time, though they may bring ruin to hundreds in the meanwhile; and we shall leave them, to consider the permanent features and prospects of the colony. The climate is declared by Mr James to be, for eight months in twelve, as fine and salubrious as can be desired.

But from the latter end of November, all December, January, February, and part of March, the heat is oppressive and almost intolerable. I have seen the thermometer, in these uncomfortable months, in a dark room nearly closed up, and with a thick roof of thatch over it, as high as 96°! not once but a dozen different days; and if the instrument is hung upon a wall in the direct beams of the sun, it rises to 140°! This is a degree of heat I never remember to have felt in any part of the tropics even; it dries up everything: not merely the few running streams that in winter come from the mountains, but all garden vegetation; and so pulverizes the dust in the camp at Adelaide, that it is reduced to an almost impalpable powder, and penetrates every article of clothing, from its extreme fineness; whilst as much caution is requisite in stepping across the road, as if a person were going through the muddiest part of Piccadilly or Whitechapel.

Of course the tiny little Torrens all but vanishes before such a sun; in the few places where it runs at all, there would be plenty of room for the whole of it to run through an Irishman's hat; and a far better river is made every day in the London streets when the parish turncock opens a plug. There are, however, several pretty good holes which have too much water in them to be entirely exhausted by the sun's heat, and it was on account of these water holes that the town was placed in this unfortunate situation.

Now comes ophthalmia, the worst disease peculiar to the hot but healthy climate.

And as misfortunes never come singly, the few wells about the settlement of Adelaide become dry—the scarcer the water the more you want it for washing; and the fine particles of lime-stone dust carried up in numerous whirlwinds about the plains, fall into one's eyes, and a three months' attack of ophthalmia is the frequent consequence. Half the people you see have got bad eyes, the dandies even wearing veils; but it may be very reasonably doubted whether they do not produce more harm than good. This is the only drawback to the climate.

The extreme aridity of the climate, and the want of rivers and of water, is, however, not unfavourable to sheep stock; and there is no doubt that, if the colony is to prosper rapidly, means must speedily be taken to economize water, and to preserve it in tanks and reservoirs, as in other dry countries. Mr James talks of the rivers of the province with great contempt; and true it is, that where there are few mountains, there can be but few streams. The Murray is the only river he thinks worthy of the name; but it is so far off from the present settlement, and so is the Glenelg,* discovered by Major Mitchel, as to be out of the question with civilized emigrants for years to come. The dryness of the climate has a favourable effect on health, though we cannot see much in the observation, that emigrants for a long time retain their English ruddiness, or that "even the children, when kept clean, a very difficult matter in summer, look plump and chubby." In the first place, Mr James cannot judge of the effects of long residence, as no one has been long in the place; nor is it wonderful that, in a climate so salubrious, in a Land of Promise, the children should look plump and chubby. Next to the want of water, is the want of fuel, and of timber for all useful purposes. There is already want of wood for fire and fences; and timber for building and furniture, &c. must be imported. In this important respect the other colonies, and especially the unlucky Swan River settlement, are superior to South Australia.

What figures as the botanical garden, in the puffing accounts of the colony, is, in the meanwhile, a much more sensible and useful thing—a garden for raising vegetables, and where cucumbers and very fine melons are raised. This garden belongs to the Colonial Government, and is skillfully managed by Mr Allan and his sons, who will, it is said, draw £10 a-week. This seems a great sum, though, if the gardener had to pay his workmen £2 each a-week, his profits might not be too large. Mr James thinks a hard-working practical gardener could do well; but then he must not depend on hired labour till it get cheaper, but work with his sons, like Mr Allan. Now, we cannot see why the labour of a gardener's sons, or of any workman's sons, should be counted as nothing, though it may be a great convenience to a poor man to have at first a command of this valuable sort of capital. Potatoes and pumpkins have not succeeded with Mr Allan; but all common vegetables, peas, beans, onions, &c., yield abundant returns. We would, however, rather hear of fine potatoes than fine melons. The latter, very fine, cost 5s. 6d. each; cucumbers, 1s. 6d.; cabbages, 2s.; no carrots or turnips; onions from 6d. to 1s. a pound; potatoes, when Mr James left in June last, cost 15s. per 112 lbs., which in the month of February had cost 50s! Indeed, all his prices of provisions shew a considerably higher rate than is exhibited in Mr Gouger's work. We shall enumerate a few. Common milch cows, £16—good, £25. Working bullocks, broke in, from £25 to £28. Young ewes from Van Dieman's Land, 40s. Small wethers (about 38 lbs.) 35s. Strong draught horses, £70. A strong cart or dray, £24. Light cart, £16. These come from Van Dieman's Land. The 4lb. loaf was 1s. 8d.; beef 1s. 4d. a pound; mutton, 1s. 3d.; pork, 1s. 8d.; fowls, 5s. to 6s. each; turkeys, 25s.; geese, 15s.; ducks, 7s. 6d.; fish, 7d., and scarce. These prices must fall, and so must the price of labour, and of all sorts of materials necessary to the erection of houses and the enclosure of ground; but just now, they are enormous, and present the most formidable obstacles to the settlement of small capitalists. Horse hire is at present 20s. a-day; the cost of bringing a ton of goods from the port to the city, as we mentioned, 40s. The hire of a gig and horse to the port and back, 40s. House-rent about 5s. per room per week; and everything else in the same proportion. Tea, sugar, and wine, and also salt beef and pork, had fallen greatly before Mr James left; and such fluctuations in imported goods may be looked for. It is more discouraging to find, that a person at Sydney, who, hearing bread was so dear in Adelaide, exported five tons of flour, at £18 per ton before it was sold in Adelaide, at an advance of 50 per cent. lost £6 by the transaction. Among the other expenses of sale, is £4:4s. to the Company's bank, for exchanging their own optional notes for specie; and £4:10s. landing charges at Port Adelaide.

* The Glenelg boundary river, on which there is no settler, and to which none will venture to approach, must not be confounded with the South Australian township of Glenelg, about which, Mr James says, "The surrounding country is low and sandy, full of swamps, misery, and mosquitoes, and contains a population of about seventy persons. It has, nevertheless, been dignified with the name of 'Glenelg,' and no doubt we shall soon see a ship laid on with emigrants, to be called the 'City of Glenelg.'"

Yonder neat-looking low brick cottage is the Bank, and transacts all the business of the Colony in that way, and, as far as it goes, is a most thriving concern; it issues notes of all sorts and sizes, but they have all got the optional clause in them, [viz., payable in London.] They charge ten per cent. for the use of the sepiques of paper, and when you take them for payment, they charge you one shilling premium on every sovereign!

The Company would require to profit by something, though this does not mend the case of those needing their aid as bankers. Mr James trembles for the Company's dividends. After quoting a grandiloquent speech delivered by Colonel Torrens at a public dinner—and charity obliges us to believe that the gallant Colonel spoke in sheer ignorance, when he eulogized “the moisture of the climate, the mountain ranges,” the never-failing streams, the means of internal water-carriage, &c.—Mr James states that the speech was followed by great cheering; and then remarks—

It seems the greater the nonsense the more vehement the applause. “Great cheering” indeed! Why, dry as New South Wales is, it rains twenty-five days more than it does in the New Province—in the England of the southern hemisphere; and if it were not a more rainy country, how is it that it originates so many valuable rivers as the Colonel enumerates. Which are the rivers, and what their names, that rise in the New Colony? Is there one? For the little streams Hindmarsh and Kangaroo can hardly be designated as rivers. The Yass river is a puddle, and the Tumut a mere mountain torrent; and though both valuable in the highest degree in their several districts, can never be thought of in connection with navigation. Even the great “Murray” itself, and its thousand miles of navigation, according to the gallant speaker, will all end in disappointment. No, no; South Australia, though a beautiful sheep and cattle country, will never arrive at any very great commercial importance, nor can it ever maintain any dense population, for want of rivers, and therefore will never be the “England of the southern hemisphere.”

Since we are upon the subject of puffing, it may be as well to finish it.

It has been stated in print, that a “Steam Flour Mill” has been erected in Adelaide; and that a “Dock” has been opened at the Port, for receiving and repairing vessels; that sawing machinery has been set to work; and that a number of other useful matters are either in operation, or in progress; that a Literary and Scientific Institution has been established ever since 1835, and that an extensive library, and collection of philosophical apparatus, had been shipped for the Colony.

It is stated also, that a “South Australian Corresponding Colonial Society” has been established at Adelaide; Benefit Societies at “Kingscote;” and that pleasure towns, and watering places, for the East Indian Natives and invalids, &c. &c. &c.

Now, this would be all most gratifying and agreeable, if it were only true; but, unfortunately, it is not, nor is it likely to be true for many years to come; and philosophical and dilettanti societies are the last things wanted in a new community. This puffing is the more to be regretted, because the Colony is a very good Colony, if they would only let it alone, and not smother it with their ridiculous, inflated, and intemperate praises. There is no doubt that hard-working, industrious persons, who will not grumble at roughing it for four or five years, and powerfully attend to their sheep, and have nothing to do with the City of Adelaide, or the purchase of land anywhere, will make an independence. This is the best plan, and this is true; but nothing short of the wand of a magician could have accomplished all the fine undertakings just enumerated. The last we saw of the steam flour mill, and patent slip, belonging to the South Australian Company, and which was stated gravely, in a report to Parliament in 1837, to have been erected, was lying fathoms deep in the sands in May 1838, rusting and rotting where it had been landed years ago, on the shores of Nepean Bay, in Kangaroo Island, without a thought or prospect of removing it from its “dread abode;” and the sawing machinery was lying by its side, subject every return of tide to a not very salutary wetting. As for the dock and patent slip, there is some talk of making an effort to commence these works.

Mr Gouger tells us, page 122, that “a literary and scientific association was founded in England, and a library collected and sent out.” What says Mr Horton James?

As to the library of books that was sent out to the Colony in 1835, for the use of the members of the “Literary and Philosophical Society of South Australia,” the whole concern was put up by Mr Charles Knight, of Ludgate Street, and consists of various works published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and when the discount was taken off, the entire cost, as per invoice, amounted to £14, odd shillings. This is no matter, because £14 even, small as it is, will go a great way in the cheap publications of the present day; but when the author was walking through the woods of Adelaide, and inquiring for the library and the “Philosophical Society,” he could find neither “books nor running brooks,” but was told that a case of books had been landed out of the ship “Tam o’ Shanter” at the creek, and that they were somewhere in Mr Surden’s store, though most probably by this time rotten and good for nothing.

Mr Mann, the advocate-general of the colony, has stated, in a pamphlet, that a valuable species of flax will soon be raised for exportation; and that castor oil, opium, gum arabic, and silk will all be supplied to England from her industrious youngest daughter: and he gives some very extraordinary reasons for this latitude of belief. What again says our author?—

Now, all this is not merely the sheerest twaddle of ignorance and impertinence, but it is false and mischievous, as every one must know by the time he has travelled the first hundred miles in the new colony. The great and staring want of all exports is one of the principal evils of South Australia; and to begin with the beginning, and a very humble article, it cannot supply the ships that sail away even with ballast. The next articles in the way of exports that one might very naturally look for in a great colony like this, are water and fuel; but no—neither of these primitive things are to be had at Port Adelaide! Fire wood of all things might be expected to abound in an infant colony; but, like water and ballast, it is not to be had. The only exports to be thought of for the next twenty years will be wool and oil, a few hides, and a little bark. To Van Dieman’s Land they may have an opportunity of exporting a little maize, pork, hams, and bacon, from the rich flats on the banks of the Murray, which of course will have to be shipped in Encounter Bay. But nothing more than this can be counted on for many years, and it will be well to accomplish this; but for Mr Mann’s flax, castor oil, silk, opium, and gum arabic, it is all balderdash, and not worthy another thought. The first step towards exporting, is to put an end to the ruinous imports of farm produce from Sydney and Van Dieman’s Land. Now, in the fifth year of its establishment, it is high time South Australia should leave off buying her wheat and flour, mutton, beef, and pork, from the adjoining colonies. Such cargoes after cargoes of these things, immediately emigration slackens, will drive every piece of money from the colony, and leave it comparatively without a shilling. What is to prevent their raising barley, oats, maize, potatoes, bran, onions, apples, currants, turnips, hay, boards, battens, and scantling, lath and shingles, soap, candles, beer, butter, cheese, tobacco, pigs, poultry, leather, &c. They should all be raised in the colony before exports are much talked of, and not brought as they now are from the adjoining colonies of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land.

Among the other attractions of Adelaide, were races, and a theatre. Happily, the theatre, erected by a tavern-keeper, is already advertised to be sold. It may make a cow-house; and certainly would be much better occupied as such, for many a year to come. A cow-keeper or dairyman would indeed make money in Adelaide. At present this lucrative department is partly filled, like so many others, by the universal Mr Hack. He is a principal carrier from the Port. This sentence alone speaks volumes:—"All the bullocks and horses in the colony, instead of being employed at the plough, are employed at this, [carrying goods from the Port to the town,] which is a dead loss to the colony of £30,000 a-year."

To be placed against the many natural disadvantages of this colony, in the want of water, timber, stone, metals, &c., is the soil, which, so far as the country has been explored, is declared superior to that of the older colonies; that is, it does not appear to have so large a proportion of bad soil as compared with good. In New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, according to Mr James, on the average, out of twenty acres of land, one is good and nineteen bad. He does not state the proportion in South Australia, but, in general, praises the soil; and, what may assuage the ardour of emigrants, assures them that there will be plenty of good land for many years to come, and that it must get cheaper. It is not indeed to South Australia, but to South Australia in its present condition as a settlement for the class of emigrants who are hurrying off to the New El Dorado, that we object. Mr James illustrates the process of colonization very happily, by the laying of the foundation of a house. The first stones are carelessly thrown in, and any rubbish does to begin with, till, in process of time, if there be motive, money, and perseverance, up by degrees rises the fair and beautiful edifice; while the first stones, like the first settlers—the first sufferers—are covered over and forgotten. But this colony, unlike all others, was to be planted, as Sir Henry Steuart did full-grown trees, with their leafy honours suffering no diminution. Laying aside the immense expense, the thing is impossible. No early emigrant can promise himself to remain a fresh bloom or living spray on the transplanted tree; and it becomes those who do not choose to be overlaid and forgotten foundation rubbish, to think in time.

The most direct and useful part of Mr James's book, is his warning to emigrants; and it applies to nineteen out of twenty of those meditating emigration.

If the intending emigrant has neither capital in money, nor capital in his hands—is neither a sawyer, carpenter, or any of the trades before-mentioned, he had better stop at home, or go to some maturer place, some older colony; for in South Australia there are very few public appointments, the civil establishment of the colony being on the smallest scale, and these very inadequately paid; so that there is no chance of getting a government appointment, unless he carries it in his pocket; and it is not every one who would like to open a low grog shop;

but that is a trade which hardly ever fails; wine, beer, and spirits, are always wanted in new settlements, especially when it is so hot as in South Australia.

To many families what follows applies even more forcibly: those who propose carrying out pretty daughters, with a few of the superficial accomplishments of an old and luxurious society, to the wilderness, to make their fortunes by marriage. There may be husbands in Australia for dairy-maids, cooks, and laundresses; but there is, we fear, still a very limited demand for young ladies as helpmates.

The country is too new for respectable families going out without any fixed plan for their future means of support; they, if genteel at home, must descend a step or two; and when the author has had the question hinted to him whether young ladies are likely to get married in South Australia, he has always preferred, in such a very important matter as this, to say decidedly not—the young men out there are far from a connubial set, not from any want of inclination to lead a respectable and quiet life, but they are generally not doing well enough to make such an additional expense desirable, most of them indeed not having the means of furnishing a house just yet, whatever they may have hereafter. The thing looks very pretty in theory, but in settling in a wild territory, there is so much rough work to be done, that an equal number of the sexes is rather objectionable than otherwise, and far from being indispensable; and so it will be found out ere long. In after years, when the ground has been cleared, and the settlers get themselves houses, and are a little to rights, it may then be desirable to furnish them with wives, but not before; unless, as formerly observed, the parties have got some capital, and can afford to make themselves comfortable. But ladies don't do altogether under canvass.

A tent is a very bad substitute for a brick or pisé cottage. And yet I have seen happy and smiling faces peeping out from the doors of their tents in the plains of Cowandilla, who seemed to envy nobody.

Grog-selling, bullock-driving, milk-men, gardeners, will all fail in time; and the only permanently profitable calling will be sheep-farming.

The only thing it requires is ready money to begin with, and the strictest attention afterwards to the sheep, with personal superintendence and constant dressing when diseased. With this, and a good look-out after the wild native dogs, there is a fortune to be made in any part of South Australia by sheep-farming. The following statement of the increase in a large flock of ewes was drawn up by a friend of the author, and is nothing more than the true account, casualties excepted; but, as before mentioned, the casualties are to the careless. When deaths are heard of, it is generally, in nine cases out of ten, traceable to some neglect—either allowing the sheep to feed on improper pasture, not shifting the folds, or general system of bad management. Under such inattention, sheep property is the very worst property a careless settler could possibly dabble in, and they ought not in that case to be meddled with.

The statement is much the same as that which we published in December. Mr James continues his counsel to emigrants—

As the land about Adelaide is not calculated to make any very great return for the large capital that must be expended on it in fencing and digging water holes for the support of the cattle, I would counsel the settlers on the plains of Cowandilla, not to lay out their ready money in expensive fences, expedients for damming up the water, and other improvements, because, when once their money is gone, they will never see it again, unless it has been judiciously laid out in breeding stock, at moderate prices and under their own charge. Yes, if the settler will be satisfied to follow his own sheep, they will give him a good return, and he need have nothing to buy but stock, and then it is of no consequence to him whether the headquarters are removed to Port Lincoln or 1

There is plenty of grass at present in the interior, and grass costs nothing. With care and attention, and living the life of a hermit for five or six years, following, dressing, and shearing his sheep himself, buying nothing, building nothing, owning not a brick nor an acre of land in any part of the colony, such a young man will do. It is a great sacrifice, but nothing else will do, except labouring, as stated before, for those persons who will not help themselves. With a resolution of this kind, and never coming into the miserable town, or mixing in its miserable pursuits, success will be certain, though slow at first.

One pleasing feature of the new colony, is the importance and respectability of skilful, well-conducted working-men. Shepherds, and those having the care of stock, appear to be raised to their former elevation, in the good old times, when the English yeoman or the Scottish farmer sat at the head of the hospitable board, round which was gathered all his household; his old ploughmen and shepherds, and the whole establishment of domestics, forming no unimportant part of the family. In Adelaide, the author has seen this primitive custom, now almost obsolete in England, revived. "He has often dined with respectable residents, where the overseer, after washing his hands, drew in his chair among the company, and, not only with perfect propriety, but entertaining his master and guests with accounts of his day's work—the sheep and cows," &c. At present, working-men make more money than those who have acquired a profession; the labourers who carry the surveyors' chain, gain, by their daily wages, thirty pounds more in the year than the surveyors; and it is much more profitable to be a sawyer, or splitter of timber for fences, than a physician.

It follows, as a matter of course, that there is not much scope in the colony for the talents of educated men without some capital; and if persons have not got this capital either in their hands or their pockets, it is of little use having it in their heads. This is pretty much the case in all young colonies, but in none so observable as in South Australia. But either of these descriptions of emigrants will do well—the healthy labourer or mechanic, whose habits of industry and hard hands will obtain him a large remuneration, or the gentleman, even knowing no trade, provided he takes out money enough to buy a flock of sheep. But he must have nothing to do with land, and not buy an inch of it; rent as much as he pleases, but purchase none; leave buying to those who have more money than wit; good as the land is in many places, it is not worth more than five shillings per acre, and must ultimately be fixed at this price, and, even then, unless you select your purchase with so much skill as to command the adjoining run or vacant pasturage for ever, and in extent five times as much as you purchase, it would be madness to give so high a price as 5s. per acre; and no profits of sheep-farming, great as they undoubtedly are, would enable any grazier to give 5s. an acre for land, in a country which requires, on an average, ten acres to feed a sheep, which is the case all over New Holland and Van Dieman's Land. Buy a piece of building land in town if you fancy such a thing, by all means, though a sheep-farmer should be never seen in town, and therefore cannot want it; such purchases should be left to the merchants.

He frequently reiterates the advice against buying land.

Though I recommend every person to abstain from buying land in South Australia for the present, and until it is cheaper, which it is sure to be, I am, of course, aware that some land is necessary to begin even those small schemes of cultivation, which have been alluded to, as promising a quick return. But the best thing any person can do before going out to the new Colony is, to go and agree with the Company in Blahopsgate Street to rent a section of 134 acres at £15 per annum, or half a section at £8 per annum. This is what I should do in preference to buying, were I going out again. The terms on which the Company treat are liberal, and from all I saw of the way their concerns are managed, over the water, it is very easy to see that they are doing more good for the Colony, than they are for themselves.

Mr James, as we have seen, considers the price of land far too dear, and he believes that it must be greatly reduced in price. This is done virtually by selling dear, but renting at very cheap rates. When he was in the colony, several sections of 80 acres, which sell in London for £80, were "hawked about the settlement at £70," a loss of £10, and two years' interest—and "no buyers even at that sacrifice." He continues—

It has been thought necessary to state this fact, as notorious as the sun at noon-day, to put English readers on their guard against improper statements and printed calculations, that all the rural land throughout the Colony is worth £2 per acre.* Now, in spite of these accounts, I can state, that, with one or two solitary exceptions of land taken adjoining the township, &c., none of the country sections are worth what they have cost. There is, and always will be, too much in the market for sale ever to command a high price, or even a profit to the purchasers who have bought at 20s. per acre. And with regard to the town acres, these being limited to one thousand, may rise, a few of them, in good situations, to even £200 per acre; but the bulk of them were obtainable in June 1838, when the author left, at about £30 to £35 each; but if the head-quarters are removed to Port Lincoln, they will fall rather than rise in value. The great cause of this high price of land in the town is, that it is held principally (at least one half) by absentees or monopolizers; either by persons living in London, or by the South Australian Company, Mr Hack, Mr Gilles, Mr Fisher, &c., so that the Government have no more to dispose of.

This monopoly of town land is felt as a great grievance. Emigrants of capital arrive with their wooden houses, ready to put up, and yet have not a piece of land to put them on, in a desert township sixteen miles in circumference, save at monopoly price.

It is hardly fair to those respectable parties, who are arriving in the colony day by day, and naturally wish to purchase a quarter of an acre to receive their wooden house, that the price of all the eligible building plots in the townships should have been raised, not by the improvements made on their lands by the absentee proprietors themselves, but by the industry of those who have built upon the adjoining lots, right and left.

One pound the acre for rural land, he often declares a great deal too dear. What is more—

It is thought in New South Wales and Van Dieman's Land to be the rock upon which the whole concern will be wrecked. People in New South Wales, where the price is five shillings per acre, calculate that sheep would not pay even at that, unless the purchaser command a large back run; and they prefer renting a section at twenty shillings yearly, which is about a farthing and a half per acre! Now, if the Commissioners had done wisely, they would have leased the land on seven years' leases, at one penny per acre, in square miles of 640 acres each, and this would have brought them a large revenue. They could have allowed also the renters to purchase the land at any time during the seven years' lease, at thirty years' purchase, which would have been two shillings and sixpence per acre. Because it is a bad thing to invite people to lay out their capital in the purchase of land, when the money is wanted for the purchase of stock.

* Gouger's "South Australia in 1837," page 76.

It will of course be objected, that this is entirely subversive of the very principles on which the Colony was founded—viz., concentration, and a high price of land to prevent dispersion; but in a country like South Australia, proved to be unfit for extensive cultivation, and only adapted to the growth of wool and the rearing of large cattle, how can such chimerical views of concentration be carried out? Though the grass is very fine in the neighbourhood of the mountains, the author having frequently brought home with him specimens of a sort of cocksfoot, six feet high, yet the general character of the country, as far as it is at present known, may be said to be such as to require from two to five acres to feed a sheep, and from fifteen to twenty acres to keep a cow, all through the year; therefore my advice to the emigrant is not to buy any land whatever, but rent it, till the price comes down, or at any rate till he is enabled, out of his earnings, to buy it of those who may have it for sale, at a discount, of which class of persons it is not difficult to predict that there are already many, and in a few years more the number will be increased. At Swan River, the author was the subscribing witness to a conveyance of some thousands of acres of land, where the consideration was only a halfpenny an acre!

The wages of labour are, no doubt, high; but this too is relative. Where rations are served out to those in the service of the Commissioners, the wages are 12s. a-week, though clothes, shoes, and comforts are very dear. There is a heavy duty on spirits and beer; and, in addition, the license to sell spirits costs £50 a-year, and that for beer £10. There are, however, notwithstanding these imposts, abundant sellers of both. The duty on cigars is 5s. a-pound, and on tobacco 1s. 6d. Of course there must be smuggling or evasion of so heavy a duty. The duty on foreign spirits is 12s. a gallon, and on colonial, when any malt shall be distilled, 4s. And the colonial government is sadly pinched for money; for, though the salaries and other expenses are moderate enough, there is not revenue to meet them, and a debt of £60,000, at ten per cent., is already incurred. This has given rise to amusing scenes; but the evil may still be remedied by a better scheme of finance.

There was, when Mr James was in the colony, and the population about 3000, plenty of work for the judge in the Court house of Adelaide. It is a wooden building of one room, and the busiest place in the township:—

Here, at ten o'clock, the worthy magistrate takes his place every morning on the bench, to dispose of the numerous cases that are brought before him for petty offences, assaults, and robberies; and on the Wednesday in each week he adjudicates in the Court of Requests, and decides summarily in all questions of debt which may be brought before him for sums under £20. After all is over, he acts, when the Supreme Court is sitting, as Solicitor and Barrister; and in this distracted Colony, where the vile spirit of party, led on by those pests of the place, Mr — and Mr —, is tearing the Colony to pieces, it is no small praise to Mr Wigley, the resident magistrate, to say, that all men concur in speaking well of him. . .

Here assemble most of the strangers, or visitors, from Van Dieman's Land or Sydney, and inquire the news—listen to the deeply interesting cases that are going forward before a hundred spectators who would be better employed ploughing, and then come away, praising the mildness, suavity, and justice of the magistrate's decision.

Then follows that account of a horrible and appalling execution which we formerly noticed, and which, from its appearance in many of the newspapers, led us to imagine that Mr James's book had been published some months since. Convicts are not allowed to be sent to the colony; and some of the old colonies would consider this a great hardship, as the necessary work of road-making and all public undertakings, are performed by convicts, and, consequently, at the cost of the mother country; though it would require one to be naturalized in New South Wales to join in this opinion. Convicts, or emancipists, have, however, found their way to Adelaide, though not yet in great numbers. They are generally men discharged from the whaling bands, who come to spend their money in the grog-shops, and remain as labourers. Runaways also arrive by the newly discovered cattle tracks; and, as they are handy fellows, and have a good deal of knowledge of colonial business, they are prized; and the police—for there is an armed police in the small community—look sharply after them and the natives.

We shall not trouble ourselves with the squabbles, the party spirit, and the bitter animosities which have disturbed the young colony. Of the South Australian Gazette, denounced by Mr Gouger and the other colonial functionaries, Mr James gives a very high character:—"The only thing that could be said against it was, that it appeared at very long intervals and with great irregularity, sometimes as long as three weeks intervening between the days of publication. But the best eulogium upon its fearless and independent character was, that it gave great offence to those who were turning their official situations in the colony to their own private advantage." The proprietors were lately prosecuted for a libel on Mr Fisher, the resident commissioner. The trial lasted six days! when a special jury, very oddly composed, brought in a verdict of guilty. The jury to try a libel case, gives one an idea of the colony. It consisted of three bullock-drivers, two carpenters, two stone-masons, a wittaler, (which we suppose means an innkeeper,) a tailor, a sawyer, a lodging-house keeper, and a publican. During the trial, the Supreme Court of Adelaide resembled a bear-garden. Though not very favourable to the liberty of the press when the press takes the liberty to tell unpleasant truths about themselves, some of the colonial functionaries are staunch democrats. One of them came into the office where a gentleman was employed in preparing blank forms of writs, summonses, and so forth, in the usual legal phraseology.

He exclaimed with indignation to the learned and gentle Jickling, "What's all this, sir?" hastily reading over the harmless words, "William the Fourth, by the grace of God, King of Great Britain and Ireland," and so forth, "Pooh! Pooh! We want no nonsense of this sort here! Kings indeed! Out with it, sir!—this is South Australia." The quiet Barrister was in a tremble, and, getting up from his seat, and rubbing his spectacles, in the simplicity of his heart assured him there was no treason in the words—that he had merely inserted them because it was the practice of the higher courts at Westminster. But he was inflexible, and said, "Strike it out, we'll have no king here—if you must have a name to the papers, put in O. G.," meaning that active and enterprising colonist Osmond Gilles, Esq.

In May 1838, there were in the colony 1500 head of horned cattle, 220 horses, and 12,000 sheep. Besides the important circumstance which was noticed in our former article, of a herd of cattle having arrived overland from New South Wales, another has reached the settlement from Port Philip. The cattle-drivers on both expeditions were intelligent persons, and have made valuable geographical discoveries in the course of their long routes. Mr Eyre, who brought the lot of 300 head from Port Philip, was twenty weeks on the route, and lost six horses for want of grass and water. He discovered a fine fresh-water lake—Lake Hindmarsh—fourteen miles long and seven broad, just outside the boundary of the New Province.

With the excellent advice, on many points, tendered by Mr James to the South Australian Commissioners, we shall not intermeddle. Our sole object is the safety of rash emigrants, and especially those ill-adapted to a new colony.

He gives an interesting account of a ride of six hundred miles, from Sydney to Melbourne and Port Philip, through the Illawarra country. This young settlement he considers likely to prove a formidable rival to South Australia. The chief advantage seems proximity to the older colonies, which, at the outset, is immense; but, to counterbalance this, South Australia is nearer the European market for the future exports of all the colonies, unless the Pacific, from Panama, should yet be bridged by steam. As little is known of the Port Philip settlement, we shall cite the opinion of this eye-witness. Building timber he states to be scarce, and the supply of water in the interior scanty, though the town is well supplied. The harbour is good, and ships ride right before the windows of the settlers; so that Melbourne, though having last year no more than a thousand inhabitants, enjoyed a considerable trade. Trade without people is, however, not easily understood. But the great number of sheep, as compared with the larger settlement, may explain the cause.

There can be no question, therefore, that Port Philip and the town of Melbourne is altogether a very rising settlement, and, from the richness and fertility of the surrounding country, as far north as Mr Edden's old station, forty miles, and westward beyond the Campaspe, almost without limit, nothing can prevent its prosperity. Already the sheep amount to 200,000 head, and are rapidly increasing; and as the means of the settlers who own these sheep are increasing also, it gives employment to the artisans in the town of Melbourne, which is even now a very bustling place down at the wharf, where six or seven schooners of seventy tons are seen receiving or discharging cargo from the neighbouring ports of Launceston, Hobart Town, and Sydney. The trade is principally with Launceston, which is distant only two days' sail, and consists chiefly of passengers backwards and forwards, carrying sheep and lumber from Van Diemen's Land, &c. Handy men get £50 a year at Port Philip, with board and lodging; and mechanics, shepherds, builders, and all other tradesmen, likely to answer in South Australia, get ample encouragement. If the headquarters of the South Australian Colony should be decided to remain fixed where they are at present, in such an inconvenient, inland place, Port Philip will soon excel it in wealth and importance. For a young man, not afraid of bushing it, and determined to look after his sheep himself, I am inclined to think that he would make more of £1000 at Port Philip in five years, than he could in South Australia.

But the price of mutton is much higher in South Australia—and likely for a time to remain so—than in any of the other colonies. It is for the Commissioners and the great Company to weigh Mr James's recommendation about immediately shifting their quarters to Port Lincoln; and, if town-lots and buildings on hand do not personally influence many of them, it is probable the change will be made. The commissioners themselves (witness Colonel Torrens' speech) seem as ignorant on many important points as the credulous emigrants. They must, for one thing, have imagined the Torrens a fine river, running up from the harbour to the town; for, in their written instructions to the resident commissioner, they constantly speak of the quays which were to be. "There will never," quoth Mr James, "be any quay in the town of Adelaide;" and the projected railway to the Port is an undertaking too magnificent even for New South Wales, with its surplus revenue, or unappropriated balances.

In this notice of Mr James's book we have done our duty—if not to the author, to the public; and we conceive it the duty of all who have ignorantly and unintentionally helped, through the press, to foster the prevalent mania, to come forward now and retract their error.

This paper has drawn to such length that we cannot, at this time, advert to Mr Matthew's book entitled "Emigration Fields," and his detailed scheme of conquering and colonizing New Zealand—for his plan amounts to no less. He does not, indeed, go openly armed; but, like the beggar in "Gil Blas," states his demands to the New Zealand chiefs from behind the bush, shewing, at the same time, the least possible bit of his ready-cocked musket. His work was meant to be limited to New Zealand; but, as all the world is agog about emigration, the shrewd publisher suggested that Mr Matthew should survey the entire fields. This he has done ably, though in a cursory way, before entering upon New Zealand—the settling of which fine and promising field forms, at present, the most difficult problem in colonization. As little more than "foundation rubbish" is yet thrown into New Zealand, we can afford to lay that problem aside for a month or two, and shall merely in this article cite Mr Matthew's opinion of South Australia as an emigrant settlement.

South Australia answers to the lower part of the basin of the Mississippi, and the city of Adelaide to New Orleans, with this difference, that Adelaide appears to be a salubrious place, while New Orleans is the wet grave. There is this difference, however, in the rivers, that the Murray, about one thousand miles long, is navigable only by barges, and is almost dried up in the summer; while the Grand Mississippi is navigable by steamers of three hundred tons, at all seasons, for nearly three times that distance. Excepting in the vicinity of the Gulf of St Vincent (where the South Australian colonists have commenced operations), and along the Murray, almost nothing is known of the portions of Australia, which go to form the territory of South Australia. The district around the Gulf is comparatively a good sheep pasture country.

The coast of South Australia stretches south-east, with sea to the south-west, from whence the prevailing winds blow (it is said for nine months in the year.) This will afford a moist and cooler air immediately on the coast, rendering it a rather favourable field for British emigration, being suited for a wool-raising country, and perhaps even for the raising of grain and cotton, and other valuable products; but from the absence of high land or mountains in the interior, from being surrounded on three sides by a great extent of hot arid continent, and from the sea being towards the pole, there is every reason to believe, that, excepting near the coast, there will be very little deposition of rain, as, though the winds from the sea be charged with moisture almost to the dew point, yet by reaching a warmer locality in the interior, they will acquire greater power of suspending the moisture, and give out none. A priori, we should therefore expect the interior to be extremely arid, and only fitting for an emigration-field for the Bedouin Arab, with his camel support. Even the districts near the sea coast exhibit features of great aridity of climate; the forest cover not general, but only straggled over the country in the cooler localities, and where the soil is deepest, and most capable of withstanding drought; the character of the tree-leaves, and the thin tufted nature of the grasses; the streamlets and rivers from the hills losing themselves when they come to the low country in marshes and stagnant pools, and only reaching the sea in winter: All these are signs which cannot be mistaken.

After noting the zeal and enterprise of those who projected and established the colony, he proceeds—and his hearsay statements should be compared with those of Mr James made on the spot:—

Upwards of five thousand persons are already at work, laying the foundation of what, in all probability, will be the future emporium of Australia—the city of Adelaide. The only plague-spot upon all this fine display of popular vigour, is that they have commenced by borrowing funds to carry on operations at ten per cent. per annum interest, a debt due by the colony, and which, it may be apprehended, will accumulate at compound interest faster than the wealth of the colony, and swallow up all. . . . In regard to the colony of South Australia, it surely would be absurd to expect capitalists to resort thither to purchase a comparatively unproductive soil at one, two, or more pounds per acre, when they could obtain land in New South Wales and the United States at one-fourth the price.

Eighteen months since, the debt of the New Colony, by the admission of the Commissioner, Mr Hutt, was £60,000. It must, by this time, be £100,000, or more, if the Commissioners are conducting the necessary public operations with spirit. Here is already £10,000 a-year of interest of debt on a population of between five and six thousand souls, and no public works completed—few undertaken. This interest, with the salaries of public officers, slender as they are, and the other expenses of the Colonial Government, will, we fear, trench sadly on the Emigration Fund, which was devoted to procuring “abundant”—that is, cheap labour, to compensate capitalists for the high price of land. But, if labour is to be made “abundant” by means of this fund, what are to be the bright prospects of labourers in the colony?—or, if the fund is to be diverted from the original purpose, to pay the interest of the debt, what advantage will capitalists derive to compensate paying three or four times dearer for land than in the other colonies? It is needless to multiply words: capitalists need not be longer hood-winked unless they choose, and labourers and artisans would do well to make their bargains with the Commissioners and the Company before they leave their own shores. We can only repeat, that, if they are ensured for a term of years of a much lower rate of wages than that held out, with provisions at the prices of England, we shall be glad to see tens of thousands depart for “The Land of Promise.”

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVOURITE DOG.

“For love, that comes wherever life and sense
Are given by God, in thee was most intense;
A chain of heart, a feeling of the mind,
A tender sympathy, which did thee bind,
Not only to us men, but to thy kind.”—Wordsworth.

AFTER briefest separation,
First with welcome at the door;
Ever, to our home returning,
Herald! glad to run before.
Though I see him now no longer,
Busy Fancy shapes him still,
From the blank unending, weary,
Which his form no more may fill.

Solitary am I often—
Never used it to be so;
In the fields, nor in the wild wood,
By the fireside's cheerful glow.
Then, whoe'er might else forsake me,
Not of all was I bereft,
Still had I one true companion,
Still one faithful friend was left.

Little, in that pleasant season,
I for other being cared;
Cheerful thoughts were ever with me
If that friend but with me fared.
Then I felt no urgent impulse
From my weary self to flee;
Of my kind as independent
As the world could be of me.

Very happy days, and many,
Have we two together spent,
O'er the hills, and through the meadows,
By the flowery-kirtled Trent.
There, with him all blithe before me,
Where-soever I might come,
I'd the sense in all my wanderings—
The strong feeling of my home.

Well he read his master's purpose,
Long foreknew the coming walk,
And, alive with joyful gestures,
His whole body seemed to talk.
Favourite stations had we many,
Where he paused to bask when won;
These now, in my rambles lonely,
I must see with pain, or shun.

Though the frigid scorn such feeling,
Though vain men all praise engross,
By the sum of past enjoyments
Am I taught to feel my loss.
Of the past was he a portion—
Of domestic bliss a part—
And, with dearest household memories,
Will be honoured in my heart.

BLANCHE DELAMERE.

CHAPTER VIII.

Love Trials of the Teens in High and Low Life.

FORTUNE, omnipotent over mortal woman, will sometimes disconcert the best-laid and most prudent schemes, and as readily those of the Duchess as of the dairy-maid. The three spring months which the Lady Blanche Delamere had promised herself were to pass like a vision of enchantment, in the fairyland of Shakspeare and Spenser, and the brighter regions of her own young romance, began in disappointment, and ended in endurance, if not in sorrow. Three days fled on wings of rapture; but, on the morning of the fourth, the young tutor—so honoured, so trusted by the Countess, so affectionately and frankly treated by her granddaughter—had left the Abbey of the Holy Cross without leave asked or given! The immediate or alleged cause of his disappearance, as explained in a letter to the Countess, was the illness of his mother, who had expressed a wish to see him; and, with many grateful acknowledgments for her munificent designs in his favour, he respectfully declined her future patronage. The Church was not suitable to his views, and he disliked the Army. He intended to prosecute the study of medicine, of which he had always been fond; and had no doubt of turning his acquirements into the means of supporting himself until he was qualified to exercise the profession he had deliberately chosen.

The surprise and displeasure of the Countess were extreme. Here was respect!—here was gratitude! Dislike the Church!—dislike the Army!—not suitable to his tastes and views!

"How, indeed, should they!—both are the professions of gentlemen. So, Blanche, my dear—how very late you are, child, this morning!—this Mister Fredrick Leighton chooses insolently to decline my patronage, and the line of life I had selected for him. He is quite right; he is unfit for the profession of a well-born man. He chooses to be an independent apothecary—a compounder of drugs—instead of my chaplain and secretary, and probably a future dignitary of the Church of England."

Blanche had her own deep and peculiar causes of grievance this morning with her runaway tutor, to which her troubled brow and clouded eyes bore testimony, though one which, fortunately, her grandmother could not read; but she was too high-minded to be unjust, and she held a proud silence, not only then, but all through that day, brooding and moody, and at times retiring to weep alone. Not one word had she deigned to address to her bonne, who had sat with her, dejected and silent, after several attempts at establishing their ordinary happy and confidential intercourse.

"'Tis thy hour for bed," said the mild Quakeress, who had meekly and compassionately borne the young lady's waywardness, in sympathy with her sorrow. "Thou art feverish and heated, dear lady. Shall I send Martin to undress thee?—or wilt thou permit thy grieved friend the pleasure of serving thee?"

"I'll have no Martin—I can serve myself, thank ye!" cried the young lady, proudly, though scarcely able to restrain her tears; and she broke forth—"You at least—you whom I have loved as a mother—revered as my better angel—you who, I believed, loved me—But 'tis no matter! Good night!—good night!" The Lady Blanche rose, and waved her hand.

"Nay, I will not leave thee thus. Thou knowest I could not sleep; and wouldst be sorry to-morrow."

Blanche was melted.

"Have I been very petulant?—sullen?—I fear I have—and I detest sullenness. And proud too?—but my pride is humbled to-day. How very condescending—yes, it was—how gracious and compassionate it was, in your nephew, Mr Frederick Leighton, to leave the message you delivered this morning to the vain, giddy, perhaps—yes, perhaps—the forward, unmaidenly person he must consider myself!—most generous to flee ere the forlorn or lovelorn damsel had farther exposed herself.—Oh, how I hate—how gladly I could kill myself—could I imagine that my heedless indiscretion had given this insolent, this most unparalleled presumption, but a shadow of cause!"

And scalding tears forced their way in torrents down the burning cheeks of the heiress. Her friend suffered this paroxysm of wounded pride and wounded affection to expend itself.

"And you—you won't speak to me—you whom I have regarded as my wisest and best friend!—struck dumb with pity, are you, for the love-sick girl whose silly, childish heart was given unsought, and flung back unprized?—How little all of you know her! No, truly—Mr Frederick Leighton need not have taken such deadly alarm. Oh! I could sink into the earth for very shame that he may have gone hence with so false, so humiliating an idea of my real sentiments. Surely, ma bonne, you who read my inmost heart, know that I am incapable of the most unwomanly weakness of giving, were it to a prince, my love unsought."

"I know it well, believe firmly—thou couldst not do aught unmaidenly;—thy faults are on the side of the pride which would die and make no sign. Wert thou thy grandmother's milkmaid, instead of her proud heiress, thou must be wooed to be won. Thou art under strange misconception, dearest; deeply dost thou in thy displeasure wrong poor Frederick; deeper still thine own noble nature, which will yet do him justice. He has followed the clear line of duty and honour, probably with no little sacrifice of vague hopes, idly and too fondly cherished; and, in thy esteem, he will yet obtain no mean portion of his merited reward."

The tears of Blanche rained fast and faster; but their source lay deeper in her heart than the scalding drops which pride and indignation had wrung forth. Was it conscience barbed the arrow which, since the delivery of Frederick's complimentary and simple message, had rankled in her proud, and maidenly, and now desolate heart? Gentle as was the hand of the maternal Quakeress, she kindly and wisely forbore to probe that young bosom, quivering in its first-felt woman's agony; and when the more gracious and healing shower was spent, even Blanche had recovered herself. She dried her eyes, and half-smiled. "This is all very foolish; but, thank heaven, no one can guess save you. . . . If Mr Frederick Leighton must needs go home—if his duties here were become so unpleasant to him—though, once, he seemed to like to be with us—might he not have said so? Did he fear that, because I was childish enough to shew my satisfaction at the arrangement for my studies made by the Countess, his inclinations were to be forced?—or was it that he must kindly steal away lest the silly girl should not have fortitude to see him part?"

"Deeply thou wrongest him in thy proud speech, lady, to whom thy secret thoughts do more justice. Thou knowest the natural diffidence—the utter want of self-confidence and presumption—of him on whose spirit, nevertheless, the yoke of dependence would have pressed hard, though imposed by a lighter, more delicate hand than that of the Countess. In this matter, pardon me, thou art thine own accuser—thine own tormentor. Frederick's healthy, right mind pointed out the necessity of his going. If in the manner there was fault, that was mine:—I approved the measure, and I urged speed. He has dallied too long—been but too sensible to the pleasures and fascinations of a life to him enervating and perilous, and for thee, noble maiden—pardon that frank sincerity without which my friendship for thee were of no worth—for thee unwise—for me, thy friend, unworthy. That is done which time, which society must shortly have accomplished, but only when estrangement might have been more painful, when hopes, unwisely placed, but fondly cherished, might have made that death to thy presumptuous playmate which to thee had been sport."

"Sport to me the pain of Frederick Leighton! Nay, then, I have a right to blame you—you ill understand me. No hopes that he could have formed in relation to me—to my own self—me, the poor orphan Blanche—could I ever dare to view as presumptuous; impossible as I am aware their fulfilment might be, while the customs of society conspire against the happiness of all womankind, and most against those in the highest station—mine, whose seeming independence is but a mockery. But enough of Frederick; do not mistake me so far as to imagine that, notwithstanding the accident of my birth—and heaven knows that hitherto it has been no blessing—I ever dared compare myself with man or woman but by the one standard of superior intellect or greater goodness. I require to reflect that I am placed thus high; and, do believe me, but very rarely feel it—and never when I am very amiable or yet very happy. Why do I esteem thee, in thy pinched coif, petulant and wayward as I have been to-day, far beyond the noblest matron in the land that I have ever seen, or am, I fear, likely to see?"

"I will not call thee flatterer," replied the gratified gouvernante, with her softest maternal smile, "but I will call thee dear, fond enthusiast, and pray that thy generous, expanding mind may guard, while it sustains, thy pure and ardent heart:—and now good night indeed. Thou hast forgiven Frederick Leighton? Many years may roll away, and change come to all of us, before we see him again. But thou wilt do him justice; for thine is a nature to sympathize with the noblest struggles of the inward warfare—and those have been his."

"Had he but suffered me to shew how firmlly I could have seen him depart—how frankly have cheered his honourable purpose; but it matters not;—and so farewell, Fred, whom I have liked too long, too young, and perhaps too well, ever to have been in love with; that was impossible, you know, in an intercourse so kindly and familiar, and, until these last days, so frank as ours."

The bonne half smiled. "Spite of thy rank and conventional relations, how true to thy sex's instincts art thou—to its haughtiest caprices, as to its deep tenderness!" were her secret thoughts.

Whatever poets and dramatists may have recorded, the dawning love of sixteen is rarely found dangerous to the lasting peace of its victim. The Lady Blanche, bravely as she had borne herself before the most trusted friend she had on earth, wept sadly enough for one half-hour when darkness and the bed-curtains had fairly veiled her weakness. She felt as if she must be miserable while life endured; and so she rose and re-perused in the moonlight the scene in "Cymbeline," which had formed her reading on the former evening, when her heart had thrilled so rapturously while her young tutor eloquently dilated upon the exquisitely feminine character of the heroine—and then she remembered, half-resentfully, how her bonne had abruptly put an end to the twilight reverie which followed the reading. She knew that it was idle to return to bed, as repose to her was impossible, however bravely she should bear herself during the day, so that not even she should guess how deeply her affections had been entangled. It was therefore with some vexation that the Lady Blanche awoke next morning, at the usual hour, after a long and profound slumber. No, no—the dawning, innocent love of the teens never yet cost enamoured swain or maiden a whole night's sleep; and, upon the whole, in wise and kind hands, like those in which Blanche was placed, is very easily manageable.

By active and varied in-door employments, and out-door exercise, and frank and frequent conversations about the absent hero, those dreamy reveries which are the food of passion were prevented; and discussions on the duties and real difficulties of the manly part which Frederick had chosen, and by which he must abide in working his way to independence and distinction, dispelled illusion and cast down wild imaginations. He was to be a physician; and if possible, an eminent one—or his should not be the fault. Although the irritation produced by the reproaches of the Countess, by moving the generous ardour of Blanche's nature to the defence of her absent friend, kept him constantly in her mind, Mr Frederick might have been mortified to learn from his aunt's letters how soon any painful sense of his disappearance faded in that noble household. Other occurrences intervened, and other interests arose. The able organist from a distant town who had long been Lady Blanche's instructor, was ordered to come more frequently; and the rite of confirmation, to which she consented with great inward reluctance and with tears, flatteringly ascribed to the tenderness and warmth of her devotional feelings, was followed by several solemn festivals at the Abbey, and by a few visits, strictly en famille, as the young lady had not been presented at Court. The open profession of adherence to the Church of England, exacted from her, had endeared her to the Countess, whose original unreasonable dislike seemed changing into doting, superannuated fondness.

"What would Frederick say to my step of this day?" said Blanche to her friend, on escaping from the entertainment given to the Bishop, the Earl and Countess of Fanfaronade, and a small "distinguished" party at the Abbey, in honour of this important event in family annals—"to that step which we have so often debated—and which, save for my scruples, he seemed to regard as unimportant."

"What says thine own conscience—whose silent response is more to thee than the approving or condemning judgment of all mankind?"

"That I have taken my first downward step, and with my eyes wide open, venial as the wrong may seem, and pure as is the motive—to content my poor grandmother. On the rights of conscience—of my private protestant judgment—girl as I am, my mind has never wavered."

The subject was not stirred again, and weeks flew by serenely and happily, because busily and profitably to health and mind. Gradual relaxation had taken place in both medical and educational discipline. Lady Blanche in her studies required rather the rein than the spur, good Dr. Hayley said; and the Countess generally adopted his commonplaces, and used them until she fancied them the original inspiration of her own wisdom. The heiress in her long mornings was therefore left much to her own devices; and to her, sage and womanly as she had grown, few were more pleasant than getting beyond the Park walls, and passively renewing her acquaintance with the friends of other years. Among these was Phoebe Waterton, the eldest daughter of the poacher. Of this dispersed and ruined family few knew anything and no one said good. The father was skulking from justice, helplessly lamed; the eldest boy had been transported for a petty theft; the mother had died of a broken heart; Phoebe alone, the fair, pretty, merry Phoebe, the joyous playmate of the Lady Blanche in her early escapades to the strawberry-pickers and weeders in the Abbey gardens, was doing well, and still living under the protection of her grandmother, who was one of Blanche's out-pensioners, through the ministration of her Quaker bonne. One day a visit was to be made to Dame Waterton, and Blanche also volunteered—"It is months since I have seen little Phoebe. I daresay she cannot leave her old grandmother, save when at work—field-work. I hope it will not make her ugly, she is so pretty now; I am sure I should like it myself—hoeing and hay-making—far better than scrubbing and dish-washing; but Phoebe fancies house-service genteeler, and I promised her a good turn with the housekeeper. If she could smuggle her into the laundry, or the dairy, grandmamma would never be disturbed with the sinful example of giving bread to a poacher's child.—That poor family! I cannot think of them without sorrow;—corrupted, dispersed, ruined. I know not whether aristocratic game-preservers, with their insulting, irritating, tyrannical laws, or the desperate invaders of those laws, are worst; but I know with which I sympathize."

The pony phaeton which Lady Blanche usually drove, was left within the Stoke Delamere gate, and with her friend she took her way to the solitary cottage of Dame Waterton, which was a little way beyond the village, and on the outskirts of one of the farms of him who, without the park walls, was often named Squire Grimshaw. It was about the hour when Phoebe might be expected to rest from her field labours; and there she was, sunk in a corner of the settle, weeping, and the old dame stamping on the clay floor, in great apparent wrath and excitement. As the light elastic figure of Blanche appeared on the spot where her presence usually made sunshine, Phoebe started up, half-screamed, and, drawing her shawl suddenly and closely around her, sunk down, and wept afresh.

"What is wrong, Phoebe? Dame, I fear the lady's visit is ill-timed," said the Quakeress.

"Grannie cross, Phoebe?" whispered Blanche, laughingly. "Oh, never mind. Mrs Martin will hire her, dame—very soon, too. One of the laundrymaids is going to be married—oh, to your old admirer, Stephen Duck, Phoebe; but don't despair for that, lass."

"O my young Lady Countess, who was always so good to the good-for-nothing quean! O Missus Thompson, marm, has she not shamed us all—there, where she sits, the vile, light hussey! I'll brain her! yes, I'll brain her!—to bring me to shame in my old days. Never will she get creditable place, never honest husband; the 'rection house is the place for her—and too good, too."

The wretched girl, taking her hands from her face, cast one wild, despairing look on her grandmother, and rushed from the house. Her slight and very girlish figure, and pretty baby face, contrasting with her enlarged size, too plainly told her story, without the angry commentary of the furious dame. Blanche, inexpressibly shocked, became suddenly faint, and leaned against the little mantel-shelf, which it had once been the pride of Phœbe to deck, and which yet shewed some of her own old toys.

"The vile, wicked slut!—her wickedness will kill my Lady too!"—

"Peace, peace, dame—fetch a cup of water, if you can—and not another word," said the Quakeress.

The dame, "sadly flustered," as she said, had not performed the duty when a village matron entered, screaming—

"Dame Waterton! your grandchild has drowned herself in Squire Grimshaw's pond! See what comes of your worrying the poor wench, as if she were the first girl in the parish had ever gone wrong, or would be the last either! Lor' bless me! my Lady Countess here, too!"

Her dreadful information acted as a restorative to Blanche, who sprung out of the cottage, and flew to the spot indicated. It was a little pond, bordered by willows and alders, and divided from the path to the cottage by a narrow strip of meadow. The despairing and maddened girl had darted across the meadow, and at once plunged into the water, from which she had been rescued, in less than a minute, by a labourer who was trimming the trees. She lay on the grass, completely drenched, but, by the time Blanche reached her, perfectly sensible.

"Thank your God with me, Phœbe, who has mercifully preserved you from a rash and fearful act." And, stooping, she took the girl's hand.

"O my Lady, do not speak so kind to me! It kills me worse, ten times, than grand-dame's scolding."

"She will not be so harsh to you again, poor Phœbe. I will beg her not. Here she is coming to you, poor old body, to comfort you. She was so proud of you, Phœbe."

"Oh, she will kill me—she will kill me—she vowed she would—if he would not marry me—and, oh, cruel! he won't. Why did they drag me out of the water, and not let me die at once, and never see the light again! Oh, if it were but dark to hide me!" And, wrenching her hand from the grasp of Blanche, she writhed in despairing anguish.

The party from the cottage had now come up; and the crone, relieved from immediate fear for her granddaughter's life, again began to pour abuse upon her, as if the strength of her righteous indignation were to atone to the bystanders for the girl's sins. The Lady Blanche stood the image of shame, horror, and grief. The Quakeress directed that Phœbe should be removed; and remonstrated, though in a gentle tone, with the clamorous grandame.

"Be merciful wi' the wench, dame," said the labourer who had dragged Phœbe from the pond, "or thou'lt drive her far enough. . . . If the chap do not the handsome thing by thee, Phœbe, poor lass, the neighbourhood will cry shame on him."

"He wo'not, he wo'not," shrieked the dame. "Did not the wretch but now go down on her knees, and crawl like a yearth-worm before him, at the parson's honour's, who axed him and coaxed him to make the wench an honest woman?—and first he denied, the villain! the child was his, and then swore he wo'not marry an inch of thee, disgrace of me! Get thee gone to the work-house with thy brat—or to bridewell—for my roof shall fall on me ere it cover thee! Why, Robert, did ye take her out o' the pond, when she was well in it? The vagabond is looking after the smith's daughter, who has a portion will buy him a team! I ax a ten thousand pardons, my Lady; but that wench has put me mad—I was so proud of her—and she'll never hold up the head of an honest woman."

"This is a terrible scene for thee, dear Lady," whispered the Quakeress; "couldst thou not return alone to the gate, and so home, or else wait me there?"

"Dreadful indeed—but unavoidable—a dark chapter in woman's life; but I must now see to the end of it. I cannot feel it in my heart to leave the wretched creature with this outrageous woman, in the present temper of both—nor can I desert her. Say, could we not place her somewhere? The laundry—dear old sanctuary! No servant from high to low dare whisper against me."

The matron could not approve of this scheme, nor could she abandon Phœbe; and, trusting all to her intelligence and humanity, Blanche returned alone, on her request—and within the park gate sat long under a tree, ruminating deeply on those tales of woe and guilt which, even in this quiet neighbourhood, had reached her guarded seclusion, and upon the exposed condition of young girls in the rank of poor Phœbe Waterton. Her early regard for her old playmate, and recollection of the painful circumstances which had deprived Phœbe of a mother's guardian care, at the critical period of maiden life when it becomes the most necessary and valuable, deepened the interest which her fate inspired. Before Mrs Thompson returned, she had provided a respectable temporary house for the girl, and seen her seducer in presence of the clergyman and Mr Grimshaw. She described him in few words, as a very young and good-looking rustic—ignorant, selfish, and, perhaps, brutal. The power of marrying or not marrying—of deciding a fellow-creature's fate—seemed to have mightily augmented his self-consequence, especially since the squire and "the young Countess" had become parties in the affair. But the price of a team was his dogged ultimatum.

"So the unmanly boor, who has won her simple and affectionate heart, would graciously accept poor Phœbe on these terms," said Blanche, indignantly. "I would give her the price of ten teams if I had it, had she the sense and spirit to respect, in herself, fallen as she is, a far nobler creature, and to despise this fellow. Can any good come of such a marriage?—I will talk to her myself.” Even the benevolent Quakeress was startled by the idea of Phœbe, were the offer in her power, refusing, by marriage, to solder up her broken reputation; although, in such a union, she saw no hope of happiness, and no foundation, warranted by ordinary prudence, for these two young, ignorant, and improvident creatures uniting their fate. She accompanied the Lady Blanche next morning on her visit to the forester’s cottage, where Phœbe had obtained shelter. They found her engaged in needle-work, which, blushing the deepest scarlet, she hastily concealed, as she rose tremblingly to make her little curtsy. Her work had been some sort of baby-clothes, which poor Phœbe was fabricating from her maiden finery.

Blanche looked upon her sad, pale, childish countenance, with deep compassion.

“Ah, poor Phœbe, you have been very foolish, and you have suffered, too,” said the Quakeress. “You have gone through a fiery ordeal; nor is the worst past.” And Phœbe, fancying this something very wicked, yet pitying herself, wept abundantly, while murmuring—

“I know I am very, very wicked; but, oh, I am very wretched too.” And her tears flowed faster.

“We are not come to upbraid you, Phœbe, my poor girl,” said Lady Blanche, whose heart was smitten. She knew her playmate to be untutored, vain, and credulous; but she was also sweet-tempered, affectionate, docile, and, in spite of her frailty, richly endowed with that native delicacy which seems the inheritance of the great majority of uncorrupted women, in whatever condition they may be placed. She made no complaint of her betrayer, cast no blame on him; though, far beyond all that she had suffered from remorse, shame, and the harshness of her grandmother, was her agonizing sense of the brutality with which he had cast imputations upon her modesty, and charged her, in rude vindication of himself, with misconduct, which the clergyman was moved to repel and indignantly rebuke. On this point only her feelings betrayed her into the expression of anything like resentment or indignation.

“He might have refused to marry me—perhaps I deserve to be no man’s wife; but to say, and before all the gentlemen, I was a light, bad girl—oh, that was wrong, that was cruel!”

The sense of injustice and unmanly dealing had cut her to the soul, wounded her trusting heart to the core, and beyond healing.

“Surely, then, poor Phœbe, you could not think of marrying the man capable of such base, unmanly villany?”

“Alack! he won’t have me,” murmured Phœbe. “I have no portion. The parson begged him, the overseer threatened, I went down on my knees, as grand-dame said, and he was only angry, or laughed at me, and said light, jeering things. Oh, if poor girls would take warning!” moralized Phœbe. “But, perhaps, if my Lady or Squire Grimshaw ordered him, he might, though I am over bold to speak of it.”

“If we bribed him, forced the unmanly fellow to do you the poor justice in his power!” cried Blanche. “Oh, no, Phœbe. He does not love you; he never loved you; he is unworthy of you.”

Phœbe looked up in transient surprise.

“Him you must learn to forget, to despise—respect and love him as a husband, you surely never can.”

She turned to her friend.

“Those enforced parish marriages, how I loathe them! To me they seem unutterably detestable; and, to women, how miserable, how utterly degrading! Forget this man, Phœbe—avoid him—earn your own honest bread. Rear your infant in peace, if God give it life. Respect yourself, and you will be respected; and, as a well-conducted single woman, you shall, after all that has passed, never want a friend in me.”

Phœbe wept profusely, ere she murmured, artlessly—“But, my Lady Countess, I should never then be an honest woman.”

In spite of her habitual gravity and decorum, the Quakeress smiled at what she knew her pupil would regard as “the honest-woman fallacy;” and Blanche, who was too much interested and excited to sympathize in these mirthful feelings, replied, earnestly—

“What shall prevent? Other than an unfortunate girl you cannot be; but an honest and reputable single woman you may be. Look, then, Phœbe, for your redemption to yourself, not to the pitiful atonement which may be wrested from this young man, at the price of true womanly dignity and future peace.”

“Neither a maiden to have a suitor, nor yet a wife,” was Phœbe’s melancholy thought; while the Lady Blanche energetically addressed her.

“Phœbe Waterton, give me the satisfaction of rescuing you from the farther consequences of your folly, in a degrading and most unpromising marriage. Have the fortitude to encounter a brief shame, which cannot be worse than it is now, rather than a life-long, gnawing sorrow. I leave you now to your own reflections.”

The result was, that Phœbe reluctantly resigned her hope of marriage; while her rude lover, suddenly changing his mind, pressed his suit; and, though the clergyman was at fault, the parish overseer surprised, maids and matrons in consternation, the Lady Blanche resolutely maintained that Phœbe was in a better moral and social position nursing her unfathered babe in her grandmother’s hut, than as the “honest woman” into which, at the expense of a few pounds, or promises and threats, she might have raised her.—“I have but one regret,” said she, when her friend returned from her first visit to the young mother—“It is, indeed, hard that the innocent babe must bear a deeper stain of shame than the parents. There is nothing in Christian society more anomalous and cruel than the condition of illegitimate children.”

"Art thou prepared to say it may not be for the best—may not ward off greater evil?"

"That the heaviest or the longest punishment should fall not on the erring but the innocent? Oh, no, that cannot be right; yet it may be better that poor Phœbe's babe remain a stigmatized child, rather than the first of the offspring of an ill-assorted marriage, entered on with loathing, dragged on in strife and probably hate—the first of a family trained in misery unto all vice of temper, if not of life."

"Thou wilt not, then, approve of our patched-up parish marriages on the Delamere estates?"

"Quite the reverse. If I ever have power, I shall discountenance such alliances to the point of tyranny. How much happier, and, to my feeling, more respectable, may simple Phœbe become, an unfettered single woman, earning her own bread, than the partner on sufferance of that coarse-minded, ignorant fellow, and the mother of a wretched brood, whose first lessons might be their father's ruffianly upbraidings of their mother's shame?"

"But where the transgressors really loved, and wished to be united?" said the Quakeress.

Blanche reddened, as she gravely replied—"Such cases are beyond my jurisdiction—love, real love, must be a law unto itself—the parish and the lord of the manor are no more entitled to disjoin united hearts, than to bind together hating or uncongenial minds."

Squire Grimshaw had "come good to the parish" for the consequences of Phœbe's indiscretion, and, farther to conciliate the young Countess, had dismissed Phœbe's lover from his employment in a manner which precluded any one from hiring him. Phœbe was to be sent to the neighbourhood of Chester, to nurse her child, under the care of a sister of the Quakeress, who readily promised to look after her; and a load was removed from the heart of Lady Blanche. But the tale of Phœbe's undoing had, meanwhile, reached the ears of the Countess, through the ordinary medium of village gossip, her maid, Mrs Martin; and so outraged were her ideas of morality and parish discipline, that Mr Grimshaw was commanded to have the fellow fetched back from Lincolnshire, whither he had gone, and married to the worthless hussy at the point of the beadle's staff, although his own should be exercised on his bride's shoulders ten minutes thereafter. The Lady Blanche was almost sick with vexation. She took courage to speak to her grandmother—to reason with her. The Countess, though not made aware of one half the extent of her grandchild's knowledge or interference in this delicate affair, was petrified at the young lady knowing, or, at least, at her appearing to know anything whatever of so shocking and shameful a business; and the delicacy and womanly feelings of Blanche were deeply wounded by the tone of her censure and reproaches. She retired in tears to her own apartment; and a long while elapsed before she could unbosom herself to her gouvernante, which, at last, she did abruptly.

"Were ignorance innocence, I might deserve grandmamma's reproaches," she said; "but, alas, it is not!—I am very young to be sure—at least I am not old; but I have been born into a world of suffering and sorrow, as well as of grandeur and gaiety, and I can neither obliterate my understanding, nor put my senses of hearing and seeing, and power of involuntary thought, to sleep, because I am a young woman—a young lady. I cannot help reasoning on what I am compelled to feel. I hoped my strong, natural sense of justice and of female honour, and my true sympathy with poor Phœbe, might have supplied my want of experience, and yet not have exposed me to the suspicion of indelicacy. I am not satisfied that I have done wrong; but I begin to feel the world will be too strong for me: one by one I shall be forced to surrender whatever I consider good and right, that is opposed to its opinions, be they right or wrong, and become the slave of custom, like all womankind."

"Thou wilt not," said her friend. "The degree and activity of thy opposition may become a question of prudence; but thou wilt not allow thy understanding, thy conscience, the divine instinct of truth, glowing in thy young and pure bosom, to be either perverted or extinguished."

The Lady Blanche shook her head mournfully, yet half-playfully, replying—"These sons of Zeruiah be too strong for me!—yet I shall manfully give battle."

This battle of wild opinion and extravagant speculation, as he deemed it, was frequently maintained with Dr Hayley, and partly in fun and drollery. The Earl of Fanfaronade had been tried in these skirmishes; but he was found too dull for a butt. Her strange wild flights of thought and imagination often threw the worthy doctor into consternation, or left him, like Time with Shakspeare, toiling after the Lady Blanche in vain, while her bold doubts, and bolder questionings, sometimes half frightened him, not so much for her orthodoxy as her sanity. Her genuine, unaffected indifference to the advantages of her birth, and, as it often seemed, to life itself, shocked him yet more than her wild notions. It was unnatural, and, in one so young, almost revolting.

"Of what use is life to me, since of none to any one else?" would she say. "A pain—often a burthen. I have no power of independent action—my existence is without value, not alone to society, but nearly to any one human being."

"You are then, I presume, a utilitarian philosopher," said the Doctor, smiling.

"Yes—but one who holds dispensing knowledge, happiness—even innocent pleasure—the highest mode of utility; and feels herself of small account indeed."

"It is wrong—nay, almost impious to say so, Lady Blanche. Had Providence, who has been pleased to plant you in the highest station, no gracious purpose to advance in so doing?"

Blanche shook her head. "If so, I am unequal to it. But I doubt. My grandmother—has she fulfilled her high destiny? Or my great, great grandsire, him called the wicked Earl; yet he who was far more powerful, and far more rich?—But if Providence allot our social position, then also that of the millions on millions around us, who live in misery, and perish in ignorance. Ah, no, no! Providence has blessed us every one with reason—and given us revelation; and we pervert the one, and act as if we believed not the other—which, in truth, we do not. Who believes with the understanding? Few, if any. Who obeys? Oh, not one!—and least of all, I.” This was said with deep emphasis, and in a tone of despondency.

“None are faultless,” said the good soothing-syrup Doctor; “few without blame, though surely, Lady Blanche, you judge yourself harshly.”

“Pardon the interruption, Doctor. I guess what you would say. I have been a safely, if not well-brought-up girl: I break no positive commandment—I do not kill—I do not steal—I do not swear; but do I not violate every day the purity of conscience, and live far, far below my own sense of right; immeshed in the evils of insincerity and selfishness, and enslaved by the tyranny of custom and false shame? Loving my Creator with my whole heart, where shall I find strength of mind, moral courage, to act as if I indeed loved my neighbour as myself, even while that love is burning in my human bosom?—where, with some power of knowledge, and probably one day to have much of fortune, fortitude to enter upon a life of resolute good?”

Doctor Hayley, even when arguments were at hand, often fancied it wisest to permit these morbid feelings and distempered fancies to exhaust themselves in combating each other. He was not afraid that the Lady Blanche would go abroad to the lanes and highways, or yet to drawing-rooms, to preach a purer or higher morality; nor that, in due time, the world, though it might not gain her judgment, would compel her obedience.

She was about to be put to the test; for Lady Blande claimed her promised guest, and Blanche finally left her grandmother and Holy Cross with deeper concern than she could well account for; and with more ornaments, directions, and injunctions than ever young lady carried to London before or since. The town physician was to correspond with the village Esculapius, and daily bulletins of health and adventures were to be despatched to the Countess and her now inseparable Doctor.

“Dr. W——’s duty is likely to be a sine-cure,” replied Lady Blande to the “more last words” of the Countess, touching her granddaughter’s health, and symmetrical perfection of figure.

“I have never seen Lady Blanche, always charming, look half so handsome as now. Even the tardy roses are budding through the snows at last.” And she gently tapped the delicate cheek, now wearing the softest tint of maiden blush. “Budding into richest beauty,” whispered the graceful lady in her dulcet tones—“gather them who may.”

“My grandchild has improved wonderfully of late,” said the Countess, “both in health and person. She looks, indeed, almost too formed for her years—too womanly. Her Quaker governante has some merit in her training system:—and, by the way, Doctor Hayley, as well as myself, is of opinion that it should be persisted in, even in town, alternating with equestrian exercise—of which, Blanche, as a Delamere, is extravagantly fond.—Riding, and the love of horses and hounds, is, indeed, a hereditary passion in our family.”

Lady Blande was ready to promise for everything. Had swimming or ballooning been declared necessary, or a family propensity, she would have undertaken for Blanche enjoying those modes of exercise.

Until the eve of her departure, Blanche had never once spoken of Phœbe Waterton, now some weeks a wife, by her own glad consent at last, and to the delight of her grandmother.

“She ought to be the best judge of her own happiness,” said Blanche; “and, if apprehensive for her, and somewhat grieved, I am not offended. But to the point. My grandmother has quite enriched me to night—and Phœbe shall not want the team which would have made her acceptable once, and may be useful still.” She gave her new and well-replenished note-case to her confidante.

“Thy marriage gift may not be wanted now—yet needed in time—there is no present haste,” said the Quakeress.

“Yes, there is; she shall lose no chance of comfort in her new state that this small help can give her—you will do all that is proper for me; and, pray, don’t be niggardly—of your own property you never are; remember I shall be rich some time or other, and, if I may not have even the pleasure of doing a little good to an old playmate, of what value will wealth be?” She added, in a low and earnest voice—“My older, dearer, more unhappy playmate—have you made those inquiries which may give us a clew, yonder where we are going, upon the trace of her—Rosa?—Rosamond Weston?”

“I have—but, alas! with no success; and, although I had obtained some trace, I fear that poor lost one is far beyond your help.”

“Do not say it. Is it not singular, pitiable, that, of the very few young girls whom I have ever known and cared about, two—and those each in her own station the most gentle and amiable—should be thus the victims of their own folly, of their exposed position, and of that horrible licentiousness of which women dare not think, and which fills the world with misery surpassing my comprehension;—which makes me shudder and recoil when I should act. But we will seek out Rosa. You, dear bonne, have knowledge, goodness, and experience; I have a brave will, and I shall have power. I would have snatched poor Phœbe from a life of, I fear, wretchedness and degradation, and most certainly of poverty; and I will, through your agency, rescue Rosamond Weston from the sin and slavery of a life of involuntary vice, if it be possible!" The young woman of whom Blanche spoke, was the daughter of an humble medical practitioner in Stoke Delamere, and had, as matter of grace and of necessity, been admitted to the Abbey with one or two more young persons of respectable family, when the heiress, on her first appearance in England, had been taught dancing. Rosamond Weston was some years older than the Lady Blanche, and a fair, delicate, and elegant girl, whose gracefulness and beauty of person, and sweetness of manners, the little Countess had admired with the passionate fondness which children often conceive for young women who are kind to them. The sudden death of her father left Rosa a penniless orphan; and to this hour the Countess continued to lament the handsome sum she had thrown away when a subscription was raised in the neighbourhood to place the girl at school, in order to qualify her for a governess. "Fifty guineas thrown away on so worthless and ungrateful a wretch—one of those vile creatures who employ their beauty and accomplishments, forsooth! to entangle and seduce thoughtless young men of family and fortune. Do you know, Doctor, I have been told that the Honourable Mr Horatio Devereux, the second son of my esteemed friend Lord Fanfaronade, the heir to his mother's pretty estate, and one of the members for the county——But why explain to you, who know Horatio so well—so rising and promising, and indeed so exemplary a young man—so much the pride of his family and his tutors—who made that fine speech, you know, on the Malt-Tax, and wrote that immensely clever pamphlet about something, which Hatchard sent down to me, with so eloquent a letter from the author? But, indeed, he was always one of my pets. Well," whispering, "there's a mistress in the wood, in that quarter, too. It is truly shocking; but so I am informed."

The Countess did not give up her authority—her all-knowing Martin, namely; and the Doctor, who heard nothing new, was duly affected.

"Some wretched creature, who has successfully woven her toils around even this well-principled, very clever, and highly moral young man. But it is all over now, I believe; nor have I, my friend, in any respect committed myself with Lord Fanfaronade. The character and connexion are, certainly, in every way unexceptionable. And, thank Heaven! in matrimonial alliance, the Delameres need care little for either title or fortune."

One might have fancied the Lady was herself meditating matrimony. The subject was not new to the Doctor, though her Ladyship had never before spoken so explicitly. He was well aware that her family vanity would be unwilling to sink the title of Delamere even in a ducal coronet, and that she would be much better pleased to bestow dignity than receive it. Besides, nothing could be easier than the united interest of the families obtaining that title for the Hon.

Horatio Devereux, which, in the event of his marrying the Lady Blanche, must, at all events, descend to their son. With his other advantages, the husband-elect of the Countess' fancy was not a mere penniless younger son. He was heir to his mother's snug estate of £7000 per annum, of which he already enjoyed above half the income. Had the Doctor spoken his inmost thoughts, he would have said that it would be all in good time to settle the matrimonial interests of the young lady some seven years hence. Indeed, he saw no great use or advantage in her marrying at all, which event would effectually disturb his little pleasant arrangements, and probably not contribute much to her own happiness; but, if it must be so, then Horatio was just as eligible as any other young man of rank. He contented himself with merely hinting that it would be as well not to disturb the young lady's education, and the confirmation of her recovery, by the introduction of a topic so agitating.

"Nay, nay—for that, you might trust to my prudence, my good friend," replied the gratified Countess. "My granddaughter, in one sense, is a mere child. But special circumstances create special cases, my good Doctor—and the extinction of an illustrious house is matter of no ordinary consideration. My project is, if it be the Almighty's will"—the Countess, when she had made up her own mind, was always very resigned—"to present my granddaughter at the last drawing-room of the season, and to marry her immediately thereafter; if her health be quite firm—for which I have now small fears. The young people may spend the honeymoon at Lady Fanfaronade's pretty little place in Staffordshire, a toy-thing in the way of a mansion, but which at her death will be Horatio's; and, I then intend that until Blanche is of age we shall form one family—though I shall not object to a town establishment."

Though the Doctor was far from satisfied, he had not a word to object; and he had a strong reserve of hope in the suspected contumacy of the young lady. That the Hon. Horatio should be insensible to his good fortune was not probable; and the long friendliness of the whole Fanfaronade family, together with the excessive empressement of Lady Blande, left him no doubt as to them.

CHAPTER IX.

Our Heroine in a New Scene.

It was certainly not the fault of her lively, agreeable, and thorough-bred hostess, if the visit of the Lady Blanche to London was not delightful to her. She was the distinguished and caressed inmate of a well-appointed and admirably-regulated establishment; where the most refined luxury seemed but to minister to taste and ease. Lord Blande was found an agreeable and high-bred man, less lively in parts than his Lady, but never in the way of social pleasure; though, beyond his graceful bow and smile, the joke of gentle dulness, and a faultless toilet, he might not contribute much to the general stock of entertainment and enjoyment. There were two very pretty children, unspoiled and engaging; and Mr Horatio Devereux was, as Blanche speedily informed her bonne, one of the most gentlemanlike and agreeable persons she had ever seen—quite a new style of a man—with an ease and simplicity of manner which gave her a new idea of the boasted politeness of the fashionable world—a perfect contrast to the stiff dignity and elaborate courtesy of his father, and so much more simple, quiet, and self-poised than his sister.

"I may say of his manners," remarked Blanche, "as is said of the accent of the finest speakers, that he has no particular manners of any kind."

Mr Devereux had been the only dinner guest on the evening that the fair travellers reached London; and the ladies had not been five minutes in the drawing-room when Blanche remarked—"I am surprised, Lady Blande, that you did not mention your brother to me, among your other attractions; I have a sort of pre-adamite recollection, or rather knowledge of him, from hearing grandmamma and Dr Hayley celebrate his great talents and orthodox Tory principles. Once, indeed, at an election, I had a peep of him from the nursery-window, when he came to pay his devoirs to the Countess; but I am afraid I fixed my regards principally upon his beautiful horse"—

"Oh! Horatio!" replied Lady Blande, in a tone of easy indifference—"he is so much one of ourselves, or a second myself, that I never should have thought of marshalling him the way to your good graces. He is, indeed, an uncommon, a very superior man—a brother to be proud of; though I should not have fancied him at all likely to captivate Lady Delamere—but there is no answering for the caprices of old or young ladies."

"He does not seem in too good health, I fear," said Blanche.

"No, that detestable House of Commons half killed him last year, and he was again attacked with a low nervous fever at the beginning of this season. He is still a sort of invalid, though now much better; only prudently keeping out of society a good deal, and, I suspect, glad of an excuse. Indeed, he never liked our May-fair mobs;—he was always fond of literature—and latterly politics have quite absorbed him, though I doubt if he be quite the sound Tory her Ladyship gives him credit for. Horatio is, I fear, likely to break bounds some time or other; but he is a very good old young gentleman for all that. Do you know he is eight-and-twenty—quite a papa, a Methuselah, in your idea;—and so fond of my children, that I am sometimes jealous—if a mother could be jealous—that he haunts me as much for them as myself."

The gentleman spoken of appeared with Lord Blande, who, in compliment to his guest, did not go abroad; and an evening passed away, the most exhilarating, if not the most happy, that ever the Lady Blanche had spent in her life. The conversation—gay, lively, and, if not absolutely witty, something better, glancing swiftly and gracefully on all subjects in that touch-and-go style which charms and yet leaves no distinct impression—was of a kind which bewildered while it pleased the young stranger. It was like nothing she ever had heard or joined in before. It was, she said, "the lightest allegro movement of conversation—champagne-talk;" and she apologized earnestly for having kept her bonne so late out of bed—perfectly astonished to find it was one o'clock in the morning before she had fancied it ten o'clock. Upon farther reflection, Blanche was at a loss to guess whether Mr Devereux was serious or in jest in maintaining her side of an argument, which had greatly amused Lord Blande;—namely, that it was the duty and happiness of every member of society to labour with head or hands, and to employ his talents as best qualified, for the common advantage; but he had seemed very earnest and sincere; and they had already discovered one common sympathy, in admiration of Handel's music, and for a style of music with which Lady Blande seemed entirely unacquainted, with which the spirit of Blanche had been imbued while a child, living with her Roman Catholic friends in Syria.

"Fancy me singing with any one save Fred, or good old Palmer the organist, or, at most, Dr Hayley!" said she. "Mr Devereux has, indeed, very little voice, but I am sure he has musical sensibility; the musical part of his nature, wherever that may lodge, has received the Promethean touch, wanting to ninety-nine in the hundred of accomplished musicians, so far as I know anything of them: besides, his love of my dear, old, magnificent, soul-swelling chants, might cover the multitude of musical defects. But it is time I were asleep now, and more than time you were. I wish to be in good looks to-morrow, that the new doctor may not inflict more than enough of professional penance upon me."

The "new doctor" was the most courtly and indulgent of London lady-curers. It was necessary to prescribe, as prescriptions are the seed from which fees spring; but the Lady Blanche was left entirely in the hands of her hostess, save as to late London hours. Dr W—— approved of everything that his provincial brethren had done, and also of everything in which they had been circumvented or tacitly opposed by Mrs Thompson. The patient was assured that she had nothing to do but keep good hours, repose till she was inclined to stir, take exercise till she was inclined to rest, and enjoy herself, to be quite well; and the Doctor went on his rounds, to tell his fair and fashionable patients what a magnificent, unbroken Arabian the future Countess of Delamere was, and to stimulate their curiosity to besiege the doors of Lady Blande to obtain a sight of a greater natural curiosity than any the Zoological Gardens afforded.

"Is it true, Doctor, that she preaches how we should all work, and that she can churn butter and get up fine linen herself?" asked one lady, a few days afterwards. The Doctor smiled sceptically.

tically. "Lord Blande says so. I wonder what his insipid Lordship would be fit for under the new order of things?—could he tie a cravat, or dress a lobster, or a salad perhaps, if that be work? For Mr Devereux, he can write books, or at least pamphlets: his fortune is made."

"It is really cruel, however, in Lady Blande," said another lady, "to shut us all out from the benefit of the young lady's philosophical lectures on our duties and privileges, in being raised to the dignity of usefulness, in the way of making loaves and milking cows."

The prohibition was rigid. Lady Blande heeded little the sneers and drolling of her acquaintances, and pleaded the delicate health of her young charge, and her own implicit promise to the Countess. In her house Blanche remained, therefore, in as effectual seclusion, in the heart of London, as if at the Abbey of the Holy Cross. Yet the most assiduous, kind, and considerate attention was paid to the comfort and amusement of so cherished and honoured a guest, and every morning produced a fresh scheme for the pleasures of the day. She had been privately at the theatres, and at the Opera House more than once, and had been disappointed; and she had also seen Exhibitions and Picture Galleries, and the shops, at hours too early for the encounter of the fashionable world; and, what was much pleasanter, she had spent some delightful May mornings in rural excursions; and one long day was passed at Richmond, and part of two at Windsor, with Lady Blande, her brother, and the children. Mr Devereux had occasionally been her squire, when she had no chaperon save her bonne, to whatever lion-shrine awakened curiosity in a rural bosom, and also to places of which the fashionable denizens of London had either never heard or thought of before—to a Quaker meeting—a synagogue—the Borough Road School—a Bible Society meeting—and an Infant School.

The amusement of Lord Blande at such visits was so much beyond his ordinary tone of good-breeding, though rarely indulged in the presence of Blanche, that his lady was obliged to chide his mirth; while her brother drily said—

"I begin to think that Mrs Thompson's taste in sight-seeing, or that of her lady—for it is between them—may be quite as refined, as it is undoubtedly more intellectual, than our own exclusive tastes."

"Are you bit, too, Horatio?—I fancy I may expect to see you all go off in a hackney coach to the Tabernacle some morning soon; or shall it be Greenwich Fair?—I could fancy it pleasant enough pastime squiring the younger lady there; but what do you make of that tiresome Quakeress?"

"I do confess that she is de trop sometimes," replied Mr Devereux. "Eleanor, could you not persuade this worthy matron that it is sinful to idle and gad about in this way."

"I am afraid it will become as needful to persuade her to forget that Mr Horatio Devereux engrosses a great deal more of the society of her pupil and nursing than is quite proper. That tiresome, imperturbable woman does vex me. A hint is totally lost upon her. I must, however, congratulate you upon your increasing influence, Horatio: I will not say Blanche is attached; but she begins to fall into the habit of expecting you—of missing you—of reckoning on you in all our little plans."

"And I am falling into the habit of admiring her beyond all womankind; the freshness and strength of her character are a continual feast—even the eccentric and visionary nonsense which fills her exalted little head, and makes her sufficiently absurd at times, speaks nobility of nature."

"She is indeed a charming creature, and I prophesy will make a greater sensation in society than many a regularly-trained demoiselle of quality," said Lady Blande.

"Then, now is your time, Horatio," rejoined Lord Blande. "If she do not lecture, nor insist on setting us all to very hard and perhaps filthy work, I could not desire a more charming sister-in-law. But the sooner the nail is struck on the head the better," added the sagacious Peer. "I have a notion the young lady, like her father before her, has a will of her own, if it is fairly roused."

"No will at present opposed to Horatio's hopes, I am confident," replied the lady. "But I must not make you too vain. And let me add, that, if I did not believe you truly appreciate her qualities, and will make the best husband of any man in London to my young friend, you should not have my good wishes;—for she is truly a noble creature—with more frank, generous heart than would furnish the bosoms of half-a-dozen marrying misses."

"And more genius than would irradiate a galaxy of blues," said Mr Devereux.

The compliment was repeated to Blanche in a few minutes afterwards, as she attended Lady Blande's toilette. Her Ladyship was dressing for the greatest ball of the season, whither she went with affected and, perhaps, real reluctance.

"But I must shew myself at D—— House—no one would believe else that I had an invitation; and, heaven knows, they are as plenty as blackberries. Blande won't come, lazy fellow, till late, after you are asleep; and Horatio has cut the gay world altogether. Between them and the children you will be well amused—and how I shall envy you! The demands of society are the saddest penalty attached to a certain rank in life. Among your many reforms, pray do, dear Blanche, reform the system of London routs in the first place."

"I will, at least, place myself above its inflections."

They returned to the drawing-room, where all admired the splendid costume and brilliant beauty of the lady; and, in a sudden fit of gallantry, Lord Blande resolved to attend his wife himself. The Lady Blanche was thus left to the versatile powers of amusement of Mr Devereux, and the company, for a time, of the children. Other evenings of the same kind occurred, in which talk about the excursions of the morning, or those planned for a future day, a little reading, a little music, a little chat, and a world of desultory but agreeable discussion, whiled away the time; and, at length, led a man, experienced in the female heart, to conclude, that

"A little love, when urged with care,
May lead a heart, and lead it far."

Blanche fell into musing fits. Her grandmother's anxiety for her early marriage was no secret to her, and had often excited the latent spirit of opposition.

"I must be married, not that I may be believed and happy, but that the world may have a chance against being visited with the overwhelming calamity of lineal heirs being wanted to the honours of Delamere!" she was wont to say to her nurse. "My uncle Yates, too, is most anxious for my marriage."

After her intimacy with Mr Devereux, the idea of marriage—if not entertained with the usual feelings of a young lady in love—became much less repugnant. To her bosom confidante she frankly owned that she thought Mr Devereux very pleasing, very well informed, and possessed of many of the qualities she should prize in a husband. Above all, were his domestic tastes, and the love of quiet and intellectual pleasures, and of music and literature. She had been exceedingly happy in his society and that of his sister, even in London; and liked them far better, in ordinary intercourse, than any persons of their rank she had ever seen.

"Thy heart is touched at last, proud maiden," said the Quakeress, half sorrowfully.

"Hearts!—what have grand princesses like myself to do with hearts, who must be married for the glory of our families and the advantage of our heirs! Were I even independent, is free choice permitted me? Below a certain rank, were any man, though a Plato or a Washington, to address me, the kind world—they call it 'the understanding of mankind'—would impute motives of mean ambition, or others more sordid still. I might suspect their existence myself:—and how could love, and reverence, and trust unbounded, harbour in the same breast with doubt of the beloved? While, on the other hand, how would the false world judge and brand the traitress to her rank, to the delicacy of her sex, her duty to her family and to society, who disgraced herself by contracting what it is pleased to call an unequal or low marriage, though with the man she loves and honours! Oh, no!—the world is in everything too strong for me; I must in the strife ever succumb at last."

"And if Mr Devereux has obtained the approbation of the Countess, must thy consent follow?"

"Why, so I presume; that is, if the princess must needs be married, which, however, she would rather decline. I see no one I like more. I could have fancied something so far different"—and Blanche sighed inaudibly—"but it was a girl's dream, a fond illusion of imagination; perhaps some broken dream of my pre-existing, some shadow of my future state of being. I am in the world, and it claims its own. I will endeavour to bend my will to what it dictates as my duty so far as I am able; exalted happiness is for few, and certainly not for noble heiresses."

"She will be this man's wife," thought the Quakeress, sadly. "A blighted portion for so fair a nature—so lofty and yet so tender—so loving, and faithful, and womanly; yet will the world pronounce it blest and enviable; and she will strive to acquiesce in the hollow belief, and live, if not unhappily, yet far below herself."

"Does Mr Devereux's fancy accompany all the wild flights of thine?" asked the Quakeress, one evening, when Blanche was recounting a conversation on De Grammont's picture of the Court of Charles, in which they had differed in opinion—"does he comprehend all thy poetical and half-metaphysical nonsense?"

"Alas, no!—how should he when I but half understand myself?" said Blanche, laughing. "I must pardon him there, since his wings were not impeded in the East, nor yet full-plumed during a course of romance-reading under the beeches of Holy Cross, with a young poet, now a philosopher grave and erudite; but there are other points on which I have ventured to ring Devereux, and he has sounded hollow, or given no response. Our conversation, but lately, on that odious book which embodies the very quintessence of whatever is most false, heartless, and profligate in the mutual relations and obligations of the sexes, makes me fear that we entertain opinions, wide as the poles asunder, on points which men and women in society seem tacitly to have agreed to banish or bury, but which I cannot banish from my thoughts while I remember poor Phoebe Waterton, and, far more compassionately, Rosa Weston.—Is there no trace of her?"

"None; she was not one to blazon her shame; she has hid herself somewhere—but I have not yet given up inquiry or hope."

While this conversation was passing above stairs, Lady Blande was amicably rating her brother for, as she said, "rousing the Quixotry of Blanche about that trumpery book De Grammont. You men, with all your conceit, don't understand women half so well as we do each other. Blanche is new to life, and will, no doubt, yet learn to curb her thoughts, or, at least, to hold her tongue like other people. But just now her head, and I dare say her heart too, is filled with many wild vagaries and soaring notions about the purity, and honour, and rights of women—which, as mere opinions, no one would condemn;—but then I have a notion she is just the damsel to act upon them."

"Act upon them—certainly; can any lady entertain ideas too high of the honour of her sex?" said Devereux.

"Certainly not," returned the lady, coldly; "but Blanche is of a temper which would make her break off an engagement, even at the altar, with a man by whom she conceived another woman had been betrayed or wronged; on these matters she has very peculiar notions. One thing candour compels me to say—you have evidently made a favourable impression upon her; she is, probably, as much attached to you as she is capable of being to any man, until the spirit of Plato is unsphered, or something in that grand way; but a breath might destroy your hopes."

"I conceive your meaning, Eleanor," replied the gentleman, seemingly shocked. "But satisfy yourself; that unfortunate, that infatuated business is completely at an end; Blande will tell you that it is now in the hands of my solicitors. The children"—

"Well, well—never mind," interrupted Lady Blande, eagerly, unwilling to hear more. "There," kissing him, "we are friends again; and now you have my cordial good wishes. Indeed, Horatio, it went to my conscience to have you under my own roof, dangling after my friend, and so fine a creature too, and so very eligible a match—and that unfortunate liaison hanging over your head. Now, to-morrow, pen a proper epistle to grandmamma, with a postscript to the Doctor; but be sure to secure Blanche's consent before the favourable answer comes."

Mr Horatio Devereux bowed acquiescence, and immediately took his departure; though soul-stricken and melancholy, yet resolved to pen the letter, to obtain the consent.

"Poor fellow, I pity him!" said Lord Blande. "Rosa was so devotedly attached to him; and it is so old an affair now: and really the children are very pretty creatures. Do you know the girl is very like you, Eleanor?"

"Don't mention it, I entreat. It is a dreadful annoyance, and from any other quarter would be insult. Thank God, it is over now, and my brother saved! It has gone near to destroy him. Conceive Horatio's pining for the death of that infant, as if its life had been desirable? I have no patience with such preposterous nonsense!—As much concerned as if it had been a lawful child!"

"Probably more, Eleanor; as Horatio may conceive that he has something to reproach himself with. And a man's child is still his child, whether it be his wife's or not," added the sapient Peer, while his Lady blushed angry, though virtuous, ruby red. "Besides, Horatio was really much attached to Rosa and her children. She, indeed, poor thing, bore her faculties meekly."

"Surely, my Lord, you forget yourself," replied the lady, sharply. "At all events, I don't suppose you would wish this fallen angel for a sister-in-law, and her babes for your children's cousins? Let Horatio make all the atonement in his power. My brother is a man of honour—and only too humane and susceptible where female frailty is concerned. He has properly left the affair to his solicitors, who are men of sense. And, I trust in heaven, Blanche will never hear of it; for I affirm again, she is just one of the high-flown damsels who would be off at once. How shocking, to discuss my brother's misfortunes with my husband!" The lady withdrew in haste.

About four or five years previously to this period, Rosamond Weston—the money subscribed to finish her education having been more than expended—waited upon Lady Blande, in consequence of an advertisement for a preparatory governess, whom her Ladyship wished to engage for a friend in the country. Miss Weston called more than once, by desire, and both sister and brother were much struck with the beauty and elegance of the poor girl, whose soul seemed to hang on the response of the lady, and to sink into despair when a doubtful answer was returned to her modest application. Mr Horatio Devereux was a man of fine sensibility—all the world said so—and his feelings were deeply interested for the beautiful petitioner. To do him justice, he, in the first place, repeatedly urged his sister to do something for the girl. She was very young, very lovely, tolerably accomplished, and an orphan—strong pleas. Lady Blande promised; and, had she been a fairy, with the power of making fairy gifts and conferring happiness as easy as speaking, or by the touch of her wand, Rosamond Weston would have been relieved and protected. But she was, on the contrary, a fashionable lady, whose time, thoughts, and, above all, money, were fully engaged. She, however, kindly gave the girl hopes of better success; and her brother assumed the character of her ambassador to Rosa, certainly with no premeditated scheme of villainy; for he pitied, while he admired. Mr Horatio Devereux was not a rake—not a libertine. He was, as Lady Blande said, a man of elegant taste and quiet manners—fond of literature, of music, and of refined female society; and very delicate in all his feelings about the sex. The imprudent and friendless girl, unable to receive the visitor whose kindness and gentle courtesy had sunk so deeply into her desolate heart, agreed to receive messages from Lady Blande, sometimes real, sometimes pretended, at places of meeting agreed upon, which she could easily do in the search for situations upon which she was daily despatched through London by her school-governess. No dishonourable advantage was taken of these assignments—probably none was meditated; and, mutually enamoured, and forgetting, or never once recognising any rule of propriety or prudence, this desultory, unacknowledged courtship proceeded until, at the commencement of winter, Rosa, on a particular morning, came to the accustomed rendezvous all in tears, and informed her—she durst not give him any familiar name even in her thoughts—that an engagement in a minor theatre had been offered to her, and that the mistress of her school insisted that she should accept of it at once, or, at all events, leave her house. Her whole soul appeared to recoil from the idea of such a life—from the nightly exhibition of her person, her talents, and graces, and allurements, before a promiscuous or rude throng; and Mr Devereux warmly and indignantly partook of her feelings and vowed that she should never go upon a stage. Her plan was to return to the north, where, perhaps, she might obtain a little work, perhaps some pupils for music; but she had no friends—none! and when Mr Devereux urged that she should try one more chance, remain one more month in London, and wait yet another letter from his sister, she was easily persuaded; for where her treasure was, there was her heart also! To remain at his cost was, she feared, very wrong—and it was very repugnant to her delicacy—but to go was death; and she procured a little lodging at Camberwell, and remained for the time specified, and for ever! It was an after consolation to Mr Devereux that he never had indulged any deliberate scheme of seduction. His stars were in fault, and Rosa's guardian angel had fallen asleep; but "it was all over now;" and no one in her unhappy circumstances was ever more delicately treated, or honoured with more respectful observance.

"It was very wicked and shocking," Lady Blande said; "but the girl must either have been a perfect idiot, or have thrown herself in his way; but it was all over now!"

And the Maison—to use one of those foreign terms by which English virtue reconciles itself to vice and cruel injustice—was even winked at by the elderly ladies of the family, and such of Horatio's sisters as had come to the years of understanding the world, as the means of preventing greater inevitable evils and more dangerous ties—or connexions with rapacious and extravagant actresses or ballet-dancers—until the protracted celibacy, and obstinate fidelity of Devereux to his mistress, begat fears of another kind—"either that he might never marry at all—though his elder brother had no family—or marry that artful creature." Though Mr Devereux had fashionable London lodgings—"convenient," as the Irish say, to his duties as a legislator—and an apartment in his father's town-house, when he chose to occupy it—far the greater part of his time, for the last four years, had been spent at what even his high-bred sisters jestingly termed his "country-seat," a cottage near Streatham, in which he had embowered "his Rosa" and their two children. Thither he was in the custom of riding out every Friday after the House rose, and in all weathers; and there he remained until duty and patriotism brought him back to town on Tuesdays.

At "the country-seat," in the enjoyment of life's best and sweetest blessings, no more embittered to him either by forethought or reflection than served to give zest and piquancy to sweetness which otherwise might have cloyed, he lived in happiness, whatever might have been the occasional remorseful feelings of that delicate companion whose mind he had cultivated, whose sensibilities he had cherished, and who, loving him with passion far more profound than in the hours of her girlish devotion, was told that she was to see him no more. Here, where he made a home, and planted its dearest joys and treasures, Mr Devereux was never again to appear. He was going to amend his life—he was going to be married! Devereux had not, indeed, told her so himself. Accident spared him that pain.

Save a ramble on the Continent in the first months of their connexion, and a stealthy trip to the Isle of Wight, Miss Weston had hardly, even for a day, gone beyond the precincts of her sweet and sequestered, but most precarious and degrading asylum, save when, at hours not liable to remark, "her protector" had sometimes taken her an airing, or to see some celebrated spot in their neighbourhood. Neither the refined Devereux, nor his gentle mate, were of the intrepid order of sinners, who brave or defy the world's opinion; and, though the respectability of the neighbourhood at first hotly resented their settlement, they had conducted themselves so discreetly—that is to say, they had paid their bills so punctually, and been so unobtrusive in their manners—that the connexion was now as leniently regarded as anything of the kind could be by wise and respectable people. The beautiful and well-dressed children of the cottage were universally pitied, and sometimes caressed, by ladies when met walking with their nurse-maid in the lanes; and, by the less scrupulous villagers, "the darlings" were admired and praised. The death of the youngest child, a mere infant, had been followed by a long and severe illness of the mother, from which she was not yet recovered; and it had deeply affected the spirits of her "protector," to use another elegant and delicate English periphrasis.

We have said that Mr Devereux's "fine feelings"—his family and friends could never enough celebrate their trembling delicacy—were spared the pain of telling his unfortunate companion her destiny. On his final visit, gently sad and subdued in manner as he ever found her, until the joy of his arrival and the charm of his society had attuned her spirit to whatever might be the prevailing tone of his, there was this day melancholy change which could not be mistaken. After an ineffectual struggle to command her feelings, broken murmurs and irrepressible tears were the only reply to his constrained and chill, but courteous greeting.

His visits alone had ever brought sunshine and gladness to that lonely home; and the happy, unconscious children rushed to "papa," as at other times, and clung around him.

"Be well now, mamma!" said Horatio, the boy, a quick and affectionate child, whom his "young" papa had graciously honoured to bear his own honourable name, because it was the dearest name on earth to "poor Rosa."

"Go, sir! you trouble your mother," said Mr Devereux, peevishly, pushing back the child.

"Go, dearest Ho; go, poor boy," whispered the sinking mother, in a choking voice.

"Yes, mamma, since you bid me." And the boy led away his little sister.

"You are spoiling those children, Rosa," said Devereux, sharply, and after a painful embarrassing pause—and the over-stretched heartstrings snapped!—

"Those children!—your children—our children! Oh, tell us our fate, Devereux!"

Mr Devereux durst not trust him to look towards the unhappy young woman, who, with clasped hands, breathed these simple words in the low, thrilling voice of exquisite mental agony; yet was he pleased that probably the gossip of the servants had anticipated his "painful but most necessary duty." He had no friend to whom he could depute so delicate a task—and write he could not. A letter, he feared, might drive Rosamond mad, and lead to the most painful scenes, and perhaps to fatal exposure; and he knew his own power with "poor Rosa," and had resolved not to leave her until she had "come to reason, and was resigned and composed." With some effort, he worked himself up to sternness and displeasure at what he called her "impatience, and unreasonable nonsense." What, he at last demanded, though very mildly in tone, had she looked for? This refined and honourable Mr Devereux inquired, "What could she expect else?" and for a moment the wretched girl glared upon her former lover with an expression which made him quail to the inmost recess of his dastardly spirit. But this was not the natural mood of Rosa. She had felt as if a shot had passed through her brain—her flesh quivered and burned for an instant as with the thirst of blood—and then the strange feeling was gone—and, lowering her eyes, she replied, almost inaudibly, "Nothing—oh, nothing! For myself, I have never expected—never presumed. Hence my weakness—my incredible folly—my deep guilt—my misery, my most intolerable misery! I have long even foreseen this day—known it—felt it. It has been ever present with me—and yet I lived on."

The children were now heard returning with noisy mirth; they brought in fresh-gathered flowers and fresh water-cresses for papa—not gifts to propitiate love—of which they had neither doubt nor fear, though this time papa had forgotten to bring them any of the promised pretty things from London. He hastily rung the bell, and dismissed them. Not such had been their usual reception. It was a new agony for their mother; yet she said—

"Thank you for sparing me their sight. No, Devereux—for myself I expect nothing, deserve nothing. But these children!—how shall I henceforth think of them?—how look upon them, and endure to live?"

The feelings of Mr Devereux were anything but comfortable. Compassion, remorse, nay, affection, battled with ambition, or with what he wished, rather than succeeded, in thinking his paramount duty to his family—his father's, not his own—and, above all, to himself. Lord Blande was right in believing him even tenderly attached to "poor Rosa and her children;" only he loved himself—nay, his rank, his place in the estimation of that small section of mankind which he called society or the world, and the means of increasing his fortune and influence—a great deal better; and gradually, as the point was debated in his own mind, better and better, until the appearance of the titled heiress banished every doubt, and left, as the only difficulty, how she was to be gained, and Rosamond to be most prudently, and kindly, and generously dismissed. Yes! Mr Devereux determined to be both delicate and most generous! Rosa's gentleness and devoted attachment merited good treatment at his hands. Her children—they were now hers only—should be sent to France to be educated, and their mother should have an annuity sufficient for her few wants. She would retire to some quiet, remote neighbourhood, where nobody could know her, and, perhaps, might marry.—But, no! he was almost sure she never would marry. Delicacy, love for himself—for deeply, fondly, devotedly had poor Rosa loved, and must ever love him—would prevent a step which, by a seeming incongruity, but a really natural sentiment, he thought of with jealous, angry pride at the same moment that he was meditating eternal separation. No, not eternal; perhaps, at some future time, in some change of circumstances—Mr Devereux could not premeditate injury to his future wife, or the violation of his own conjugal duties; but, while his ambition and his pride demanded the hand of Blanche Delamere, whom he certainly admired fully as much as he pretended, other, and softer, and habitually-cherished feelings made him reluctant to surrender for ever the heart of "his meek and endearing Rosa!" Mr Devereux was, in short, bewildered in a maze of sentiment and sensibility. He would have been both deeply mortified and hotly offended, had Rosa been able to hear of their separation—of her dismissal—without sorrow and despairing agony; and he was equally alive to the necessity of that event preceding his addresses to Lady Blanche. As he rode out that morning to Streatham, his consolatory thought was—

"I know poor Rosa loves me so much as to submit patiently to any arrangement I may shew her to be for my advantage and happiness. Whatever her weaknesses may be, no creature can be more patient and disinterested than poor Rose."

This very favourable opinion made Mr Devereux the more angry with her unreasonableness, even while thankful that she had divined the cruel purpose in his breast, and spared him the shame of revealing it.

But we have left Mr Devereux in the midst of an explanation which cost him such an effort.

"Speak not of me," continued his companion. "Tell me of these children. Once you seemed to love them—and I!—how shall I now dare look upon them, when already I shrink from the eyes of that poor boy!"

"And surely I do love them, and you too, Rosa, were you only yourself, and reasonable." And he attempted to draw caressingly towards him the shuddering and recoiling girl, between whom and himself a wall of separation had been raised which neither bribes nor blandishments would ever again overthrow.

"Please then to sit down, madam, till we discuss the matter of your children," said the now incensed Mr Devereux; and he began to recount his wise and generous designs. "I am aware that it could be no more pleasant than right that you should educate the children. They will be carefully attended to, and you may occasionally hear of them. Of the boy there is no fear. If he conduct himself properly, he shall not want my countenance nor that of my family; and for the little girl"——

The explanation proceeded no farther; with a shuddering groan, the unhappy mother of the children fell into a fit, and Mr Devereux, though shocked, deemed it wisest, on the whole, to take advantage of her insensibility to withdraw.

The old gardener, who attended the cow, and trimmed the shrubs, and mowed the grass-plats, and defended the premises from rats and robbers when the master was absent, led out "master's horse," as in happier times.

"So Madam is to be sent off, your Honour, we hear," said old Robert, whom the fear of being thrown out of a good place had strangely emboldened. "Well-a-well; I should ha' got a warning though, too; and so should Molly, my wench—but I knowed it must come to this some time, when your Honour, like other grand gentlemen, turned off your Miss and married a lady. Well-a-well!—I reckons we'se get wages and board, Molly and me, to Michaelmas, any way—that's but justice. I'm cruel sorry for Madam, too; for, an' she were a ——, she was one of the best kind of 'em."

Every fibre, every drop of aristocratic blood, in the body of the Honourable Mr Horatio Devereux boiled and quivered to the sound of the contumelious epithet bestowed upon "his Rosa"—and old and new wrath, and a host of maddening and conflicting feelings were expended, in laying his horse-whip about the shoulders of the gardener, who, ignorant of the delicacies of gentlemanly feeling, had supposed he might use plain speech, especially after "Madam had been cast off."

"Dr'at the chap!" soliloquized Robert, after Mr Devereux had sprung to his horse and galloped off, as if justice were after him—"Dr'at the chap! but I ha' a mind to take the law on him, for striking me only for calling the poor wench leave that he made her his ownself!"

The Honourable Mr Devereux did not again trust himself at Streatham, nor yet change in one jot his fixed purpose regarding the inmates of his "country-seat." Again, "upon his honour," he assured his sister that unhappy business was for ever over. The children were to be sent to France as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made; and "their mother?"—to her Mr Devereux had penned a long letter of admonition and advice for her future conduct. She was still very young and very attractive, and might be exposed to the arts and temptations of man—if she felt, it should not be through the temptation of want.

While these gracious things were passing, Mr

Devereux was often as "low, and nervous, and nonsensical," as it provoked his sister to see and call him. But it was, thank heaven! all over now; and that day he had spent a long morning in Westminster Abbey, the sole attendant of the Lady Blanche. Her bonnes had gone to spend the day with some "Friends" in the country, and Lady Blande set down her fair guest at the Abbey, (whispering, "Just the spot to woo a heroine,") under "excellent care," and took her up when Mr Devereux—and he was not more rash nor more presumptuous than other gentlemen of his standing—flattered himself that he had only to speak and be accepted. He had done all but speak, and more than words could perform; and Blanche had not frowned, nor withdrawn her arm, nor reared her neck into her swan-like, unconscious, and involuntary, haughty attitude of superiority. At one time, indeed, when he gently upbraided her impatience for the return of Lady Blande, and imputed weariness of his society, she had said—"I am not tired of your society, Mr Devereux. So far from it, I find no one so entertaining, pleasant, and friendly." At his murmured, rapturous thanks, and sudden, passionate pressure of the very tips of her gloved fingers, she looked confused, and, as their eyes met, blushed and trembled, and walked away, and then stopped to question him of Nelson's tomb. Mr Devereux was skilled in the pathology of the female heart. That evening Lady Blande could not doubt that her brother and Blanche were heart, or—to her it came to the same thing—hand-plighted. They sat apart, talked together, sang together, and appeared completely absorbed in each other—Devereux in gay and exulting spirits, Blanche more softly, sweetly, and gently feminine than she had ever before appeared. Lord Blande went off to one of his clubs, tired, he said, of playing nobody in his own house; and, at a late hour, his lady, who had held out alone over a dull, fashionable novel as long as patience and eyes could hold out, playfully pointed to the pendule, and told her brother he must be off.

"How very late!" cried Blanche, rising, and blushing, as much at her own thoughtlessness as at the gallant, complimentary reproaches of her admirer, who, as he for the first time kissed her hand, after he had embraced his sister, craved leave to wait upon her next morning.

"Silence is maidenly consent," said Lady Blande, gaily. "Come to us as early as you will, Ho.; but go now." And she pushed him away. "Poor Mrs Thompson, who will not take slumber to her eyelids till she has seen her lady cared for, must be half dead by this time, with her early travels and her late vigils, and may, perhaps, have a word of exhortation to give," she added, archly.

Lady Blanche hastened to the comfortable apartment where her friend, as usual, awaited her—"Pray, don't scold me. I am punished by remorse; it was so heedless, so thoughtless, so selfish—as heedlessness ever is—to keep you waiting. And why wait? Yet I should have been so disappointed had you been gone to bed! I have so much to unbosom. For how many years, now, has this unrobing hour been one of the happiest of my days? What would become of me, deprived of our confidential intercourse? I can never forego it."

Blanche, more from the impulse of an almost morbid delicacy, than any pride of personal independence, chose to be in many things her own lady's maid. She hated, she said, to have Martin, or any she did not both like and love, fiddling about her person, and annoying her with those offices of undressing and hair-brushing usually performed by servants. At this hour, her bonne ostensibly read to her, though more of the time was generally consumed in talking of the adventures and incidents of the day.

"I have a world to tell you of to-night," said Blanche to her very grave friend, whom she feared her tardiness had seriously displeased: "so very much, and wonderful, too, that I am sure, after you hear all I have gone through, done, and suffered, you will pardon me."

"I would have thee first listen to me, lady. I have to tell what, I fear, may grieve thee. Yet it must be told."

"What!" cried Blanche, while the idea of Frederick Leighton struck on the conscious heart, which first felt that it had that day been unfaithful, where fealty, though never claimed, was given. And she was glad that the thick, dark tresses hanging over her arm, to be brushed, veiled her deepened colour.

"A sad tale—yet one that it concerneth thee deeply to hear, while it is yet time. The man to whom thou hast all but pledged thy hand, to whom thou art unconsciously losing thy heart, is bound to another—bound by ties which the proud and the false may condemn, which man's laws may defy, but which the God who seeth in secret and judgeth his creatures in mercy and equity, regardeth." The Lady Blanche was effectually roused, and yet inexpressibly relieved. It was not, then, of Frederick—what but good could be heard of him!

"I have found Rosamond Weston! Her betrayer, the author of the life-long disgrace and misery which brings neither suffering nor shame to him—though her own passions, her own folly, should have been partly the cause of her betrayal—is the man who offers thee honourable addresses—thee, pure-hearted, high-minded maiden." The outline of the tale we have related, was rapidly traced; and Blanche listened earnestly, but with the entire composure which gave her anxious friend assurance that, however her delicacy or her pride might be hurt, there was no deep tenderness to wound, no jealousy to awaken.

"What shall I do first?" was her eager response—for she never paused upon the necessity of doing something.

"That I leave to thy heart and thy judgment, lady; to thy wise and just regard for thine own honour and happiness, and—may I not say it?—for the rights, if not longer the happiness of thy fallen sister-woman."

"I will drive to Streatham to-morrow before breakfast. On an errand of mercy, you will accompany me—mercy to myself. I have promised Mr Devereux an interview, which can never now take place. I will not consult Lady Blande; I will act by my own counsel in what so nearly concerns myself; I will see Rosamond; culpable she may have been—but how treated? Paley's 'Moral Philosophy' appears to you English people, if not altogether canonical, yet a kind of supplementary Bible. What says the Rabbi of Craven in the passage you made me insert in my book of Canons, soon after poor Phoebe's misfortune? If I remember aright, it runs this way:—'If we pursue the effects of seduction through the complicated misery which it occasions, and if it be right to estimate crimes by the mischief they produce, it will appear something more than mere invective to assert that not one half of the crimes for which men suffer death by the laws of England, are so flagitious as this.'"

Shelley's Poetical Works.

MRS SHELLEY edits the first complete edition of her husband's works which has appeared. It is published by Moxon, in a style of elegance worthy of the work, and is to consist of four volumes, to appear in succession. Mrs Shelley, in her preface, says, that the time is not come to relate the truth of her husband's private history, and that she rejects any colouring of the truth. No account of the events of his life has, she asserts, "ever been given at all approaching reality in their details, either as regards himself or others." And why she abstains from setting the world right can only be conjectured, since it is highly probable that the errors in action, committed by a man so noble and generous as Shelley, may, as far as he is personally concerned, be fearlessly avowed, by those that loved him, in the firm conviction that, "were they judged impartially, his character would stand in fairer and brighter light than that of any contemporary." For his fame and his happiness, Shelley would seem to have lived or died too soon. As a boy and a youth, he was cast among those who could neither understand nor appreciate his mental idiosyncrasies, nor manage his singular though highly-gifted mind with united wisdom and love; and he died just as his suffering and turbid spirit was, in its own strength, working itself clear of the haze and feculence in which its fine and noble attributes had been involved by some faults of judgment and temper, but much more, we fully believe, by circumstances adverse to their healthful and gracious development. We can fully believe, that his were the high and generous aspirations for human improvement, and the desire to free life of its misery and its evil, which his panegyrist affirms, without admitting that he either at first knew or took the best and safest road to his pure and exalted ends.

His editor is perhaps more to be trusted in her warm appreciation of his moral qualities than of his genius, and "the fast augmenting influence over mankind" which she ascribes to his achievements for the amelioration of the human race. If some of his mental aberrations may be fairly attributed to the want of knowledge and goodness in those who thrust themselves into harsh collision with so delicate and peculiar a mind, other causes may be found in the irritation of almost continual bad health. Many of Shelley's errors might perhaps be best resolved by Charles Lamb's humorous and fanciful theory of imperfect sympathies. Of the praise which his widow has lavished upon his memory, none is more truly deserved than the commendation of his unworldliness—that rarest of the virtues even among philosophical poets. See my—

Shelley possessed a quality of mind which experience has shown me no other human being as participating in more than a very slight degree. This was his unworldliness. The usual motives that rule men—prospects of present or future advantage, the rank and fortune of those around, the taunts and censures, or the praises, of those who were hostile to him—had no influence whatever over his actions; and, apparently, none over his thoughts. It is difficult even to express the simplicity and directness of purpose that adorned him. The world's brightest gifts, and its most solid advantages, were of no worth in his eyes, when compared to the cause which he considered truth, and the good of his fellow-creatures.

Happy and blest is the memory of the man who deserved such praise! The poems in this volume are "Queen Mab," mutilated—a questionable step, especially when we view the high ground taken by the editor in vindicating the purity and nobility of the motives and aims of Shelley in every line that he ever composed. Mrs Shelley has appended notes to each of the poems, narrating the circumstances attending the origin and history of each. "Queen Mab" may be styled the most distinctive and remarkable, though far from the greatest of Shelley's works, especially when it is learned that it was written at the age of eighteen. He had by this time been deeply imbued with the spirit of the speculations of Godwin and Condorcet; and he had suffered that academic persecution and disgrace, which, how necessary soever they might be to the maintenance of proper discipline, were anything, it will be allowed, rather than calculated to reclaim a culprit of this rare sort. The frame of mind in which "Queen Mab" was written is described as the most lofty and beneficent.

His sympathy was thus early excited by the misery with which the world is bursting. He witnessed the sufferings of the poor, and was aware of the evils of ignorance. He desired every rich man to despoil himself of superfluity, and create a brotherhood of property and service, and was ready to be the first to lay down the advantages of birth. . . . Ill health made him believe that his race would soon be run—that a year or two was all he had of life. He desired that these years should be useful and illustrious. He saw in a fervent call on his fellow creatures to share alike the blessings of the creation, to love and serve each other, the noblest work that life and time permitted him. In this spirit, he composed "Queen Mab."

It was written while he wandered through the loveliest scenery of England, Ireland, and Scotland, and while the mountain and lake were his home.

He never intended to publish "Queen Mab" as it stands—though a few copies had been distributed among his friends; but it was published surreptitiously while he was in Italy; and, in a letter to the Editor of The Examiner (at that time his friend Leigh Hunt) he regrets the publication for the best and strongest reasons. He remarks:—"I am a devoted enemy to religious, political, and domestic oppression; and I regret this publication, not so much from literary vanity, as because I fear it is better fitted to injure than to serve the sacred cause of freedom."

"Alastor," the next poem in the volume, was the fruit of a mind more matured and calm, though still far from the cloudless serene. It was written under the oak shades of Windsor Great Park; and is considered, by his editor, as the most characteristic of his poems. "The Revolt of Islam," which may be said to embody Shelley's moral and political creed, and not a little of his history, completes the volume. The dedication of this poem is a morsel of mental autobiography. It was composed while he resided at Marlow, and in his boat, as he floated on the Thames, under the beech groves of Bisham, or during his wanderings in the beautiful neighbouring county. Mrs Shelley was now his domestic companion. After alluding to the beauty and richness of that fertile country, she remarks—

With all this wealth of nature, which, either in the form of gentlemen's parks or soil dedicated to agriculture, flourishes around, Marlow was inhabited by a very poor population. The women are lace-makers, and lose their health by sedentary labour, for which they are very ill paid. The poor-laws ground to the dust not only the paupers, but those who had risen just above that state, and were obliged to pay poor-rates. The changes produced by peace following a long war and a bad harvest, brought with them the most heart-rending evils to the poor. Shelley afforded what alleviation he could. In winter, while bringing out his poem, he had a severe attack of ophthalmia, caught while visiting the poor cottagers. I mention these things, because the minute and active sympathy with his fellow-creatures gives a thousand-fold interest to his speculations, and stamps with reality his pleadings for the human race.

We look forward with interest to the forthcoming volumes; and hope that the sketches of biography may be even more copious than in this one.

The Comic Annual for 1839.

The world in general, and ourselves in particular, have great reason to complain of the tardy appearance of the Comic this season; nor can we see any better reason than that it was waiting the return of the Inconstant, for the matter of a preface. The leading card this year is political. The Stoke-Pogis Corresponding Club makes several good hits, and not a few misses; for many of the jokes are of a kind at which people are laughing, and are likely for some time to laugh, on the wrong side of their mouths. The manner in which the fair sex have lately come forward as political agitators, at Stoke-Pogis, as well as other places, is one of the most novel topics. The principal female Radical is Mrs Frisby, whose speech is fully reported in that inflammatory journal, not the Glasgow, but the Pogian Argus. Her unladylike conduct is duly condemned by Mrs Jones, in her epistolary communications, regarding the terrible outbreak and revolution in Stoke-Pogis, to her friend Mrs Humphries:—"Wat do you think," she says, "of Mrs Frisby sitting up for a Demy Gog; and mixing promiscuously in a tap-rum and spowting out her inflameable sentiments like a feiry dragon on the top of a Table? I only wish I was the Mare for her Sack, and she should Duck in a hospond. Howsumever, I have had the comfit to see her collapsed between two pelises, and pully halld through the publick streets with a hole tote of ragging and bob-tale to her deserts—namely, the Cage, wear she is instelling her pianus doctrines; the Bars to a complete rotundity of littel bq; the Argus reports Mrs Frisby fully:—"Mrs Frisby presented herself, and expressed herself very, concurred in all that had been said, and "

Some people thought that females had no right to their rights. Women knew where shoes pinched as well as men, and could be quite as oratorical. She was always pressing on her daughters the necessity of forming Unions. There was nothing like agitation; and a good deal might be done at home. She had agitated her husband that very morning; and, if every wife did the same, they would soon obtain their ends. . . . Ministers would never have been so badly advised if they had consulted the soft sex. Women could fight too like lions and tigers, when their sperrits were put up. There was Mary Ann Talbot that got the French. She wished all the Niggers at Old Nick. The humane and pious had been so diverted with African floggings and cruelties, they forgot the English ones. She liked white natives better than black ones. Then there was the Corn Bill. She had never been in a skirmish, but she thought she could let fly a blunderbuss. Justice wasn't justice any where. What had we done for the Irish, except taking all their pigs and butter from them? Why wasn't there a Poor-Law for the rich?" &c., &c. There are, however, better things in the volume than Mrs Frisby's eloquence; nor does Mr Hood succeed so well with political agitation as we have seen him do on such topics as "Animal Magnetism," "Modern Boarding-School Education," "Emigration," and other important topics. If graver in manner, the poetical specimen of the annual which we select is in better taste. It is an English Branger.

ALL ROUND MY HAT:

A new Version.

"Come, my old hat, my steps attend!
However wags may sneer and scoff,
My castor still shall be my friend,
For I'll not be a caster-off.
So take again your olden place,
That always found you fit and pat—
Whatever mode might please the race—
All round my hat!—all round my hat!

"All round the world, while I've a head,
However I may chance to be,
Without a home, without a shed,
My tile shall be a roof to me.
Black, rusty, grey, devoid of felt,
A shocking shape, or beaten flat,
Still there are joys that may be felt
All round my hat!—all round my hat!

"The Quaker loves an ample brim,
A hat that bows to no salaam,
And dear the beaver is to him
As if it never made a dam.
All men in drab he calleth friends—
But there's a broader brim than that—
Give me the love that comprehends
All round my hat!—all round my hat!

"The monarch binds his brows in gold,
With gems and pearls to sparkle there;
But still a hat—a hat that's old—
They say is much more easy wear.
At regal state I'll not repine,
For Kaiser, King, or Autocrat,
Whilst there's a golden sun to shine
All round my hat!—all round my hat!

"As yet, my hat, you've got a crown;
A little nap the brush can find;
You are not very, very brown,
Nor very much scrubbed up behind.
As yet your brim is broad and brave—
I took some little care of that,
By not saluting every knave
All round my hat!—all round my hat!

"As yet, my hat, I've got a house,
And dine as other people do;
And fate, propitious, still allows
A home for me—a peg for you.

But say my bread were but a crumb—

Myself as poor as any rat—

Why, I would cry, 'Good people, come
All round my hat!—all round my hat!'

"As yet the best of womankind
Continues all that wife should be;
And, in the self-same room, I find
Her bonnet and my hat agree:

But say the bliss should not endure—
That she should turn a perfect cat—
I'd trust to time to bring a cure—
All round my hat!—all round my hat!

"No acres broad pertain to me,
To furnish cattle, wool, or corn;
Like people that are born at sea,
There was no land where I was born:
Yet, when my flag of life is furled—
What landlord can do more than that?—
I'll leave my heir the whole wide world
All round my hat!—all round my hat!"

To those who have not yet seen the plates of the "Comic Annual," we propose, as an exercise of ingenuity and invention, the following questions:—How could you personify "Cambridge Butter?" How portray Lord Durham's return to the tune of "Saw ye Johnnie comin'?" How a poor gentleman under "Circumstances over which he has no control?" How "Rising after the lark?" How "A Radical Demonstration?" How "Nobody's enemy but his own?" or "Plates done in stone;" or "Counter-irritation;" or "A Lion;" or "Off by mutual consent;" or "Portraits taken in this style?" and a hundred and fifty more, which may form capital subjects for guesses round the fireside, and be resolved with much cleverness, before the true, or rather the Hoodish interpretation, is known or suspected.

Among the poems, the best may not be by many degrees "The Assistant Drapers' Petition;" yet we—even we—are melted by it; and besides, from embodying a grievance, it is appropriate to a Reform periodical. Be it premised that the Assistant Drapers had prosaically discovered that the proper hour to leave off business is seven in the evening; or that this is the time to close the doors and clear off the debris, which, in spite of their industry and alertness, is accumulated during the day by the caprice of their fair customers.

"Pity the sorrows of a class of men,
Who, though they bow to fashion and frivolity,
No fancied claims or woes fictitious pen,
But wrongs ell-wide, and of a lasting quality.

"Oppressed, and discontented with our lot,
Among the clamorous we take our station—
A host of Ribbon-men; yet is there not
One piece of Irish in our agitation.

"Ah! who can tell the miseries of men
Who serve 'the very cheapest shops in town';
Till, faint and weary, they leave off at ten,
Knocked up by ladies beating of 'em down!

"But has not Hamlet his opinion given—
Oh, Hamlet had a heart for drapers' servants—
That custom is—say custom after seven—
'More honoured in the breach than the observance.'

"Oh, come, then, gentle ladies!—come in time;
O'erwhelm our counters, and unload our shelves:
Torment us all until the seventh chime;
But let us have the remnant to ourselves!

"We wish to lay of knowledge in a stock,
And not remain in ignorance incurable;
To study Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, Locke.
And other fabrics that have proved so durable.

"We long for thoughts of intellectual kind,
And not to go bewildered to our beds;
With stuff and fustian taking up the mind,
And pins and needles running in our heads.

"For, oh! the brain gets very dull and dry,
Selling from morn to night for cash or credit;
Or, with a vacant face and vacant eye,
Watching cheap prints that Knight did never edit.

"Till, sick with toil and lassitude extreme,
We often think, when we are dull and vapoury,
The bliss of Paradise was so supreme,
Because that Adam did not deal in drapery."

As it will be carried by general acclamation that Hood is the cleverest punster extant, it were desirable that he would occasionally take one of his lessons, and know "when to leave off."

The "Character" is a good household sketch, in which a female sharper, quite as particular about the sobriety, and especially about the strict honesty of a female servant, as was Lady Blarney about the character of the Vicar's daughters, contrives to carry off the gold repeater and silver tea-pot of Betty's simple mistress. There is both wit and fun in Al Ben Nous; and as for Doves and Crows, we charitably conclude, from it and former inditings, that there must be a good many admirers of the "Comic Annual" in the West Indies and the slave States of America.

The History, Rise, and Progress of the New Colony of South Australia. By John Stephens.

This is the second and enlarged Edition of a work intended to place the new colony in the fairest, if not in the most faithful light, of which the first edition was entitled "THE LAND OF PROMISE." Mr Stephens has now taken a soberer name; but he has done the reverse in points more material. This work is, in plain terms, one enormous puff of South Australia. He is all for Adelaide and its Port, and nothing for Port Lincoln and Encounter Bay; and contemplates a road for bullock-waggons between the Murray and Adelaide. But, if the expense of transporting goods between Port Adelaide and the city of Adelaide be, as Mr James states, 40s. a ton, what will be the cost of bringing raw produce, or sending back supplies to the banks of the Murray? All that has ever been written or said in praise of the colony finds a place here, and not one word that has ever been said against it, save to be denied; so that, in these pages, the new province is a Land of Promise indeed. The flattering epistles of Messrs Hack, Morphet, Fisher, &c., &c., are reprinted. Senseless epistles some of them are, too, as it surely cannot be for "well-cooked dishes, claret, hock, and champagne, Victoria cafes," a "theatre-royal," and "sporting intelligence," or "the soothing strains of a piano," that people in their senses emigrate to any new colony.

This history finishes with what is called a "refutation" of the article in Tait's Magazine upon Mr Gouger's work. We need only refer to the article, and to Mr Gouger's statements. Though the Secretary of the Colonization is tied to it by every interest, every hope, and every sympathy, his work is much more candid and trust-worthy than the History before us, which, among other things, falls foul of Mr Gouger for his rash admissions, and alleged ignorance of the Company's affairs and successes in whaling, ship-building, &c. The author of the History—(ci-devant "Land of Promise")—states, that the argument used by the reviewer in Tait, in warning emigrant labourers against rushing heedlessly into the colony, is fallacious, as it applies to the small amount of population in 1837, when the numbers were about 3000. We do not know exactly what the present population may be. Mr James says about 5000; but were it 10,000, the warning given by us is equally applicable. It has been calculated that 5000 labourers went to the Swan River settlement. Where are they all now? Have they been prosperous—have they made fortunes—have they suffered no hardship?

The Boy's Country Book. Edited by William Howitt.

Edited by Friend Howitt, and written by him too, we opine, which is just so much the better. It is, at all events, a very pleasing book, and, whether exactly literal or not, certainly the genuine autobiography of a boy; and, moreover, a lively picture of rural manners and characters in an old English neighbourhood. Into this history is introduced all the adventures, and pastimes, and pursuits of boys in the country. There is also a minute and pleasing description of the great Quaker Seminary at Ackworth, where the little Friends, rigid discipline and broad brims notwithstanding, appear to enjoy themselves very much like other young gentlemen, and to partake considerably of the common tastes for the plum-cake and liquorice, the leap-frog and prison-bars, of the world's naughty boys. There are pleasing annals and reminiscences of other schools, and of boyish adventures, perils, and escapes of all sorts. The Boy's Country Book is, besides, very trim and neat in its exterior; and so prettily embellished with appropriate vignettes and tail-pieces, that the artist deserved to have his name blazoned on the title-page.

Janet; or, Glances at Life. By the Author of "Misrepresentation." 3 vols.

The characteristics of this novel are calm good sense, and an unpretending, spirited fidelity in delineating the homely personages of every-day life. The development of the passion of Envy is assumed as the groundwork of the tale, a passion whose homogeneity is very questionable. The character of Janet, the envious coquette—who, from the maliciously placing a flower or ribbon awry, to the highest interests of life, is true as the needle to the pole to her base feelings for her beautiful half-sister—does not remove our doubts. Envy is a quality entering largely into many minds; but, as a steady, animating principle, directing and regulating the whole course of life, it is non-existent, and if it did exist, would, under favour of Miss Baillie, be too odious for prolonged representation. But the novel succeeds in spite of the great failure, and its secondary aims become its highest performances. If never brilliant, never impassioned, and if it rarely touches the sympathies—for who can sympathize with envy?—it is always pleasing, and often very amusing; the slight degree of caricature being nothing more than the rouge which the player must wear to keep up the tone of his complexion to nature as seen behind the lamps, where the natural hue might seem flat or cadaverous. The most instructive part, the true moral, of this novel, is, not that Envy returns the poisoned chalice to the mixer's lips, or the exhibition of the canker at the heart, though hid under the most prosperous fortune and the most brilliant exterior of gratified ambition; but the paltriness, trickiness, meanness, misery, and crime which unavoidably mingle with the imagined necessity of women, in the middle, and even in the higher ranks, making good matches, or being provided for by marriage, and only by marriage. Surely the moral of ten thousand lessons to Mothers and Daughters will have some effect at last.

The Reclaimed Family.

A collection of short and plain moral stories, read by an amiable young daughter, whose virtuous example and lessons reclaim her father and mother from drunkenness, and produce the happiest effects on her younger brothers and sisters. They are very good in their own homely way.

English Wild-Flowers.

Miss Twamley has, with the first snow-drop, put forth an elegant volume, genus annual, under the above attractive title; in which the wild darlings of the English meadows, banks, streams, lakelets, hills, and valleys, are "familiarily illustrated and described." The new priestess of Flora has painted, as well as described; and the coloured plates of groups of wild-flowers are taken from her drawings. The framework of her familiar descriptions is an account of rural walks, in search of flowers, taken by a pleasant English family and a semi-old-maiden aunt, who is an artist and poetess, and, moreover, a very kind and delightful person, and quite the joy of her little flower-loving nieces. The volume altogether is a charming one, and will form an appropriate and desirable Easter-gift. "I have wreathed England's wild-flowers for England's children," says the authoress. "May they approve the gift!" We answer for them:—they will approve.

Bonnycastle's Introduction to Astronomy.

Of this work—in its own department a standard book for young persons—we have before us the ninth edition, with the corrections, additions, and modernisations of Professor Young of Belfast. The work is now altogether independent of the recommendations of the press.

Candolle's Vegetable Organography.

A translation of this work has long been a desideratum to the British botanist. One is now offered by Mr Boughton Kingdon, which, for the convenience of purchasers, is to appear in monthly 2s. 6d. parts. The work is well printed, and is illustrated by lithograph plates of the organs, and minute anatomical parts of vegetables. It is to be followed by a translation of Candolle's "Vegetable Physiology."

The Lady and the Saints. With Illustrations, by Cruickshank.

We wish Cruickshank's pencil had been employed to some better purpose. This is a volume written in doggerel verse, in ridicule of probably some very absurd personages; but it is altogether without discrimination, and in very bad taste—the small degree of talent by no means redeeming the indecency of the performance.

Minstrel Melodies: a Collection of Songs, &c.

If these melodies be not of the highest order of lyrics, they are at least pleasant enough "social songs for the hearth, and lays for Beauty's bower," where Beauty is not too impassioned in her feelings, or fastidious in her tastes;—and there is both plenty and variety of them. Some malicious sprite has tempted the Minstrel to attempt Scottish songs, in which we cannot congratulate him upon very moderate success.

Extracts for Schools and Families.

A well-selected book of scraps, in aid of the moral and religious training of children. The selections are in prose and verse. Some may fancy them too uniformly didactic, and desire a little more of the imaginative; but no one can object to them either in spirit or tendency.

The Obligation and Extent of Humanity to Brutes. By W. Youst.

The spirit of the age does not tend towards cruelty to brutes. Still there is much to amend, and much ignorance to reform, and thoughtlessness to warn; and the present work, written in a pious and humane spirit, will do its own part. The most atrocious cruelties recorded here are not, however, those perpetrated in knacker's yards, or by fishers, sportsmen, and wicked little boys, but by men of science.—Shame!

The Quarantine Laws.

Dr Bowring's broadside is here followed up by a letter from a gentleman who has been a recent martyr to the Quarantine Laws—Arthur T. Holroyd, Esq., who assures Sir John Cam Hobhouse that the contagion of the plague is all nonsense, and musters a formidable array of evidence. The writers on this question try to prove too much. It is enough that—whether the plague be contagious or not—it can be demonstrated that the harsh and troublesome sanitary regulations occasion far more mischief than they prevent.

An Outline of Ancient and Modern Rome, with an Account of Italy. By a Lady, for the use of her Children.

This little work is in the form of question and answer, and contains a great deal of good information of the kind largely administered to poor children, under the cramming system.

Catechism of the British Constitution.

One of Oliver & Boyd's series of useful Catechisms; containing a lucid and accurate account of that heritage upon which every British subject so justly prides himself, and also of the rights by which he holds it. It is a book for old and young.

Travels of Minna and Godfrey.

We were delighted with the first portion of this little work, which treated of Holland and Belgium. It was pleasing in style, original in plan, and accurate in information. The Travels are prosecuted up the Rhine, and through a part of Germany; and the continuation is, we dare say, equally praiseworthy; though we have not had time since its arrival to peruse it fully.

SERIAL WORKS.

Ure's Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures, &c. &c.

The Fifth Part of this popular and useful work is before us; so that it is now half done. The principal articles are flax-spinning, now become so important a branch of British manufacture, "Founding," "Gaslight," and "Lighting;" "Gin," "Glass-making and Cutting," and "Gold."

Heads of the People, No. III.,

Presents us with "The Spoiled Child," a very imp; "The Old Lord," who is not unlike Sir Francis Burdett; "The Beadle of the Parish," a truculent-looking knave in full costume, with a pot-belly and a sinister cast of the right eye; and "The Linen-Draper's Assistant." This last head, and that of "The Old Lord," are worthy of unequalled approbation; and the descriptive parts—the reading—are quite as good as the engraving. Satire and wit are made, as they ought to be—the ministers of philosophy.

Ward's Library of Standard Divinity,

Gives us Archbishop Leighton's "Theological Lectures to his Students," at very small cost.

The First Part of a work has appeared, entitled GREECE, PICTORIAL, DESCRIPTIVE, AND HISTORICAL. The letterpress is by Dr Christopher Wordsworth, of Cambridge, whose name, connected with Greece, gives earnest of the high excellence of the forthcoming series. The work will form a very handsome book, independently of its literary merits. It is richly and profusely embellished by a number of the most eminent engravers and designers.

Part X. of the interesting HISTORY OF BRITISH BIRDS, treats of the Bunting, the Finch, and the Sparrow families. The plates are, as usual, extremely lively and pretty.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

WAGES AND PRICES.

WHOMVER first broached the doctrine that, if the prices of food fell by means of a repeal of the laws against the importation of food, wages would fall in like proportion, and that it is useless, if not pernicious, to agitate for a repeal of these laws till Universal Suffrage be obtained, ought to have a statue of silver erected to him by the Tory landed interest. No course of policy could so effectually prevent either an extension of the suffrage or the obtaining of cheap food. Judging of the capacity and intelligence of such of the working classes as are misled by demagogues whose honest means of living are not very obvious, and viewing the disgraceful and unfair conduct which some of the Universal-Suffrage men have exhibited at meetings called expressly to petition for a repeal of the Corn-Laws, both in England and Scotland, many of the upper and middling classes who have heretofore advocated an extension of the Suffrage will be induced to pause in their efforts for a time. Indeed, if public meetings cannot be conducted with more propriety and decorum than they have of late been, every person of respectability must refrain from attending them. There is no meeting, however numerous, which may not be interrupted, and its object frustrated by twenty or thirty bawlers, whose power of making noise is generally in the inverse ratio of the quantity of their brains. Till some general understanding be come to between the advocates of Repeal and the Universal-Suffrage men, and as long as the latter persist in interrupting the meetings of the former, we suggest that it is no more than reasonable that the latter should take upon themselves exclusively the burden of the poor-rates, of soup kitchens, and of the other means by which the middle classes are yearly in the practice of aiding distressed operatives and their families; for the Corn-Laws unquestionably produce the greater portion of the distress—not only by enhancing the price of food, but by curtailing the means of employment, lessening the demand for labour, and thereby inevitably reducing wages.

That wages must fall because prices fall, is, however, the dogma of some of the most ignorant of the operatives, and too valuable a dogma not to be inculcated by the organs of the landed aristocracy, Whig, Tory, and—sorry as we to say—Radical, at this their hour of peril. With exceptions too insignificant to be regarded, the whole land-owners and farmers of the three kingdoms are banded, w banding together, to keep up the Starvation Laws; not doubting that, if the present summer can be got over, if next harvest prove abundant, and prices fall, they can afford to allow the Chartists to amuse themselves with their theories for a quarter of a century to come. The aristocracy do not fear theories, but they hate practical questions; and, of all that the ingenuity of man can devise, free trade is to them the most hateful. To schemes for changing the ruling dynasty, for overthrowing the constitution of any monarchy, and for establishing even a Republic on its ruins, the titled oligarchy of Europe have always, in smaller or greater numbers, been ready to accede; but hardly an instance has occurred, where an aristocrat has joined any large body of the people for the purpose of increasing the general welfare, where there was any ground, however imaginary, to dread that the interest of his own class had any chance, even in the remotest degree, to suffer. It is precisely for the reason given by the Chartists for opposing the middle classes, in their attempt to repeal the Corn-Laws—it is precisely because we have a legislature almost entirely of landlords—that all, high and low, not of the land-owning class, should join together. The Chartists maintain that it is useless to petition Parliament to repeal the Corn-Laws: how do they mean to obtain the Charter?—Is it not by petitioning the same Legislature? And, if they expect that their own unaided efforts will succeed in causing a change of such vital importance as they contemplate, overturning, by the roots, the whole political power of the very men they petition, is it not certain that an union of all classes not connected with land, and which form, at least, two thirds of the population, could extort from the same men a much smaller matter

That wages will fall if prices fall, is daily bawled in our public meetings, and is daily reiterated by the Tory press; but any attempt to prove the assertion is most carefully avoided. Yet there cannot be a working man, of middle life, and possessed of ordinary observation, who must not on the slightest reflection know it is false. Times of high prices have, uniformly, been times of distress among the body of the people. It is needless to look back into history—for no one surely will pretend that a dearth was ever anything else but a period of suffering to the lower orders. We will rather take times nearer our own age, when we have authentic data to go on, which, on subjects of this kind, it is very difficult to obtain, statistics being a science yet in its infancy in Great Britain. We have, however, one authentic record of wages and prices. The accounts of Greenwich Hospital have been kept with much accuracy for a number of years, and they furnish not only the prices paid for articles of consumption in the various years, but also the wages of different kinds of artisans. We shall take two years, at a considerable interval from each other: one after a long-continued war, when, from the enormous waste of human life, men must have been in great demand, and wages comparatively high; and the other after a long period of peace. The population of the kingdom during the period increased at least thirty per cent., and the demand of men for the army had almost ceased; so that it might have been expected, not only that wages should have fallen with prices, but in a much greater ratio. But here are the facts.

Carpenters, per day, . . .	5 6	5 5
Bricklayers, do.	5 5	4 9
Masons, do.	5 9	5 3
Plumbers, do.	5 9	5 6

We have given the wages of all the kinds of workmen to be found in the Hospital accounts, and the prices of all the articles admitting of a correct comparison. The columns fourth and fifth shew how many days' labour, or parts of a day's labour of a mason, purchased the quantity of the article of which the price is indicated in 1812 and 1832. For example, in 1812 it required $13\frac{1}{2}$ of his day's wages to enable a mason to purchase a cwt. of flesh, and only 9 in 1832; to buy a sack of flour in the former year, he had to labour for no less than nearly 19 days, in the latter only 10; and so on. We thus see, that, while the most material articles of consumption fell one-third or more, wages were reduced only one-twenty-third part! The last year for which we have these returns of prices and wages is 1835, and had we taken that year instead of 1832, the difference would have been still greater; for, while wages remained un-reduced, prices had fallen still farther; flesh to £2:0:7 per cwt.; flour to £1:11:0 per sack, &c. &c. If we take averages of years, we will find similar results. The average price of flesh for the five years, ending with 1814, was £3:16:8; the average day's wages of a mason, during the same five years, 5s. 8d.; so that $13\frac{1}{2}$ days' labour was required to purchase a cwt. of flesh. The average price of flesh in the five years, ending 1835, was £2:4:4; the average wages 5s. 3d.; so that less than $8\frac{1}{2}$ days' labour would have purchased as much animal food during the latter period, as $13\frac{1}{2}$ during the former. But, as we are talking of the Corn-Laws, let us take the price of flour during the two periods of five years we have mentioned. During the first, the average cost was 90s. per sack, during the latter, 45s. 3d.; requiring, at the respective rate of wages, about 15 days' work of a mason, to purchase a sack of flour, during the first period, and only about 8 at the latter. These results get quit of all grounds of uncertainty relative to the state of the currency, with which questions of this sort are generally embarrassed. It is a matter perfectly unimportant what was the value of gold, or whether the paper money was or was not depreciated at the respective periods; for our standard is not gold or paper, but flour and meat compared with a day's labour. We trust that we have now convinced every one who has read our statement with ordinary attention, of the fallacy of supposing that wages fall with prices. It must not also be overlooked that these results have taken place notwithstanding the scarcity of labouring men at the first period, occasioned by the army and navy, and the preparation of warlike stores and military equipments, at the hottest period of a war unparalleled for its extent, the immense sums of money expended, and the number of combatants engaged; and the great abundance of labour at the latter period, arising from the cessation of the war and the increase of population.

Nor is it merely in so far as regards articles of meat and drink, that the working man is in a better condition at this moment than formerly. All other articles have fallen in at least as great a proportion as those we have specified. Take for example the wholesale prices of articles of Birmingham manufacture, in the years following

	s. d.	s. d.
Buttons, for coats, per gross,	4 6	2 0
— for Waistcoats, per ditto,	2 0	0 7
Gun Locks, each,	6 0	1 8
Plated Stirrups,	4 6	0 8
Shovels and Tonga,	1 0	0 7
Japanned Tea Trays, 30 inches,	4 6	1 4

There is only another point we shall at present advert to. An attempt is sometimes made to induce the working classes to believe that they are worse remunerated now than in former times, because they are paid at a lower rate for a given quantity of work than formerly; and because manufactured goods are much cheaper than they were. But this arises from two very well known causes—the great reduction of the price of the raw material, and the amazing improvement of our machinery, which enables an immensely larger quantity of work to be executed now than formerly, with the same labour. For example, cotton wool is only about one-third of the price it was no more than twenty years ago. In 1786, the sale price of cotton yarn, No. 100, was 38s.; in 1794, 15s.; in 1807, 6s. 9d.; in 1832, 2s. 11d.; and we believe it is still lower at present. Then, as to the improvements in machinery. In 1786, the expense of spinning a pound of No. 100, cotton yarn, was 10s.; in 1790, 4s.; in 1793, 2s. 6d.; in 1826, 6d.. All these reductions followed on new inventions in machinery, and the spinner positively earns more money at 6d. than when the price was 10s. We hope we have now said enough to convince every one who is not determined before-hand not to be convinced, that there never was a more groundless, and, as we firmly believe, a more dishonest argument set up than that the working classes would derive no benefit from the repeal of the accursed Starvation Laws, (for the preventing the import of foreign grain is but one of the innumerable evils they occasion,) because wages would fall in proportion to the fall of prices. Such an argument, if so it can be called, so far from being true, or having the least foundation in truth, is contrary to the uniform experience of mankind in every country and in every age.

THE GALLOWES IN CANADA.—“PIRATES” AND “PATRIOTS.”

“Rebellion lay in their way—and they found it.”—Faust ff.

WHILE packet after packet continues to inform us that blood still flows on the scaffolds of Canada, it does appear somewhat unaccountable that, in this land of benevolence—in this land whose philanthropists “survey mankind from China to Peru,” in search of objects for their compassion and protection—only two members of the Scottish press, and not one public meeting throughout all Britain, should have hinted disapproval! The execution of a murderer at home would draw more attention and excite more compassion than does the ignominious death of scores of men, for an offence which, in certain circumstances, is a duty and a virtue—a crime, the commission of which is Washington's glory and Sydney's renown! One Whig journal, in the north of Scotland, calls for “signal and sanguinary punishment!” another, in Edinburgh, “dares any man to deny” that these hangings are “essential to the stability of society!” and all the papers, Whig, Tory, and Radical, teem with such phrases as “pirates,” “murderers,” applied to the Canadian rebels, and their allies from the States. Their unanimity is, indeed, wonderful. Can absolutely nothing be said in palliation of the offence of these men? Can there not be preferred one reasonable plea for mercy?—We shall attempt to say something in palliation, if not in justification, and venture to hint a few doubts of the justice, as well as the policy, of these sanguinary punishments.

It need not be said, at this time of day, that there are circumstances in which submission to a government becomes a crime and resistance a virtue. Swift, a Tory, and far indeed from either "theorist" or enthusiast, says—"As to what is called a revolution principle, my opinion is this—that, whenever those evils which usually attend and follow a change of government would not, in all probability, be so pernicious as the grievances we suffer under present power, then the public good will justify such a revolution." Whether or not the Canadian rebellion was justifiable on these grounds, they themselves are the best judges. That Canada, of older settlement and with a better soil, presents such a miserable contrast to the southern shores of the Lakes and the St Lawrence, can only be accounted for by ascribing it to misgovernment. Mrs Jameson (the most recent traveller there, and no favourer of the insurgents) says—"On one side is all the bustle of prosperity and commerce, and on the other side all the symptoms of apathy, indolence, mistrust, helplessness. . . . There must be a cause for it surely."

. . . . Can you send some of our colonial officials across the Atlantic, to behold and solve the difficulty." Speaking of Sandwich, the principal place in the western district, and a county town with 400 inhabitants, she says—"The appearance of the place and people, so different from all I had left on the other side, made me melancholy. What is the reason that all flourishes there, and all languishes here?" Colonel Prince, M.P.P. for and proprietor of this wretched place of Sandwich, (the same humane conqueror who shot his prisoners in cold blood after the recent skirmish near his village,) in a speech to the U. C. House of Assembly, said, that "countless numbers of emigrants passed during the summer [1836] through Canada to the western part of the United States, and none could be prevailed on to stop and settle in these provinces, though the soil and all other natural advantages are considerably greater, and the distance saved from 600 to 700 miles." The number which passed that year was 200,000. This was before the rebellion.

Again, the Canadians were a conquered people—they were made over to Britain against their will, as Poland was to Russia; and a conquered people have a right to release themselves when they are able. Scotland was a conquered country when Wallace turned rebel. But what we call patriotism in Poland is piracy in Canada. Had Von Shultz—the gallant Pole whom we have hanged at Kingston—fallen when he fought at Warsaw, a short time ago, some future Campbell might, perhaps, have niched him into immortal verse; and yet, it does not appear very clearly why, if the rising at Warsaw was patriotism, that at Montreal should be "base and bloody insurrection." Had the Americans been unsuccessful in their rebellion, we must, by the same right, have hanged Kosciusko, who fought on their side. Kosciusko hanged by the countrymen of Campbell!

Still farther, an immense majority of the people wished a change of Government; and, when that is the case, they have a right to obtain it. Milton, on this subject, lays down the sentiment of a freeman—a sentiment deathless as his own renown:—"The people, as oft as they shall judge fit for the best, may either choose a king or reject him, retain him or depose him, though no tyrant, merely by the liberty and right of free-bron men to be governed as seems to them best." That a majority of the people of Canada thirsted for a change of government appears even from Lord Durham's "Report;" and it is evidenced by the fact that, in Upper Canada, the "Radicals," whose known object was separation from the mother country, had a sweeping majority in the House of Assembly, till unconstitutionally swamped by Sir F. Head, in 1836, as admitted in Lord Durham's "Report;" that they had this majority in the Assembly of Lower Canada till the very last; that Papineau was, for a long period, and till the outbreak, Speaker of the last-named body; and that W. L. Mackenzie was an M. P. P. and Mayor of the metropolis of Upper Canada. The fact is admitted even by those most bitterly hostile to the Canadians. The Montreal correspondent of The London Standard, in The Standard of the 5th February, says:—"The Canadians will never be quiet till their majority is annihilated. . . . They are at this moment ripe for revolt, and would rise in arms to a man, if they had any prospect of success."

Besides all this, the Canadians were, probably, influenced by the precedent they had for their rising in the much-bepraised Revolution of their flourishing neighbours. It does not seem astonishing that they should think the cases parallel. Wherein lies the difference? The present United States rebelled against the claim of the mother country to tax them without their consent. The Canadas were by this claim equally affected. The "Congress," at Philadelphia, before the commencement of the struggle, sent an address to the inhabitants of "the province of Quebec," asking their co-operation. This call was not responded to, and the Canadians—the Papist, the French Canadians—remained loyal, while the Protestant and British part of America rose in arms. The malcontents were supported by the Whigs at home, then, as a Parliamentary party, numbering much about the same as the party who favour the Canadians in the present Parliament. Chatham warned the Government, that it was going to war with three millions of Whigs on the other side of the Atlantic. The number who supported him on the first division was eighteen! Who knows but that, if the Whigs had been out of office now, they might have chosen the better part of their progenitors? But, alas for their Chatham!—The Americans conquered—Chatham, Washington, Franklin, are household words over all the earth. Such were the circumstances of the American rebellion—what were those of the Canadian? Shortly this:—The Canadian constitution gave to the House of Assembly the power of stopping the supplies raised by the taxation of the province for the payment of the colonial officials. In the exercise of this unquestioned right, after many years of memorialising against their grievances, they stopped the supplies; and the British Government passed a coercion act, which authorized the Executive to take the money forcibly from the chests. The Americans were taxed without their consent—the Canadians were allowed to tax themselves, and then had the money taken from them, and applied to a purpose for which they had refused it. The Americans rose against a claim in making which the Government violated no legal compact—the Canadians rose against an infringement, by the Government, of their guaranteed constitution. Can it be made level to plain understandings, why, if the Americans did right, the Canadians did wrong?—why the former are "Patriots," and the latter "Pirates?" But let us not forget that, nine-and-sixty years ago, the American "Patriots" were as much vilified as the Canadian "Pirates" are now! Not one term, not only of reproach, but of contempt, now heaped on the latter, but has its fellow, not merely in the common run of the writings of the pamphleteers and journalists of the time, but in the sage inditings of the very incarnation of sagacity.—Samuel Johnson!

Now, one word for the Sympathizers; for it may be said, that what defends the resident Canadians does not palliate their conduct. Perhaps, indeed, the Sympathizers had better have staid at home. It may be doubted if much good to liberty ever accrued from foreign interference. But why all this vituperation of the American Sympathizers alone? Let us be consistent, and condemn all Sympathizers alike. What was Colonel Evans in Spain but a Sympathizer—ay, and a Sympathizer who probably had his sympathy awakened, at least pretty considerably quickened, by the promise of good pay, and a handsome sum cash down? What was Lord Byron in Greece but a Sympathizer? What Lafayette and Kosciuszko in the American Revolutionary war? As much right as Evans had in Spain, so much right had Von Shultz in Canada. Why should we knight Evans, and hang Von Shultz? Von Shultz embraced a desperate cause without fee or reward, and set his life upon a cast; Evans took what seemed the stronger side, and stipulated for his reward in hard Spanish-dollars. The first was hanged—the latter knighted! “O world, thy slippery tricks!” One would think that the different fates of these Sympathizers were prophetically alluded to by Byron. Hear the noble Sympathizer addressing his brethren!

“When a man hath no freedom to fight for at home,
Let him combat for that of his neighbours;
Let him think of the glories of Greece and of Rome,
And get knock’d on the head for his labours.
To do good to mankind is the chivalrous plan,
And is always as nobly requited:
Then combat for freedom wherever you can,
And, if not shot or hang’d, you’ll get knighted.”

Though this be said lightly, it contains bitter truth. Why should we vilify Cabrera, and pass by Arthur? Why turn up our eyes in horror at the doings at Durango, and applaud or disregard those at Toronto? In the eye of justice, the guilt is the same of the Spanish General and the British Governor. They are under the same category—Legionites and Sympathizers!—Cabrera and Arthur!—Durango and Toronto!

But, if none of all this can either palliate or justify, may it not be doubted if the present sanguinary measures serve any good purpose? Is the ignominious death of so many men, among friends and neighbours who, more or less, sympathize in their crime, not more likely to exasperate than to deter? The first execution in Canada (last spring), was that of Mr Lount, M.P.P. for Simcoe county; and, in a few short months, his son appears in the situation of “Military Secretary” to one of the late foolhardy attempts! “Bequeathed from bleeding sire to son!” Dr Theller, who lately escaped from the citadel of Quebec, from whence he was to be taken to the gallows, was, when the last accounts left, actively getting together men for another rising. At the first outbreak this winter, the insurgents said, in their proclamation, they rose “to revenge the blood of Lount, and Mathews, and Morreau.” Confiscated fortunes and desolated hearths—the gallows and the torch—do not cause inactive despondency, but headlong despair—

“What though the field be lost,
All is not lost!—the unconquerable will
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield.”—

During the very time that these executions are going on, do we not hear of mad attempts at insurrection almost in sight of the gallows which Sir John Colborne has erected, in terrorem, for the dispatch of forty persons at once? Surely a life-long exile to a penal colony, as it would more than exaltate their own crimes, might more effectually deter others from after attempts. This is certainly no slight punishment to such men as many of the rebels are; for even the one-sided press of Canada admits that many men of property and character are involved in the rebellion; and though the London papers say that the Canadian prisoners now in Milbank are all of the lowest order of society, such is not the fact—we happen to be aware that one of them, at least, is a young Scottish gentleman, a gentleman by birth and accomplishments. But yet, not one of our religious denominations—not one of our societies for the abolition of capital punishments—has sent out a single petition for mercy! We have a society of the latter kind in Edinburgh, which gets up petitions even in the less heinous cases of murder—but not a word have they uttered, even to ask that these Canadians might pay the penalty of their crime (or their too generous bravery?) by a life of bondage, rather than a death of infamy! Where are our Wighams, and Erskines, and Greivilles? Is their philanthropy, which protects thieves and murderers at home, not expansive enough to include rebels across the Atlantic? Is intercession for the first, religious duty—for the latter, politics? Is their Whiggery stronger than their benevolence?

Some people are generous at the expense of their neighbours—it looks as if we were determined that our mercy and pity should cost us nothing. We pity the Poles at the expense of the Russians, the Greeks at the expense of the Turks; but, to shew mercy to the Canadians might cost us, we think, “a valuable colony.” We had better be merciful while we are yet strong. Though no poet’s lay consecrate the struggle—though the fall of hardy backwoodsmen in Canadian swamps and on Canadian gallows-tree—may not draw the romantic sympathy which flowed so freely for those who fell on the walls of Missolonghi, or on “Prague’s proud arch;” though hundreds of nameless Kosciuszko’s may fall unhonoured and unsung—yet is their cause not the less the cause of justice, nor its success yet altogether hopeless. Let not our present revenge be too cruel, nor our Io Peans yet too loud—

“Vain is the vaunt, and victory unjust,
That more to mighty hands than righteous cause doth trust!”

Let us not think alone of the blunders and braggadocio of their leaders, and their present miserable failure:—the American war raged through eight hot campaigns. Let us beware of contemning where we may yet have to succumb—remember Johnson’s contemptuous scorn of the Americans—remember Canning’s sneers at their “bits of bunting.” Let us make sure that the obloquy we so liberally pour forth is neither unjust nor premature:—Johnson called Washington and his compatriots, “incendiaries who wished to rob in the tumults of a conflagration.” Though the odds may seem desperate; yet, if the Canadians “have their quarrel just”—if their cause be the cause of freedom, and if they maintain it like freemen—not contempt, not defeat, not obloquy, not the sanguinary promptitude of Arthur, nor Colborne, with his forty-hangman power—can prevent its ultimate triumph. Time will do justice to all: to the nation which was oppressed—to the government which oppressed—to the British people who callously looked on; and let those now on their way to bondage and exile, though they think they now see their cause given up to disaster and defeat, and themselves to calumny and disgrace, draw comfort and hope from the assurance which supported the Scottish “rebels” two centuries ago:—“Truth is the daughter of Time; and although Calumnies oft starteth first, and runneth before, yet Veritie followeth her at the heels!”

PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENT has again commenced its sittings, at the usual time, with the usual piece of pageantry, and with a Speech, as usual, devoid of meaning. How long is the highest personage of these realms to be used as a mere puppet—a mere mouth-piece of the aristocracy—one of their appendages, to be retained for show on state days, but to be kept devoid of any real power, even of that which the Constitution gives in terms the most explicit, the right of deliberating on and rejecting any bill presented to the Crown? What a mockery must that Constitution—that gloriously incomprehensible three-legged stool of Blackstone and De Lolme—be, when one of the estates of the realm has been, if not de jure, yet de facto exaucterated—when upwards of a century has elapsed since the monarch has been permitted to exercise the undoubted rights belonging to the regal office. It is full time, now, after one of the essential prerogatives of the Crown has so long been trampled under the foot of our unprincipled aristocracy, that the mockery—insulting, as now conducted, alike to the sovereign and the people—of a Speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament, should be dispensed with. Insult ought no longer to be permitted to be added to injury. Who, in ordinary life, and in the daily management of his own concerns, however trifling, would allow himself to be subjected to such an intolerable piece of tyranny as to be compelled to repeat by rote, as his own, sentiments which he possibly not only never entertained, but which he may throughout life have uniformly held in contempt, if not abhorrence? Who in ordinary life would submit to have dictated to him twice a-year, speeches to be delivered as his own, which, though utterly destitute of information, argument, or eloquence, were yet so incuriously, and, by so backward an apprentice in the use of language, put together, as to have two dozen of "I's," and one dozen of "my's" congregated in an equal number of lines!

As to the intentions of Ministry—as to their schemes for keeping hold of office during the session—we may say, we believe, with safety, in the words of Doctor Johnson, that, "as nothing has been decided, nothing can be known." That they are ready to do everything but relinquish their salaries, there is but one opinion. What their conduct on the most vital question that ever came under the consideration of any Ministry, in the present crisis of the country—the Corn-Laws—will be, we need not speculate upon: it is developing while we are writing. Lord Melbourne says, Corn-Laws have always been, with the Whigs, since they came into power, an open question—a statement which has been, without qualification and without contradiction, denied by one who had, at least, had as good an opportunity of knowing the fact. But what sort of a Cabinet is it that tolerates open questions? When the Sovereign appoints, when the people pay for their servants, the Ministers, it is, we imagine, expected that they are to do something; and what can it be for doing, but those things which the master and payers cannot conveniently do themselves? One of these things, for example, is to decide questions which the people, from their time being engaged in other occupations, from want of authentic data, from want of previous study of such matters, cannot settle satisfactorily for themselves. Government includes in its very notion that, not of opening but of closing questions, of deciding and not of discussing, of acting and not of talking. An open-question Cabinet is no Cabinet at all: it is unfit for the only work for which it is hired—deciding and acting; and the sooner it is turned to the right about, to make way for men of energy and decision—men who have made up their minds, or who, at least, are capable of quickly making up their minds on every question which harasses and distracts the Empire, and of acting without fear and without favour on the decision they have conscientiously come to—the better, not only for the country, but for itself. Let us figure to ourselves an open question in a court of law. Bad as these courts are, they have never gone the length of not deciding at all. Suppose two parties were to claim an estate, and the judges declared the question of right "open," who would get the estate? Would there not be a complaint to the Crown, and a petition that the judges should be turned out for incapacity? Suppose a jury left it "open" whether a man were guilty or innocent, what would be thought, and more especially in that country where it is a fixed principle, that, unless the whole twelve be unanimous, the matter has not been sufficiently discussed among them, and where, to punish their indolence or obstinacy, they are kept without meat or drink till they discover the truth, and prove they have done so by coming to an unanimous verdict. As we are not inclined to extreme measures where milder will serve the purpose, we recommend this course in future—viz, that, whenever a question is found to be "open," the Cabinet Ministers be shut up like the Conclave of the Cardinals when a Pope is to be elected, and kept from all intercourse, either with their Royal Mistress or with society, until the "open" question is made a closed one.

PHAGOPHOBIA, A NEW DISEASE.—A large proportion of the people of this country are at this moment under an apprehension, or rather a disease, which we do not believe ever existed in any other country at any period of the history of the human race. It is of so refined a description, though concerning a very vulgar matter—eating and drinking—that no man whose intellect has not been puzzled by a long course of mysticism, could by any means be made to comprehend the grounds or nature of it. We have it from the best authority that we are positively in extreme peril of being inundated—perhaps it is meant—choked, with cheap food by foreigners; not food poisoned with deadly nightshade, such as our ancestors sometimes served up to their foreign invaders, but good, wholesome loaves of wheat; legs of mutton and lamb, raw, roasted, and boiled; sides of beef; pork, hams, Dutch butter, Swiss cheese; and, in short, in culinary phrase, all the delicacies of the season. Then we are to have wine, brandy, and gin at discretion. Thank God, no one has yet told us that we are to get all these good things absolutely for nothing; foreigners, it is thought, may still be prevailed on to take something for them, though many wise heads are satisfied that no sort of persuasion will ever induce them to take anything like a half of what they at present cost among ourselves. But, although there is no immediate danger of our being fed for nothing by foreigners, those who have been abroad are confident that to that consummation matters must soon arrive. When it does happen, matters will be in a pretty state. Only think of a nation of well-fed gentlemen, having nothing earthly to do or think of, but run after foxes the whole year—for there will be no crops to stop the sport all the summer as at present; to shoot, gamble, skate, curl, eat, drink, and be merry! Only imagine a Marquis of Waterford in every parish—and there will be a dozen at least—and consider, what will watchmen's skulls, knockers, and bell-handles be worth! Not one night's purchase, certainly. How long will Muntz keep his beard? Not one week. Where will be the cabman not bribed to drink himself to death, or the "Boots" whose face will not be constantly blackened with his own brushes? But we forgot: there will be no watchmen to knock down, cabmen to fill drunk, boots' faces to blacken—because every one will be a gentleman; and there will be no such thing as a patriot's beard, for there will be nothing to agitate for. It is plain, whenever matters come to this pass, we must beg permission of foreigners to be allowed to hunt their foxes, shoot their game, knock down their policemen, shave their patriots, and so on; for there will not be employment in this country for one half of us in these important occupations. But, objects the patriot starving on sixpence a-day, and who never was proprietor of a wholesome leg of mutton in his life-time, "What will become of landlords, and what of rents?" Never fear, friend—we will be all landlords; the whole world will be our estate, to provide us with food; we will not be troubled with bankrupt tenants and arrears of rent—for there will be no rents, they will be neither asked nor given, because there will be no need for them, and nobody will be the worse for their non-existence. Not you, the sixpenny patriot, who never had any to receive, nor the tenant who has to pay them, nor yet the landlord who will not require them. We will be in precisely the same condition as they are in in the land of Cockaigne, where the trees have dollars instead of leaves, and loaves of bread instead of seeds; where the earth is moistened with wine instead of water; where the pigs run about ready roasted, with hot potatoes in their mouths, and knives and forks stuck in their backs, and, instead of the inharmonious grunt which they at present have with us, whisper to the passengers, in the most insinuating manner, "Come eat me."

SCOTLAND.

COURT OF SESSION.—We believe we were the first to point out, nearly seven years ago, that the business of the Court of Session was in a state of rapid decline. Our statements were regarded, at first, with incredulity, and afterwards with surprise, as no one seemed to have suspected that, while the wealth and population of the country had been increasing so rapidly for the last forty years, the business of the Supreme Civil Court of the kingdom had been progressively falling off during that time. The decline has, however, been proceeding, year after year, since we first published our statement; and matters are now in such a state, that, among the most observant, an opinion begins very generally to prevail, that the time is not far distant when the Court will, or at least ought to be reduced to a court of review of the decisions of the Sheriffs, and consisting of a single chamber of three or four judges. It is a little remarkable, therefore, that the present time should be chosen for bringing a bill into Parliament for increasing the salaries and retired allowances of the judges—these salaries and allowances having been fixed in 1808 and 1810, when every article of consumption, taxation, house rents, &c., were nearly one-half higher than they are at present. The increase of the retiring allowance from three-fourths to full salary is evidently a bait held out to the old judges to retire, in order that the vacancies may be filled up as long as the present Ministry continues in office; but where three or four Whig lawyers worthy of promotion to the Bench are to be found, will, we suspect, exceedingly puzzle the Home Secretary to discover. We trust that the Whigs will at length shew that the administration of justice in Scotland is not for ever to be sacrificed to party purposes. The weak state of the bar, and, perhaps, the declension of the Court in public favour, has arisen from the Tories, during their long misrule, promoting none but their own partisans to the Bench. Nobody complained of this so loudly as the Whigs themselves; but they have hitherto scrupulously copied the example set them. They cannot do so longer with decency; for, if three or four vacancies occur, at least two of them should be given to Tory lawyers, for they are best entitled to it, from their experience, talent, and knowledge of the law. But we hope that, before the House of Commons agrees to any addition to the salaries and retired allowances, they will make an investigation, whether there is any need for so many as thirteen judges. We have long maintained—as was indeed the opinion of the most eminent lawyers of the time—that the division of the Court into two divisions, in 1808, was a most injudicious step. It has led to nothing but contradictory decisions, delay, and annoyance to the suitors, advocates, and agents; for, so far from expediting business—the only ground on which the alteration was advocated—it has led to the reverse, owing to the continual jostlings of two courts, of co-ordinate jurisdiction and having the same body of practitioners, constantly sitting at the same moment. The Court only sits 114 days in the year, and the Chambers of the Inner-House very frequently not more than an hour a-day; and we are convinced that, were one of these chambers to sit only an additional hour a-day—114 hours in the year—it would get through more business, and in a much more satisfactory manner, than both do at present. We therefore recommend to the Whig Government, which, on originally assuming office, professed to rule without patronage, to abolish the Inner-House of the Second Division, by which £13,000 or £14,000 a-year will be saved to the public, and the efficiency of the Court improved. This will be a real saving—not a saving like those which have been made of late years, which will not come into operation for twenty years to come. The Lord Advocate, in enumerating the Courts which have of late years been abolished, (some of them, we think, very injudiciously,) and offices reduced, and in summing up the salaries saved, kept entirely out of view the compensations which are paid to the judges and clerks deprived of office, by which it happens that, instead of a present saving to the public by the reduction, there is in reality an additional burden created, which will terminate only with the lives of the existing generation. In illustration of this system, which has never been exposed, we will give an instance. The office of Extractor in the Court of Session has been abolished, and the business put on a new footing. There were formerly four Extractors and eight clerks, drawing altogether about £2000 a-year. By the new regulation, there are one Principal and one Assistant Extractor, with salaries of £500 and £300; and, instead of £320 for writing-clerks, we will suppose that that head of expenditure will be reduced to £200. There is, no doubt, in this alteration, at first sight, a saving of £1000 a-year; but let us bring the compensations into operation. They are not yet fixed; but we believe we can guess pretty nearly what they will be:—

Two superannuated Extractors, £250 each,	£500	0	0
Eight clerks dismissed, £50 each,	400	0	0
Two Extractors who have been appointed to offices of smaller emolument, £75 each,	150	0	0

And perhaps might be added to this, £300 for compensation to the present principal Extractor, who formerly held an office worth £800 a-year. It will thus be seen how fallacious is any statement of saving by reduction of offices, while compensations are kept out of view. Why every one who has once fingered public money should henceforth, during life, be kept by the public, is a matter that has always transcended our weak understandings; but so it is, and so we presume it must be, until some honest Ministry will carry into execution an old threat of Sir Robert Peel, to bring in a bill declaring that no one who is appointed to any office in a court of law shall have a vested interest therein, but be removable at pleasure, without any claim to compensation.

Supposing the bill for giving the Judges full salary after fifteen years' service is passed, it will be curious to observe which of the Judges will take advantage of it. The four to whom the bait is held out are well known. Now, two, if not three of them, are men of independent fortune; and the retiring allowance of the fourth, under the existing law, is no less than £3125 a-year. All that the two Judges of independent fortune—one a bachelor—would require to give up, is £500 a-year, they being at present entitled to three-fourths of their salaries. Yet rather than resign this fourth part of their official income, and probably an eighth or tenth part of their real incomes, the one is content to do all the duties of President of the Court at the age of nearly ninety, after having been no less than forty-six years a Supreme Judge, and almost three quarters of a century having elapsed since he was called to the bar. It has indeed been stated in Parliament, that he is so weak that it is absolutely necessary to support him by three men when he is delivering judgment. The other clings to office after experiencing one of the severest afflictions to which mankind are subject. The Judges have often told us of the laborious nature of their duties. We have here a simple fact worth twenty speeches. In what other line of life would men, broket down with years or disease, not accept of three-fourth of their salaries, and retire from their labours, even supposing that they had no other means of subsistence? What other inference can be drawn, whatever may be held out about the laborious duties of the Judges, and whatever extent of work is pretended to be shewn by Parliamentary returns, (and we know how these returns have been concocted,) than that, after all, the 114 days' attendance, at least in the Inner-House, is little more than an amusement?

AGRICULTURE.

A much larger breadth of wheat than usual has been sown in all parts of the kingdom, under the most favourable circumstances; and, owing to the mildness of the winter, it is forward and healthy in its appearance. Notwithstanding the agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws, we are happy to say that the demand for farms steadily on the increase, and rents are rapidly rising. We have it from information on which we place the most perfect reliance, that, for one farm in the eastern part of Berwickshire, let within these few weeks, the were upwards of thirty competitors; that, for one of the best farms in Roxburghshire, which was rented £1600—a lease, as we understand it, of the ordinal endurance—£2650, or, by other accounts, £2750, has been given by a most respectable tenant, on a nineteen years' lease; and that, for another farm in the neighbourhood of Jedburgh, which the tenant threw up as not worth the rent of £200 a-year, £260 was obtained, within the month. "Beati nimirum, si sua bona norunt agricola."

POSTSCRIPT POLITICAL.

HOWEVER the present Session of Parliament may close—if it ever come to a natural close—it opens singularly enough. The personages who perform the principal parts move so gingerly, are so afraid of committing themselves and of taking a false step, that no one can affirm more about them than that they are cautiously groping their way, themselves in the dark as to what a day may bring forth, and steady to nothing save the determination Never to resign. Up to the moment at which we write, the Government, we fully believe, have not resolved on the course they are to take with the most pressing questions of the day—the Corn-Law abolition, and the pacification of Canada. Accident must, as usual, shape the course of men who have not, so far as the world is aware, any one fixed or guiding principle.

We are not without considerable apprehension that they will, from discerning the trim of Sir Robert Peel, and the tack on which he lies, pluck up courage to resist the leading of evidence at the Bar of the House on the subject of Corn-Laws and Manufactures. Before this sheet is abroad, that point will be determined one way or the other, and we can barely anticipate anything so glaringly indecent as the opposition of the so-called representatives of the People, to the earnest prayers of the starving People, only that evidence may be heard; that the truth may be elicited and sifted on a subject affecting the vital interests and prospects of the empire, and coming painfully home at this moment to the household of every industrious family in it—for what is the mere handful of the aristocracy in the question of food and of national industry?

To come to the point:—If the petitions of the Corn-Tax payers are either scouted, or civilly shelved, by those who impose and profit by the tax, we would urge upon the Delegates not to lose an hour in leading Evidence themselves, with the concurrence and assistance of as many Members of Parliament as choose to support them; and to publish it from day to day, through the newspapers and every possible channel, to every corner of the empire. Their Report will excite universal interest; and, in the extraordinary circumstances, command as much attention as if issuing from that House which shuts its doors against them. Too little has been hitherto heard of the proceedings of the Delegates—they make too little noise; but their proceedings hitherto may be viewed as only preparatory, and as waiting the fiat of Parliament. The nation also waits, in the assurance that if it become necessary they will make themselves be heard; and assuredly they will be responded to. The circumstance to be lamented at this moment, above all others, is the very mistaken tactics of the Chartists. Not their final objects—not their principles—are objectionable; but the wrong-headedness which keeps them aloof, if not detrimental, when a common object is to be carried, and that with no loss to their cause. The contemporaneous sitting of two rival, and, we fear, hostile bodies of popular delegates, by more distinctly tracing the broadening line of demarcation between the great mass of the people and the middle class, fills every reflecting Reformer with grief. It is the worst new symptom of the social progress, the bitterest fruit of the Reform Bill. The Corn-Law delegates would appear to hold aloof from the Chartist delegates, in disdain of their ignorance and wrong-headedness; and the latter seem to scowl back defiance. Are there no catholic-spirited men among the Corn-Law delegates—such men as Ebenezer Elliott—to persist, day after day, in the attempt to dispel this fatal delusion, and heal that widening breach, of which the enemy of both parties will inevitably take advantage? The tone assumed by some of the Corn-Law abolition advocates to the Chartists, is, instead of wise and conciliating, absolutely insulting and irritating, as if intended to estrange them still farther. They are not assailed by arguments and persuasion, but by scoffing and ridicule. That they are the very same class whose generous self-sacrifices during the Reform struggle, and until every hope of good by the Reform Bill had vanished, it were as ungrateful as unwise to forget. Would they only act in the same magnanimous manner for a few critical months longer, the whole community would have cause to exult in cheap food and returning commercial prosperity, while their particular object would be incalculably forwarded. Cheap food would enable many working men to become householders; and it is through Household Suffrage that Universal Suffrage is to be safely attained, with all the other rights demanded by the Chartists. We almost despair of seeing this lamentable obstacle, more lamentable in its cause, surmounted. The Tories exult in the estrangement and hostility between the lower and middle-class Radicals; and a considerable section of middle-class Reformers, stanch on the subject of Corn-Laws, contemptuously think they can carry their measure without the help of the working-classes, which, to tell the truth, they would be glad to be able to dispense with on many occasions.

It is, we fear, idle to repeat to those determined to shut their ears, that cheap food would form a powerful instrument in procuring a greatly extended suffrage, which must in turn lead on in that right direction in which all true men are moving; differing, not even about the rate of speed, but about the stones and blocks to be first removed out of the path. How we should rejoice to see a deputation of the Chartists take the first step, and go to the Corn-Law delegates, saying—"To our constituents and yours cheap food is equally desirable: the juncture is singularly favourable, and not to be neglected. We will neither forego one jot, nor for a moment lose sight of our own peculiar object; but, in the meanwhile, we will, heart and hand, co-operate with you for yours, which is also ours. It shall not be said that the popular delegates of the English people have for one day stepped between them and the chance of immediate redress, in so vital a matter as their daily bread."

Next in importance, though at an immeasurable distance, comes the question of the settlement of Canada, which at present, by some general conglomeration, appears to be viewed as identical with Lord Durham. His Lordship has had the good sense and good taste not to mix up his personal wrongs, real and imaginary, or his petty resentments, with his suggestions for the pacification of Canada. He has recovered his temper in the meanwhile, and acted on our advice, so far as to say nothing about the past. He may recover his political principles, those which he disclaimed on his return from Russia, and up to the moment that his famous Ordinance was disallowed; but, of all the cautious and gingerly movements of public men, those of Lord Durham, the temper of the individual considered, are the most gingerly. For what high destiny, to be achieved by what extraordinary means, is his Lordship secretly nursing himself? Let his clique say—for his late adulators begin to wonder and question.* Three-and-twenty years ago, his Lordship, it appears, was favourable to a modification of the Corn-Laws, though he has been silent on the subject during the long interval. We trust he is staunch now to the total repeal of every tax—every restriction on food. His individual interests point strongly this way, which is always a favourable circumstance when ordinary men and motives are concerned; though far be it from us to judge his Lordship by the vulgar rules applicable to ordinary men.

One present source of consolation is, that so experienced a man as the Duke of Wellington does not appear to consider the mincing, cinque-pace of official men and political leaders the true measure of that grand Movement which is sweeping all forward. The clear-headed, far-seeing old campaigner seems still afraid to lend a hand at ousting the Whigs, lest what he considers worse shall come of it. This is so far gratifying. But what are the Tory party to think or to do, if the wary Duke persist in following the same course in the present Session which he has done in the last two; critically interposing, in the hour of deadly peril, for the protection of the eminently lucky Favourite; one of whose most fortunate accidents is the position of the Duke; who, too old for the leader in active service, falls back upon the new, if not constitutional office of Supreme Umpire between parties? The Duke of Wellington has more real influence, though indirectly, in the Cabinet, than if the Tories were in power. They might afford to shew something like independence. But how do the Tories like the continuance of this state of things? Do they confess, with the Duke, the weakness of their party, or do they begin to grumble at the "Fabian policy" of their great chief? One or the other they must do.

The intrigue to get rid of Lord Glenelg, we pointed out at the close of last Session. It ramified on Ireland then, and it would have been carried farther long before this time, had the strength of the Premier in Parliament been equal to his will, and to his ascendancy at Court. But Lord Melbourne, notwithstanding the accession of the author of "Yes and No," cannot yet afford to expel the Finality Secretary, endeared to the Tories by his declarations against Reform, and to the whole aristocracy by his ardent support of the system of legalized plunder perpetrated through the Food-tax. There was, as we foretold last autumn, a set purpose of sacrificing Lord Glenelg; partly as the scapegoat for Ministerial unpopularity, but more to strengthen the Premier in a Cabinet which, wanting Glenelg, would have included one honest man the less. It has, however, so chanced, by Lord Melbourne's usual good luck, that, in this last piece of characteristic thimble-riggery, two birds have been hit by one stone. Lord Glenelg is got rid of, having left few abler, and certainly not one honester man behind him; and the raven down of Lord Durham's wrath may perhaps be somewhat smoothed by the sacrifice. Lord Glenelg, in the arrangement of the Cabinet, was thrust into the most onerous and invidious office of the State; crippled in power, circumvented in action, and, we can make no question, very ill-informed on matters that would indeed require the study of an official life, and the farther advantage of long practical acquaintance with the business details of the colonies. Really it would be much better in the present state of things, that the high families of Whigs and Tories should come to an understanding to take the government in turn, on a lease of seven or ten years each, than this perpetual changing of official men in the great departments, with the necessary ignorance and probable incapacity of each new Colonial Secretary, or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and the farther circumstance, that every new man has his fresh set of hungry clients to satisfy or glut at the expense of the people. The only fault that can be found with Lord Glenelg is, that, having accepted an important office, he had not, on sounding the hollow ground on which he stood, either manfully insisted for power corresponding to his responsibility, or had at once resigned. He was, moreover, the member of a Cabinet who behaved with the blackest perfidy to Lord Brougham, and very ill to Lord Durham; and now his turn has come, and we regret to see less expression of sympathy from any party, at his betrayal, than might have been expected; though the shameless conduct of his treacherous colleagues does excite indignation, and would excite more, save that the public are now so well accustomed to such things that they are looked on as mere matters of course. Lord Glenelg will probably give some explanation of the intrigue by which he has been ousted. It ought to be ample and unsparing. As a statesman in office, his career is probably closed; but another duty remains, to which his talents are fully equal, and for which the moral influence of his character renders him eminently fit.

Among the many intrigues and treacheries of the period, and the excessive caution of every one of the great leaders, the conduct of O'Connell is not the least inexplicable. The torrents of rage poured out upon Lord Brougham is a mere interlude; but what is the piece to be?—is it to be farce or tragedy? This, however, we will say—insult more deliberate and mortal was never offered to any public man, than the British Minister has studiously offered to O'Connell; and, if he forget or meekly brook it, he is not the man we take him for. How he has been restrained, even for one day, makes the affair look more portentous. Does Mr O'Connell deserve the reward the grateful Whigs are preparing for him, and of which we warned him long ago? Great Britain says he does; and much of the intelligence of Ireland confirms the judgment.

* Will any of the sponsors for Lord Durham's political consistency and reform principles, inform the public of his reasons for refusing to preside at a Great Corn-Law Dinner of the London Delegates and the friendly M.P.'s?—and farther, why, if such a Demonstration was considered necessary, it could not take place although his Lordship declined to join in it, or to give it the light of his countenance?

THE LANDOWNERS VERSUS THE NATION.

NUMBER OF THE LANDED INTEREST.

It being now admitted by every one who has the least pretension to candour, that the landowners alone have any interest in keeping up the price of food—that it is a mere landlord's question—it becomes a matter of some importance to ascertain what are the real numbers and actual property of those for whom every other class of the community is to be sacrificed.

In his late speech in Parliament, Mr Cayley made the astounding assertion that, in the United Kingdom, there were no less than 600,000 land-proprietors, and that five-sixths of the whole population depended upon them; and this assertion was allowed to pass without remark in the House of Landlords; for, whether Repealers or Anti-Repealers, it was, no doubt, exceedingly gratifying to their vanity. Mr Cayley, however, has attempted to prove too much. If he be correct, the landed interest must be miserably poor; for it is well ascertained that the land rental of England does not amount to £80,000,000 of Ireland, to 10,000,000
nor of Scotland, to 5,000,000

Gross Land Rental of the United Kingdom, £45,000,000

The Irish Poor-Law Commissioners estimate that in Ireland one-tenth must be deducted for expenses and losses, and three millions for the interest of charges, making the net rental of Ireland six millions; and applying the same deduction (four-tenths) to the whole United Kingdom, we have the mighty landowners reduced to £27,000,000 a-year. The incomes arising from trade, commerce, and professions, excluding those under £50 per annum, have been ascertained, from the property-tax return of 1810, to be £30,000,000. (See Encyclopedia Britannica, art. France.) This exceeds the land rental of itself. But the landowners used to be fond of holding out that the land was the security the national creditors had for their money: and, hoping that they are quite ready and willing to pay off the debt, it will be found, on examination, that the interest and the expense of its management are upwards of twenty-eight millions and a-half; so that it is not the landed interest—which, on this supposition, has ceased to exist in any other condition than in bankruptcy—but the national creditors, that will suffer, if the Corn-Law Repealers have their unholy will. And, in truth, it is difficult to see on what other principle than by succeeding to the soil of the country any one can be liable for the national debt. It was contracted by the owners of that soil, who are now where nobody will go to seek them, for the sole purpose of protecting their estates from being transferred to new and foreign proprietors—in much the same way as their own ancestors had acquired them—by force; or the loans were divided among themselves and connexions. On every principle, therefore, of common sense, law, justice, and morality, the burden should be borne by those who have reaped the benefit. We must, however, admit that it must be rather a humiliating reflection for the landed interest to find that, so far from being the only class in the state worthy of consideration, the holders of public stock alone are richer than themselves. Were we to compare them with the working classes, it would be seen that the wages of the latter exceed, by five-fold, their rentals.

If Mr Cayley's computation be correct, however, the clear rental of our landowners is considerably under fifty pounds each; which, of itself, shews he is in error, unless he includes every owner of an area a few feet square under the name of landowner. We must, therefore, look for some better authority on this subject than the honourable Member. Dr Beeke, whose authority in such matters is praised by M'Culloch, estimated that there are 200,000 proprietors in England and Wales; and the Secretary of the Central Agricultural Association, instituted in 1835, also a good authority, estimated them at 300,000 in the whole United Kingdom. We cannot help thinking, however, that these estimates are greatly over-rated; for, in Scotland, the whole number of estates was ascertained, under the property-tax returns, to be 7,700; and, as the number in each county was returned separately, and some of our nobility have estates in above half-a-dozen counties, and many of our landed gentlemen in three or four, the number of proprietors must have been much less than that of estates. But there is another circumstance from which the small number of landowners in the kingdom may be inferred. In Scotland, under the old system of representation, hardly a proprietor of £200 a-year, or upwards, was to be found who was not enrolled as a freeholder. When the Reform Act was passed, the total county constituency of Scotland was only 3,211; and, on examining some of the counties with which we are best acquainted, we observed that at least one-half must be struck off, as enrolled in more counties than one, for life-renters and fiars twice entered on the roll, and for parchment-voters not having an acre of landed property. We, therefore, do not see how there can be anything like 100,000 landed proprietors—having £300 a-year, and upwards—in the three kingdoms; yet a class contemptible in numbers, and not to be compared, in point of income, to the labouring men alone, by means of banding together, keeps up a succession of governments which will not even listen to the complaints of the other classes; and, for fear of alarming them, forsooth, (because we observe the best-informed men in Parliament are satisfied the repeal of the Corn-Laws would do them no actual injury,) twenty-six millions are to be sacrificed. This is the way in which mankind are governed in the middle of the nineteenth century!

As to Mr Cayley's statement, that five-sixths of the population depend upon the landed interest, it may be averred, with much greater certainty, that nine-tenths of the landed interest depend upon the middle and working classes. How many of these lords of the soil could keep their estates, were the charges and mortgages secured upon them to be suddenly called up? And how would there be any rent at all, if the working classes did not purchase, from the wages of their labour, the produce of the soil? If the landowners say, they give the labourer his wages, we ask them, What would their land be worth without labour—without cultivation? A man may transfer his labour to another country. Can the landowners remove their estates? If their income enables them to do so much, are not the middle, the working classes, nay the fundholders alone, equally potent?

EXCLUSIVE TAXATION OF LAND.

One of the chief arguments in favour of what is called the Protection of Agriculture—that is, the keeping up of rents—is, that the land, or landed interest, is burdened exclusively with a variety of taxes from which other classes are exempt. This is a topic not only insisted on at all public meetings held for the support of the Corn Laws, but adopted in Parliament by the Tory leaders. In one of the late debates, for example, the Duke of Wellington said—"The existing Corn-Laws cannot be repealed without the repeal of many of the duties and charges now imposed on the land." What these were, his Lordship did not specify; but Sir Robert Peel was a little more explicit: he remarked—"Could he, in arguing it, [repeal of the Corn-Laws,] put out of view the land-tax, county-rates, the malt-tax, and other burdens, which pressed so heavily on the land?" Now, let us consider these various taxes. The land-tax can be traced back to the earliest antiquity: it was levied in the Saxon times, though under a different name. The landowners were then the sole military force of the country. William the Conqueror divided England into knights' fees, of which there were 60,125; and for every knight's fee the proprietor was bound, at his own expense, annually, to attend personally on horseback the king in his wars for forty days. In Edward the Second's time, (1307-1327,) every one who held a knight's fee, which amounted to only £20 per annum, was obliged to be knighted, and attend the king in his wars, or fined for non-compliance. Edward VI., Queen Elizabeth, and Charles I., exerted the prerogative of making knights, as considerable fees accrued to the crown upon performance of the ceremony. In this manner there was, at all times, a large military force kept up at the exclusive expense of the landowners; and the burden must have been very severe, as it will be observed, that for every 20s. of land rent, a cavalry soldier for two days was required to be furnished. Making every allowance for the fall of the value of money, (and it has not been so great as in most other countries, the pound weight of silver at the Conquest being coined into 20s., and at present into 66s. of the same fineness,) we may easily imagine what a magnificent army the land rental of England and Wales, which now amounts to thirty millions, would furnish. The notion of our ancestors was, that property in land imposed duities as well as conferred rights; they never imagined that the influence that kind of property necessarily gave, was to be used, first, to free the owners from the obligation they had come under to defend the kingdom, and lay it upon others; and, secondly, artificially to diminish the supply of food, that rent-rolls might be increased. But, instead of being now provided exclusively by the landowners, the army costs the general revenue eight millions a-year, or more than one-half of the free revenue after deduction of the interest of the national debt. This obligation to provide for the national defence the landowners have never been relieved from. During the contest between King Charles and the Parliament, the land-tax was imposed, and at a rate varying from £35,000 to £120,000 a month, or one million four hundred thousand pounds a-year. Though termed land-tax in England, the Scotch term cess is much more applicable to it; for it is assessed upon individuals in reference to their real property, and in Scotland one-sixth of it has always been paid by the royal burghs. In England, it appears from the evidence given before the Agricultural Committee of 1836, that only about one-half is assessed on the land rental. In 1692, a new assessment or valuation of estates was made throughout England; and at the Union the proportion of the new land-tax was fixed at a trifle under two millions for England, and under £48,000 for Scotland. At that period, the total revenue of England was little more than five millions and a-half; that of Scotland was £110,694: so that the land-tax in each kingdom yielded considerably more than one-third of the total revenue of the country. Now the revenue of the kingdom exceeds forty-five millions; so that the land-tax, which has never been increased, does not, at present, yield so much as a twentieth part of the gross revenue—so careful have the landowners in Parliament been of their own interest. The land-tax imposed at the Union was calculated to amount to 4s. in the pound of the real rent; and, as it affects not only land but other real property, instead of yielding little more than two millions, as it does at present—allowing for about a third of it which has been redeemed—it would yield ten millions, were the same proportion of the rental drawn now as at the beginning of last century. The land-tax was also levied on pensions and personal property; but the holders of the hereditary pensions granted to the heirs of the Marquis of Schomberg (who was killed at the battle of the Boyne in 1689) and the Duke of Marlborough, having complained, pensions were relieved from the tax a few years ago. There is nothing whatever in the Treaty of Union to prevent the augmentation of the land-tax; all that that treaty does is to fix the proportion. Ireland has never paid, at any time, the land-tax—why, it would be difficult to imagine; but this is one of the penalties we pay for the privilege of governing the Irish, not like subjects, but as conquered enemies, and for keeping up an established priesthood in that country. In France, the direct taxes, chiefly on land, amount to thirteen millions; so that our landowners have very little reason to complain of the land-tax, not more than one-half of which appears to fall on them. Besides, not one of the present proprietors is any more entitled to complain of the land-tax, or other burdens on his land, than of the tithes; because, his land having been always subject to them, he took it under that condition, if he acquired it gratuitously. If, on the other hand, he purchased it for a fair price, then, in estimating that price, the burdens were deducted, and the value estimated on the balance; so that, if these burdens were to be removed, it is not the present holders of estates, but those from whom they were purchased, who ought to enjoy the benefit of the removal.

The next burden on land specified by Sir Robert Peel, was the county-rates. These amount, in England and Wales, to about a million and a half annually, of which between a half and two-thirds only (688 in 1000) are paid by the land. The application of the assessment is very much the same as that raised in towns under the name of police tax—viz., the erection of jails and houses of correction, the payment of constables, the protection of property, the apprehension of criminals, &c. Why the landowners should not protect their own property but throw that expense on their neighbours in the shape of a Corn-Law, and, at the same time, complain of the rates they themselves voluntarily levy and expend for this purpose, is not obvious.

How the malt-tax and spirit-tax can be said to be burdens on the landowner, we cannot well understand. We know, indeed, that it is asserted they lower the price of barley and the rent of light soils; but we have seen no evidence of the assertion. Like the land-tax, however, they are of long standing, (the malt-tax having been first imposed in England in 1697;) and must, therefore, have been taken into consideration by the present landowners, when they acquired their estates. But the malt-tax and spirit-tax do not fall upon the landowner and tenant, but upon the consumer of the malt and spirits. This is the opinion of the most distinguished political economists. Adam Smith, for reasons which he has fully detailed, gives it as his opinion, that "the different taxes which have been imposed upon malt, beer, and ale, have never lowered the price of barley, have never reduced the rent of light soils, have never lowered the price of barley land. The price of malt to the brewer has constantly risen in proportion to the taxes imposed on it; and these taxes, together with the different duties upon beer and ale, have constantly raised the price, or, what comes to the same thing, reduced the quality of those commodities to the consumer. THE FINAL PAYMENT OF THESE TAXES HAS FALLEN CONSTANTLY UPON THE CONSUMER, AND NOT UPON THE PRODUCER." His commentator, Mr Buchanan, remarks on this passage—"A duty on malt never could reduce the price of barley; because, unless as much could be made of barley by malting it, as by selling it unmalted, the quantity required would not be brought to market. It is clear, therefore, that the price of barley must rise in proportion to the tax imposed on it, as the demand could not otherwise be supplied." Mr James Mill demonstrates the same point; and the conclusion he comes to is, "that a tax upon corn, for example, would raise the price of corn as of any other commodity. It would fall by consequence neither upon the farmer nor upon the landlord, but upon the consumer." Indeed, if we look at the prices of barley and malt in any market, we will see that the duty falls on the consumer; for we will always find that the price of malt is, at least, by the whole amount of the duty, (20s. 8d. per quarter,) dearer than barley, although the expense of the manufacture is, in a great measure, paid by the increase in bulk—29 quarters of barley making 33 quarters of malt. Of late years, indeed, the price of barley has sometimes very little exceeded the malt-duty. For example, in winter 1835, it was selling at 26s. 8d. Will any one contend that out of this the farmer paid the malt duty, leaving to himself only 6s. a-quarter?

We have a decisive test of the incidence of such taxes, in what took place on the repeal of the beer-duty. That duty raised considerably above three millions annually; and, at the rates charged, a quantity of beer was made from a quarter of barley on which was paid about 30s. of duty. The duty on a quarter of malt is only two thirds of this, or 20s. 8d.; so that the former was considerably higher than the latter, and the two together (50s. 8d.) were much higher than the price of the barley. The amount of beer-duty collected, shews that upwards of two millions of quarters of barley must have been annually consumed in the manufacture of beer; and there does not appear any probability that the total quantity brought to market then exceeded five millions of quarters; for the whole British spirits charged with duty annually, at the same period, was twenty-two millions of gallons—a quantity which little more than a million of quarters of barley will produce. Had, therefore, the beer-tax, according to Sir Robert Peel's theory, been a tax on the landowner or farmer, the consequence of its repeal must have been to raise the price of barley at least two-fifths of 30s., or 12s. a-quarter. But what was the result?—The price of barley, instead of rising after the repeal of the duty, positively fell, as appears from the annual average price of the five years before and after the repeal, which took place on 10th October 1830.

being, instead of a rise of 12s., a fall of 8s. 9d. a-quarter, by a repeal of what was alleged to have been a burden on the farmer of upwards of three millions a-year. It would be a very comfortable thing, indeed, could a tax be imposed in so judicious a manner as to fall on the producer and not on the consumer. It would be the strongest argument ever adduced for free trade. But will anybody maintain that the French pay the million and a half we annually collect as duty on foreign brandy, or that they and other foreigners pay the duties on wine and on the other articles we import from foreigners? How is it possible, for instance, that, out of 5s. or 6s. a-gallon, which the Frenchman gets for his brandy, he can pay our duty of 22s. 6d. a-gallon? The authorities and facts we have given shew completely how the farmers are deluded by the landowners. In 1836, when our agriculturists had had for many years a complete monopoly of the home market, the landlords, to avoid reducing their rents, held out to their tenantry, as a means of relieving their distresses, the repeal of the malt-tax; although they must have known, or shrewdly suspected, that the effect of the removal of that tax would have lowered the price of malt and not raised the price of barley.

Since the reduction of poor-rates, nearly one half, in England under the new poor-law, and the removal of thousands of families from the agricultural to the manufacturing districts, the landed interest seem almost ashamed to enumerate these as an exclusive burden on land; and neither do we hear much of tithes—for it is now pretty well understood that to complain of paying tithes, is equivalent to complaining that the landowner is not allowed to draw and retain for his own use the rent of 1000 acres of land, when he only purchased and paid for 900 acres.

It would indeed have been a very extraordinary matter if a Parliament which has always consisted of two houses, one of Lords and another of Landlords, elected almost entirely by the holders of real property, and in which the middle classes not connected with land, and the operative classes, have never been represented, should have imposed exclusive taxation upon themselves—that is, upon the landed interest. No such thing has occurred, nor, we may add, ever will occur, in the history of mankind. Had they not done the very reverse—had they not shifted every burden off themselves upon the unrepresented—it would have been wonderful; and we shall therefore now proceed to shew how they have exempted the land from taxation, and imposed exclusive burdens on industry and labour.

EXCLUSIVE TAXATION OF INDUSTRY AND LABOUR.

We might commence this enumeration by setting down, without much hesitation, the whole stamp-duties, amounting to nearly seven millions per annum;—for, except the duties on dice, cards, plate, race-horses, a small proportion of the advertisements, receipts, and stamp-duties on deeds—the landowner is hardly reached by that branch of the revenue. The industrious classes pay exclusively the following duties:—

Probates and Letters of Administration,	£900,000
Legacies,	1,100,000
Bills of Exchange,	500,000
Receipts, four-fifths,	150,000
Marine Insurance,	200,000
Stamp-Office Licenses, and Certificates to exercise Professions and Trades, (i.e., for permission to work !)	250,000
Fire Insurance (from which Farm-Buildings, Stock, Crop, &c. &c., are exempt.)	1,100,000
Stamps for Deeds and Advertisements, 4-5ths,	750,000
Auctions, (produce of land, &c., is exempt.)	250,000
Excise Licenses of all sorts, (Auctioneers selling produce of Land, &c., are exempt.)	900,000

Carry forward, £6,100,000

Brought forward, £6,100,000
 The Post-Office Revenue is £2,250,000 per annum. The nobility, and 658 Members of the House of Commons, are exempt from payment; we may therefore put down for the industrious classes, 2,000,000

£8,100,000

So that, besides the starvation laws, which impose a burden for behoof of the landlord, of at least ten millions, we have an additional taxation for the purpose of public revenue, pressing on the industrious classes exclusively, of EIGHT MILLIONS more ! !

We have not overlooked those taxes chiefly paid by the upper classes, such as those on servants, carriages, dogs, armorial bearings, game duty; but those duties, in so far as they press on the landed interest, are much more than compensated by the following, to which that interest hardly contributes, viz. :—

Stage Carriages, &c.	£400,000
Post Horses,	200,000
Hackney Carriages, &c.	50,000

Horses used in agriculture, shepherds' dogs, &c. &c., do not pay any duty. The house-duty was most unfairly collected; for, while the houses in towns and villages paid to the utmost, the mansions of the aristocracy were not assessed at one-tenth of their real value, and farm-houses were not assessed at all. In this way, nearly a million was annually drawn exclusively from the industrious classes.

The great branches of the revenue are the customs and excise; and the landowners, tenantry, and peasantry contribute to the payment of these in a very small proportion. The first two classes do not probably exceed one million, and the farm-servants and labourers are so miserably paid that they have nothing to spend on luxuries. In Scotland, they do not earn more than 7s. and 8s. a-week throughout the year, even when fully employed. In England, it may be more—say 10s.; but in Ireland, according to the evidence of the Poor-Law Commissioners, it is not more than from 2s. to 2s. 6d. a-week. It is therefore impossible that they can afford to live on anything but oat and barley meal, potatoes and milk. The Scotch peasantry do not, as we well know, consume anything else from year's end to year's end, even in the best countries, except upon rare occasions. It is therefore plain that the customs and excise must be paid, in a much larger proportion than their numbers, by those unconnected with agriculture or land; who form, as the population returns shew, two-thirds of the entire population of the kingdom. Mr Cayley's proposed amendment to Mr Villiers' motion, is an additional instance of the one-sided way in which the landed interest go to work—viz., "That under the heavy debt and taxation of this country, its productive industry and vested interests require to be protected from the lightly taxed produce and cheaper labour of foreign countries." Now, if the four words in Italics be taken out, it is a resolution which every manufacturer will assent to. The "cheaper labour" arises from cheaper food; and the object of repealing the Corn Laws, is to equalize the price of food. But how does it follow that, because a working man has to pay 3d. a-pound on his sugar to Government, he ought therefore to pay another 3d. on his loaf to the landlords? It is as complete a non sequitur as we have seen; for the obvious argument is, that precisely because he is taxed by the Government, he ought not to be taxed by the landowners.

THE CORN-LAW ADVOCATES.

One of the stratagems which the supporters of a desperate argument occasionally resort to, is what is called, in sporting language, throwing out a false scent; and, if the opponent is so weak as to relinquish the true trail for the false, the stratagem is successful. A stratagem of this sort was resorted to, in a letter lately published in an Edinburgh newspaper, by one subscribing himself an "East Lothian Farmer"—though any person who read the letter might easily have seen he knew nothing either of East Lothian or farming. The false scent was laid in assuming, first, that the repeal of the Corn-Laws would throw a great deal of land out of cultivation; and, to use his own words, second, that "the thin clays of this country, though capable of producing wheat of the best quality, cannot be laid down in permanent pasture, so as to produce grass for the sustenance of cattle or sheep; that the alternate system of cropping alone, gives to them a temporary capability of bearing grass; that, with all the culture you bestow on them, the manure you pour into them, the draining they receive, (though these means of improvement will doubtless produce a present flush of pasture grass,) the grasses on these soils, after the first year, degenerate and die out in the succeeding years; these lands revert to a state of utter unproductiveness, till they become unfit, I do not say for the feeding, but even for the subsistence of animals." The obvious answer to all this is, that, although the fields should become bare, it is no reason why the people should starve; and that a good dinner is a better prospect to a hungry man than a green field. But to the argument. The first assumption proceeds on another, that wheat can be imported into this country and sold for 24s. a-quarter. Now, as every one knows, Dantzic is the greatest port in the world for the export of wheat, and the price there regulates the market in all countries where free importation is allowed. We have, on the average, received more than one-third of our foreign wheat from that quarter. Let us see them, not on vague assertion, but on evidence to be relied on, what is the price there. Mr Grade of Dantzic furnished the Agricultural Committee of 1821 with a table of the average prices, free on board, in decennial periods, from 1770 to 1820. The lowest was in the period 1770 to 1779, 35s. 6d.; the highest 1800 to 1809, 60s.; and the aggregate average price of the whole forty-nine years, 45s. 4d. Another table was furnished subsequently by the British Consul, for the ten years, 1822-1831; and the lowest average was 23s. 8d., in 1824; the highest 50s. 2d., in 1831; the average of the whole period, 33s. 6d., and, adding shipping charges, 34s. 2d., free on board. But the cause of the low price during 1823-4-5 can be very easily explained. The average annual export of wheat from Dantzic, as we learn from Mr Jacob, for the whole period 1801-1825, was 200,330 quarters, of which more than three-fourths, 157,359 quarters, came to Britain. But we only imported from that port, in 1821, 39,258; in 1822, 21,528; in 1823, 4,635; which cessation of demand, of course, created a complete glut at Dantzic. It is in vain, therefore, to expect to be able to purchase wheat at Dantzic at less than 40s. We are quite aware that at Hamburg, wheat is occasionally lower than at Dantzic. It is, however, very inferior in quality; but, notwithstanding, the price, on the average of the ten years, 1822 to 1831, was 26s. 6d. per quarter. Then, about the freight, the most absurd notions prevail. The great bulk and weight of corn is overlooked. Four quarters of good wheat weigh a ton. From Mr Jacob's statement, corroborated by others, it appears that wheat cannot be brought from Dantzic to London, all charges included, for less than 10s. a-quarter; so that Prussian wheat will cost, on arrival in London, 50s. Considering the perishable nature of the commodity, and the risk which always attends the corn-trade, we may allow 15 per cent. of profit to the importer, which brings up the sale-price in London to 57s. 6d., instead of 24s. Now, the average price of wheat, of late years, in this country, has been very greatly below 57s. 6d.; the average of the three years 1833, 1834, 1835, was only 46s.; and we cannot, therefore, see any probability of land being thrown out of cultivation by a repeal of the Corn-Laws.

But we shall be very happy if any one can convince us that foreign wheat can be imported for 24s., and still better pleased if it can be had for 10s. It would, in our opinion shew, in a stronger light than ever, the impolicy of the Corn-Laws, the oppressiveness of their nature, and the necessity for their instant and total repeal.

But, although land should be thrown out of cultivation, we deny that there is any difficulty in laying down any land which will bear good wheat, in permanent pasture. It is undoubtedly true, that, as the matter is at present managed, pastures, not only on poor clays, but on all sorts of soils, get thin after the first year; but this arises from farmers sowing only one species of grass, rye grass, out of nearly 300 species: whereas no old pasture can be shewn in which there are not, at least, twenty or thirty species of true grasses, besides hundreds of other plants. Where a proper selection of grasses and other plants has been made, the pasture has become as good in two years as it otherwise would have done in ten; and, so far from its being necessary to plough it up, it will improve for centuries, if properly managed. One of the most extensive proprietors in Berwickshire, celebrated for his knowledge of agriculture, who died lately, left an entail of his estate; and, as there were nearly 600 acres of pasturage on it, some nearly a century old, it is one of the provisions of the entail, that, if any heir shall plough up any part of that pasturage, he shall forfeit the estate.

But sorry are we to say that the landlords must not console themselves as to their pastures. The Corn-Law repealers mean to have some kitchen to their foreign bread; not only foreign butter and cheese, which they are allowed occasionally to have at present, but some foreign beef, mutton, &c.—prohibited articles—and which can be bought for 2d. per lb. in the retail markets of Prussia.

So much nonsense, however, is poured out from all quarters about the effect of the repeal of the Corn-Laws, that, were we to dedicate the whole Magazine to the subject, we would not have space sufficient for an answer. We shall therefore make only one statement, which will surprise those who expect such an inundation of foreign corn. Taking the annual consumpt of all kinds of grain in the United Kingdom at 60,000,000 qrs., and allowing each vessel to make two voyages a year, the whole registered shipping of England, Scotland, and Ireland, could not import in THREE YEARS ONE YEAR'S SUPPLY. So that, though we could get grain abroad for nothing, we must still grow it here, because it would be impossible to import the large quantity consumed.

It is now plain that the Starvation-Laws can be got rid of only in one way—that by which the Reform Act was carried—operating on the fears of the aristocracy. But, as long as the Universal-Suffrage men keep aloof from the middle classes, the landed interest, as they do not affect to conceal, will hold both in contempt, and neither extension of the Suffrage nor any other beneficial measure will be obtained. Evidence appears to be daily accumulating, that, for the purpose of preserving the Corn-Laws, the Tories are secretly fomenting the division between the middle and working classes—a most dangerous policy, certainly, and which, sooner or later, will recoil on their own heads, with a fearful reaction. Meantime, the Repealers are not idle. They foresaw their defeat, and are not discouraged; and the facts and arguments which have been brought forward in Parliament and by the press, and widely circulated throughout the country, will soon produce their natural effect, particularly if aided by another bad harvest. We have seldom had a worse seed-time than the present; and, if the weather does not soon improve, the lords and landlords may have something more than their rent-rolls to defend next winter.

THE SHIPWRECKED SAILOR.

Suggested by Mr Harvey's picture, The Castaway, at present exhibited in the Royal Scottish Academy.

THE shipwrecked sailor on the raft
Drifts o'er the wide, wide sea;
Of all the mates that sailed with him,
Remains now only he;
And he drifts away, alone, alone,
On the wide and desert sea.

The dog that watched with him is dead:
With his last strength he laid his head
Upon his master's knee;
And he looked with a piteous look,
That seemed to say, as 'twere a book,
"Good master, sinned or you or I,
That we are thus cast out to die
Upon the desert sea?"

O God! O God! for three long days
He drifted alone on the sea:
For three long weeks he had drifted on
With his mates, on the wide, wide sea.
It was a weary, weary fare!
A demon might have feasted there
To see such sights of woe.

Lean Hunger there, and pale Hope, fed
With long delay, did ply their trade
To lay each brave heart low.
They were torn with tortures, and gnawed with pains,
They were baked with heats, and washed with rains,
And yet their death was slow.
All, one by one, they dropt away—
A new dead man for each new day.
They had not strength to give a groan;
Like weak and wasted things they fell—
And he was left alone.

The shipwrecked sailor on his raft
Is drifting o'er the sea;
With his parched skin and staring bones,
A ghastly man is he;
And he holds up his bony hand,
And his arm so brown and bare,
And his hungry soul peers forth beneath
His black and knotty hair;
And, with a fixed and eager eye,
He looks into the air:—

"O Jesu Mary, save my soul!"
A ghastly man is he;
Alas! and yet for three long days
He shall drift on the wide, wide sea.

The first day was a scowling day:
The winds in angry gusts did bray,

The clouds were wintry black;
The light shone out with a loveless glare,
As a thing strange to the troublous air:
The waves boomed on at a giant pace;
And wild and swift was the eager race
Of the headlong-driving rack.

"I thank thee, God!" the sailor cried,
Rejoicing in the roar;
For three long weeks the sailor's heart
Had not rejoiced before.
"Blow, wind, and crack thy cheeks, if thou Wilt blow my raft ashore!"

The second day was a sultry day:
There was no health in the sun's ray—
The sun was livid lead;
The air was hot and thick; the clouds
Seemed wearing Nature's choking shrouds;
You might have heard a spirit walk;
The busy waves that love to talk
Were silent as the dead.

"'Tis the siroc!—the hot siroc
Blows from no distant strand!
Welcome the Arab waste to me,
Or Afric's burning sand!
Crack Nature's joints with heat, if thou
Be harbinger of land!"

The third day was a joyful day:
The sun went forth with laughing ray;
A cheering west wind blew;
The frequent monsters of the deep
Plied huge their buoyant roll and leap;
Life was a-sport; the sea was mad;—
One only soul was silent, sad,
Amid the loud halloo.

And he did pray to God Most High,
An inward, voiceless prayer:
"O save me—save me, God Most High!—
Save me or here or there!"
And, with a fixed and eager eye,
He looked into the air.

"O God, the land!—I spy the land!
O God, the land!—the blessed land!"
The shipwrecked sailor cried;
But his thread was broke with that strong cry,
And with salvation in his eye
The shipwrecked sailor died.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH'S PAMPHLET ON THE BALLOT *

THOUGH the two hundred and twelve professed advocates of Ballot in the House of Commons are slumbering and sleeping, it is evident that the aristocracy are alarmed at the steady progress of the question in popular favour; and the friends of things as they are, feel themselves forced to attack a principle which is opposed to their usurpation and cupidity, cuts at the root of all the corruption and vice created by the present system, and gives the People an opportunity of using their franchise fearlessly and independently.

The Rev. Sydney Smith—the sleek canon of St Paul's Cathedral, formerly a preacher in an Episcopalian Chapel in the Cowgate, and one of the originators of The Edinburgh Review, subsequently Rector of Foston, &c., Yorkshire—has just published a violent attack upon the Ballot. The parson is one of those who profess liberal opinions, so long as they have no practical bearing upon their own pockets. He has lately shewn himself as a supporter of the abuses of the Church Establishment, and the prebendal gilding of the English cathedrals; and spares neither O'Connell, Hume, Melbourne, Russell, nor his Grace of Canterbury, though he plumes himself upon the name of Whig. The Ballot, he knows, would deprive the gentry of that undue influence which they now hold, and make them humble themselves so far as to render it necessary for them to earn by their conduct the good opinion of constituencies; and his pride revolts against a principle that asserts that a country bumpkin or city cheesemonger has as good a right to have an opinion as a squire or a pluralist.

We hail the appearance of Mr Smith's pamphlet with satisfaction; for it will have the effect of arousing public attention to a subject of the deepest importance; and the examination of the case will shew the people of the United Kingdom the flimsy pretences and the shallow arguments which the aristocracy have to advance against the Ballot. It will at once be admitted that it is of the highest importance to the interests and liberties of the People that we should have an independent House of Commons. The independence of the Lower House is the base upon which the whole fabric of our liberty rests; and, if it become subservient to the Upper—if, instead of watching with jealousy the two branches of the legislature that are independent of the People, it leagues with them, to perpetuate the subjection of the People and divide the spoil—we have no security for freedom. The British constitution is founded on the theory, that the Assembly of Commons are appointed to represent the nation at large, in opposition to the aristocracy—therefore, any system which tends to place the House of Commons under the influence or in the power of either crown or nobility, is opposed to the constitution.

Now, the case of Ballot is this:—Does, or does not, the present system enable the aristocratic class to obtain a preponderating influence in the House of Commons?

Let the nation answer the question. Is it not notorious that the majority of the members of the House of Commons not only are selected from the aristocratic class, but obtain their seats by means of intimidation and bribery? Nobody, in his reason, can deny it. It is true, the borough system no longer exists; it is true that we are in the sixth year of what is called the Reformed Parliament; but, notwithstanding all this, is it not a fact that we have no more security for good government now than formerly?—that the aristocracy, by means of their gold and their influence, can bend the House of Commons to their purposes? The remark of Paine is still true, that it is wholly owing to the constitution of the People, and not to the constitution of the Government, that the crown is not so oppressive in England as in Turkey.

What has our Whig canon—this great gun of the church-and-state-abuses party—to say to this? He shirks the question. He was a Reformer. Parliamentary Reform meant the independence of the House of Commons—the control of that branch of the legislature by the People—an end to bribery, corruption, and the undue influence of the aristocracy. The Reform Bill has not answered these ends; yet he can see no evils, and but few inconveniences, in the present system; and is utterly opposed to change. He is even witty upon the subject. “Many honest men,” he says, “may wish for these changes. I know, or at least believe, that wheat and barley would grow if there were no Archbishop of Canterbury, and domestic fowls would breed if our Viscount Melbourne were again called Mr Lamb; but they have stronger nerves than I have who would venture to bring these changes about.” He says, in another place—“There is no end to these eternal changes. We have made an enormous revolution within the last two years; let us stop a little, and secure it from being turned into ruin.”

But how are we to secure the advantage gained by the Reform Bill? Let Mr Sydney Smith answer that. Let him shew us any other method than the Ballot to preserve the independence of the House of Commons, and put an end to the bribery, suborning, false-swearing, drunkenness, and debauchery, that are created by the present system. He advances none; he sees none of the evils which are visible to everybody else. His object is not to protect the liberty of the People, not to promote their happiness or elevation, but to defend the nobility and gentry, and protect their ill-gotten booty.

* The Ballot. By the Rev. Sydney Smith. Longman. 1839.

Who will believe him when he asserts, that he has "very rarely seen a combination against any tradesman who modestly, quietly, and conscientiously took his own line in politics?" The experience of every reader of these pages contradicts Mr Smith. No man at all intimate with the practices at our elections can be ignorant of the intimidation, the undue influence, in every variety of form, which is brought to bear against tradesmen and shopkeepers. In contested elections, no man exercises the franchise, unless he have virtue sufficient to disregard the seductions of money, independence to resist dictation, and moral courage to set the opinion of a violent party at defiance. At a late election in Yorkshire, one of the successful candidates declared on the hustings, with reference to the owner of property in the Ainsty of York, that he had driven the electors to the poll, against him, like hogs from his ain sty! Mr Sydney Smith gives us quite as revolting a statement of the vassalage of the tenantry. They have, he tells, no more predilection for whom they vote than organ-pipes have for what tunes they play; they pull off their opinions to their landlords as easily as they do their hats! Amiable priest! and yet you come forward to support a system that produces these results? Even Lord John Russell, although he has since thought proper to alter his mind, was so shocked, at the last election, at the extent of intimidation and bribery, that he declared that he was in favour of Ballot; and, as one of the framers of the Reform Bill, had conscientiously introduced it as one of "the constituent parts of that measure."* Mr Sydney Smith may crack his jokes over his port; but he may rest assured, that those who desire the independence of the House of Commons—who see, and know, and feel the tyranny practised under the existing laws, and the immorality that they engender—will not be prevented thereby from reiterating the call for Ballot. The great objection urged by this writer, as by all other writers against Ballot, (overlooking entirely the perjury, falsehood, and duplicity created by the system now in action,) is its alleged tendency to multiply false promises and false declarations. He says—"We should soon say, on deliberation, what David only asserted in his haste, that all men were liars." But this objection is ably disposed of by Mr Grote, in his speech in 1837. "Is it," asked the honourable Member for London, "intended that there should be no matters whatever discussed privately and confidentially, because false statements may be made concerning them, the falsehood remaining undiscovered? Are we to have no such thing as sealed correspondence by post, because a man may state one thing in writing to one person, while he communicates the direct contrary by word of mouth to another? The secrecy of the post opens a door to falsehood, just in the same way as the secrecy of the Ballot; but, if I were to name any one act of despotic governments which excites peculiar abhorrence, it is the breaking of the seal of private letters, and the violation of confidential epistolary intercourse between man and man. And what, then, would be thought of the impudence of him who should claim the right to unseal his neighbour's correspondence, under pretence of taking security that no untrue assertions should be made to him about the contents of it? Such a claim, sir, would be scouted as frantic impudence. But in what respect, let me ask, is the pretension less impudent, when applied to voting at elections?"

Mr Sydney Smith admits—a thing that cannot now be well disputed—that it is possible for votes to be given without its being discovered for whom they are given; yet he assures us, that secret voting would not put an end to dictation or bribery. But what is his assertion worth, when opposed to matters of fact and common sense? Every man knows that he can, if he think fit, keep his own counsel. No man, ever so rich, would give a bribe under such circumstances; for one might take a bribe from one party, and vote for the other. No security could be given, and the venal could take bribes from both parties. "Oh!" adds Mr Smith, "the attorney (if such a system prevailed) would say to the candidate, 'There is my list of promises; if you come in, I will have £5000; and if you do not, you shall pay me nothing.'" Propose such a gambling transaction to one of the most adroit frequenters of Doncaster, Newmarket, and Epsom, and he would laugh at the proposition. The attorney, in the first place, should be a man who commanded public opinion in the place; and it is not likely that a venal tool could possess the confidence of his fellow-citizens, jealous of their liberties; secondly, the bribery could not be confined to the few who would turn the scale—it would be carried on more extensively, and the chances of detection would be multiplied. There never can be a free exercise of the franchise in these countries without the Ballot. Petty tyranny will, as long as the viva voce system lasts, continue to annoy the tenant and the tradesman; the independence of the House of Commons will, by degrees, be broken; the influence of the aristocracy will again become omnipotent; civil and religious liberty will be trodden under foot; taxes will multiply; spies, pensioners, and sinecurists will reappear, like the animalculæ among the galvanized powder of flint-stone; the Dissenter and the Catholic will be insulted by an arrogant priesthood, already, on the assumption of apostolical succession, (and what successors of the apostles!) claiming fresh funds for the endowment of the English Church, and the management of national education; we shall see the representatives of the people sleeping, in their collar, beneath the ministerial manger; we shall have a new war and a new debt; in a word, the government will return to its old ways of folly and corruption, (and our last state shall be worse than our first,) without—THE BALLOT!

* The editor of The Era, a London Whig paper, was present and heard this declaration.

ELLIS'S HISTORY OF MADAGASCAR.*

SINCE the occupation of the Mauritius by Great Britain, the most important epoch of the history of Madagascar has evolved, and a vast amount of curious information been added to our previous knowledge of that fine island. Of this information, the Rev. Mr Ellis has availed himself, in compiling the first general history of Madagascar which deserves the name. He has produced a work which, with some crudities and faults of arrangement, is yet the best which we can hope to possess for another generation, and one which has the merit of exhausting the entire subject.

Madagascar, whether we regard its extent, geographical position, or natural advantages, may be regarded as one of the finest islands in the world. Its inhabitants are a mixed race, consisting of two or more distinct races—the black, and the olive-coloured or Hovas; the former, supposed to be the more ancient, are of African, and the latter in all probability of Malay origin; which fact seems established by the similarity of language and customs. It is not long since the population, which is now estimated at five millions, was broken into fifty or more clans and tribes, each under a leading chief, and many petty chieftains. Amalgamation was produced to a considerable extent by the father of the late Radama, a powerful, warlike, and politic chief of the olive-coloured race, who, when dying, enjoined his son to complete the conquest of the whole island, which he had so successfully begun. The principality of this great chief was Imerina, the central province of Madagascar, and the country of the Hovas, though the black population of Imerina is as numerous as the olive-skinned race. The father of Radama had united all its tribes, and established his residence at Tananarivo, which is still the capital of the kingdom, if not of the island. This conquering chief, who is said to have been a man of great energy of character, wise, politic, a lover of justice, and a promoter of improvement and industry among his people, was, in 1808, succeeded by his son, the famous Radama, the Peter the Great, if not the Alfred, of Madagascar. Domestic slavery has been the immemorial practice of the island; and it has also, for a long time back, been a considerable mart for the slave-trade. The continual intestine feuds among the tribes, afforded a supply of prisoners of war for the traffic, and kidnapping was practised to some extent. Degradation to slavery is also the frequent punishment for minor offences; and debtors are liable to be sold by their creditors. Slaves were therefore the most important article of traffic among this half-civilized people; and the most intelligent of the chiefs (educated half-castes) were the principal slave-dealers, giving arms, ammunition, and other such civilized commodities, in exchange for human beings, and thus furnishing tools to prosecute the trade farther in the interior. The slaves of Madagascar were generally sent to the Mauritius or the Isle of Bourbon, though both America and the West Indies have thence received occasional supplies. When, at the close of the war, it became an object to Great Britain to suppress that horrible traffic, long before solemnly abolished, the Governor of the Mauritius, Sir Robert Farquhar, to close one great mart, fixed his attention upon Radama, the most powerful and intelligent of the princes of Madagascar, whose dominions were, moreover, the principal seat of the traffic. Radama's conquests produced numerous prisoners; his capital of Tananarivo was the great mart of the traffic, and his principal Port of Tamatave the place where the victims were embarked. The Governor of the Mauritius resolved to send an embassy to this prince, to induce him to discountenance, and, if possible, to abolish the trade.

Radama, a very young man, was at this period the uncultivated chief of a half-civilized people, and, "in manners, dress, and superstitions, entirely the Malagasy; yet possessing a mind highly susceptible of improvement, and fired with the noble ambition of becoming superior to any of his ancestors." The government of Radama's territory may be described as a pure despotism, modified by customs and traditions, and "the wisdom of our ancestors," for which the Hova nation entertain unmeasured respect. Where there was no written language, there could be no fixed laws. Every case was determined upon its own merits, and the will of Radama was omnipotent over all, save prejudice and superstition. Popular assemblies were convened on great occasions, but rather to learn and approve the will of "the visible god" than to advise or remonstrate. Radama was high priest as well as king. The religion of the Malagasy presents an inconceivable jumble of superstitions, unmeaning in their character, but dark and cruel in their working. The most baneful of the national customs is the Tangena or poison-ordeal, by which all possible cases are tried, and which proves a fruitful source of fraud and cruelty, by which thousands of victims are every year immolated. It more closely resembles the old ordeal for trying supposed witches than anything we ever read of in history; but is carried to a far greater extent, as witchcraft is but one of many cases submitted to the Tangena. The English Residents and the Missionaries were in the knowledge of several murders effected by the Tangena, of which singular custom a minute and very interesting account is given in this work. The Tangena may be administered not only in cases of suspicion of crime, but by false accusation. If any member of a family is taken ill, all the slaves may be subjected to the ordeal, to discover which has bewitched the sick person. While Mr Hastie was British Resident with Radama, in 1822, about fifty female attendants of the king's second sister drank the Tangena under a suspicion that the princess was bewitched. It chanced that not one of them died, which is presumed to have been by the management of those who had to administer the poison. It is obtained from a nut which grows abundantly in Madagascar. If the sovereign be taken ill, not only the slaves, but all in personal attendance, courtiers and judges, may be put to the test. During an illness of Radama, an old judge, devoutly attached to the Tangena and every other national custom, insisted that all about the person of the king should take the ordeal; and, among others, Prince Rataffe, Radama's brother-in-law, (who afterwards visited England,) and other members of the king's family. The Prince insisted that, as the judge was also coming about the king, he should drink like the rest. All drank; but the judge was the only individual convicted by the very equivocal test. He died, his property was confiscated, and his house razed to the ground without delay. The Tangena is a double or twofold ordeal. The person swallowing the poison is also made to swallow three bits of the skin of a fowl, with a variety of ceremonies; and, unless he vomit them, he is held guilty; so that, if he escape the effects of the poison, he may still be cruelly murdered for not disgorging the bits of skin. It seems a point of honour for the accused to submit eagerly to the test, in order to prove their innocence; and refusal is construed into an acknowledgment of guilt. Sometimes a whole district will take the ordeal at once, by order of the king. It is a source of great profit, which, no doubt, tends to maintain a custom which even the sovereign will of Radama durst not set aside. Whether acquittal or conviction follows the ordeal, there is always money to pay, and advantage to be reaped by the diviners. Radama, after his intimate intercourse with Mr Hastie and other Europeans, was no longer himself the dupe of the ordeal, for he noted the many cases at which it either proved false or failed. On one occasion, the wife of one of Radama's officers was sick. She had been, when too late, attended by Mrs Jeffries, the wife of one of the Missionaries. The woman died in a few hours, as Mrs Jeffries, when called in, had foretold; and the King remarked, that the people around her should have been more careful. This was felt as a reproach by her relatives. Their honour was affected; and the mother and sister of the deceased, her husband's mother, and two more near relations, who had all been most tenderly attached to her, and who were sunk in the deepest grief, requested permission to take the Tangena, to prove their innocence of any intended neglect or maltreatment of the person so dear to them. Radama told them they were fools for proposing the ordeal, as out of five some one must fall; but they insisted upon the lawful and customary means of establishing their innocence. They all fell victims to this feeling of honour, and not a tear was shed for them. Radama remarked, that the administrator of the potion had made it "a little too bitter." To infanticide, another custom of Madagascar, the King gave a more decided opposition.

* Fisher, Son, & Co. 2 vols. royal 8vo, with numerous plates. Pp. 1054.

The Malagasy are fatalists; and infanticide, like more of their crimes, arises from their constant practices of divination, to discover lucky and unlucky persons, things, and days. Their mode of divination is termed sikidy, and it is elaborately worked by beans, straws, rice, &c. Its nature and responses, or results, are regarded as oracular, and it directs to the use of particular charms and incantations. Appeals are made to the sikidy on many occasions; and from the sikidy is learned how evil is to be averted, or good obtained. It determines what amulet is to be worn, or what sacrifice made. The natives of Madagascar are so peculiarly well endowed with all manner of superstitions, that theirs seem a combination of those of every semi-barbarous nation, and especially of the debasing and cruel.—They have many social ceremonies at births, betrothings, and burials, which are of a more kindly character, and they celebrate numerous festivals. Polygamy and concubinage are general, and are attended with the usual consequences of domestic discord and misery, and the degradation of women. Radama had twelve nominal wives. No one is allowed to have so many, save the sovereign, and two or three seem common numbers with the rich. The first wife obtains a donation in money from the husband when he takes a second, and the sovereign also receives tribute, or a present. Upon these, and, indeed, almost every occasion, divorce is easily obtained, and frequent. Among many other causes, a wife may be divorced for extravagance, idleness, and gadding about too much. A divorced woman may marry again in twelve days; but, by the usages of the country, which are its only laws, the husband, if vindictive, may divorce his wife in a form which precludes her from ever marrying. If the husband is guilty of any crime for which he is reduced to slavery, the wife and children share his fate.

The rite of circumcision is practised in Madagascar with endless ceremonies, occupying many days; and the custom of two persons pledging in brotherhood, by tasting each other's blood, is common.

The people of Madagascar cultivate rice, maize, yams, sweet potatoes, and, latterly, the Irish potato, and a variety of the vegetables and fruits known in Europe and the tropics. They have large herds of cattle; and, as food, use the flesh of the ox, sheep, goat, monkey, and hedgehog. Fish are used, and poultry is plentiful. Manioc and a species of arrow-root are among their articles of food, which, however, consists principally of rice—whatever is taken with the rice being termed laoka, a term equivalent to the Scottish and Irish word, kitchen. They make a sort of unleavened bread of Indian corn; but boiled rice is the great staple. Meat of all kinds, birds' eggs, and those of the crocodile dried, honey, locusts, and the chrysalis of the silk-worm, a singular dainty, all form the additional laoka. The meat is dressed with the skin on ; and the skin of beef is, with the hairs, often boiled to a jelly, and considered a choice luxury by Malagasy epicures. They take only two meals a-day, one before noon, and the other in the evening. Their principal drink is water, though King Radama found it necessary to issue an edict against the introduction or use of spirits or wine, which were prohibited to every one else, to be abused by his Majesty himself, whose early death was hastened, if not caused by excess. The natives have long known the art of distilling a coarse spirit from the sugarcane, or from honey. They are fond of tobacco, which they cultivate, and use in great quantities in the form of snuff, which they place between the teeth of the under jaw and the inner surface of the under lip, and suck at their leisure, to their great contentment. A powerful stimulant, formerly used to a great extent, was the native hemp, which was smoked, especially before engaging in battle, and which roused the smoker to temporary madness. Its use has been prohibited under severe penalties ; but it is believed that it is still used as a means of intoxication in remote places. The Malagasy are a healthy and long-lived race, subject to few violent diseases, though the low swampy coasts of their island prove fatal to foreigners, who, at certain seasons, are sure to fall victims to the fever and ague of the country. By this fatal fever, every attempt to conquer or colonize Madagascar has been cut short. Radama once said, when threatened by France, that General Tux (the native name of the Madagascar fever) would be his best ally. Small-pox was a fearful scourge ; but Mr Hastie, among the innumerable benefits which he conferred on Madagascar, introduced vaccine inoculation ; and it has been renewed by the Missionaries, though it is too probable that, with their expulsion, this, with many other blessings, will be lost. The native remedies for the fever are emetics, followed by the vapour-bath, and fumigation with herbs, which often cut short the disease. Their vapour-bath is so simple and practicable in any locality, as to merit description. Seating the patient over a large earthen or other vessel containing water, and covering him with several large native cloaks, they produce the steam required by casting pieces of red-hot stone or iron into the water. A sort of rude shampooing is practised by the preparers and venders of medicine, who, by a combination natural in a barbarous state of society, are also the makers of charms to ward off disease. Particular idols have the power of preventing particular maladies or forms of evil. Before the reign of Radama, the first person seized with small-pox was either stoned to death or buried alive. The natives have a strong aversion to bleeding, though a rude kind of cupping is sometimes practised. In 1820, Radama, who had shortly before learned to ride on the first horse ever seen on the island, and a present from Governor Farquhar, had a severe fall from horseback. His domestics ran for the English ; and Mr Jones, the first Missionary that visited Tananarivo, found the King lying on the floor, his face and neck covered with blood, and his attendants pouring the blood of fowls into his mouth, to make up for the royal blood wasted by the wounds. Mr Jones proposed to cease pouring in fowls' blood, and, on the contrary, to take a little more from the King. "What ! take away more blood, when the King has lost so much already !—let the sikidy be consulted." The King was not quite insensible, and he had faith in the proposed bleeding. He whispered in a low tone—"Bleed me—let the sikidy not be consulted—bleed me immediately." His attendants would not permit this, but still continued cutting off the heads of the fowls, and pouring the blood into the King's mouth. The English present effected the bleeding almost by main force ; the King fainted, and his native attendants were frantic ; but he revived, got better, and was put to rest. The sikidy was then consulted, and the diviner ordered that no one should enter, save Mr Jones, two other Europeans, and some attendants, with the King's mother, and three of his wives. The recovery of the King made some of his now converted nobles solicit to be bled, as a preventative, in anticipation of a fall from horseback.

Many of the funeral ceremonies of the Malagasy are indicative of strong and ardent natural sensibility, and warm domestic affections ; nor is it easy to reconcile those ceremonies with what is affirmed of their opinions respecting a future state.

The useful arts were not in a very forward state in the first years of the reign of Radama, though great improvements have since been introduced by artisans connected with the Missionaries. The professions are few. The highest office is that of judge and magistrate. These are appointed and removed by the king at pleasure. The keepers of the idols in different places, derive considerable emolument from the only office which seems hereditary. In every village, headmen or elders are appointed by the sovereign, with inferior officers under them. The makers of charms and medicines, the consultants of the sikidy, the administrators of the Tangena ordeal, and the discoverers of fate, or astrologers, are all distinct professions. Prophets or fortune-tellers, who foretell (only good) by looking in a man's face, are another class of professors. Soldiers are a distinct order ; and the rest of the people are divided into rice-cultivators, herdsmen handicraftsmen, and hucksters or pedlers. As there were, till very lately, neither roads nor animals of draught in the island, bearers or coolies are numerous. The rice grounds are, in many places, well and very neatly cultivated ; and the grain, though by rude and tedious processes, is well managed. Manioc is also carefully cultivated ; and Mr Hastie and the missionaries introduced wheat and oats. The latter thrive well in the highland provinces of Imerina. The natives viewed the plough and harrows, and the use of oxen broken in to cultivate the ground, with astonishment, but, on the whole, preferred the way of their ancestors. They have long been able to smelt iron, which abounds in the island; and their mode, though rude and tedious, at least answers their purpose. The native smiths were exceedingly limited in their operations until 1822; but they have made rapid improvement under the instructions of English artisans. To prove how exceedingly valuable really useful knowledge may be to those sent to countries in the condition of Madagascar for other purposes than teaching the humble arts, we shall quote a passage from Mr Jones the first missionary:—

They made nails, but they were round, and not square. I was the first, I think, that taught them to make a square nail. Towards the end of 1820, a favourite horse, sent to Radama by Sir R. T. Farquhar, in the charge of Mr Hastie, in the previous year, lost one of his shoes, and there was no person in the capital who knew how to shoe a horse. Seeing the anxiety of the king, I said to him—"If you will trust me, I will nail on the old shoe." The king was exceedingly pleased, and wished me to do it. I made a model of a horse-shoe nail, and the native smiths made some nails exactly like the model. The horse was brought into one of the royal houses; and the king, his officers, smiths, &c., assembled, to witness the novel transaction. While I was driving the nails into the animal's hoof, the king frequently cried out—"Take care, take care; don't hurt the horse, don't hurt the horse!" I continued driving the nails, clinched them, rasped the foot, &c., and the horse was led out unhurt, to the great astonishment and delight of all present, who appeared, from this trifling circumstance, to attach increased importance to our residence among them. I should not have attempted it had I not often nailed on old shoes when I used to take my father's horses to the blacksmith's shop in Wales. After this, the Malagasy smiths made these sort of nails, as well as horse-shoes, and shod the king's horses, though they did it but clumsily, until the arrival of the smith sent out from England.

Formerly they had no locks; but Europeans, since the commencement of the mission, have taught the natives to make several kinds of locks. A very clever smith once borrowed a patent padlock from me, which he opened, and, having examined it thoroughly, made one exactly like it.

Mr Chick, an excellent artisan sent out by the London Missionary Society in 1821, was the first European smith who settled in the interior of Madagascar; and to him the natives, of Ankova especially, are indebted for their improvement in the art of working in iron. He reached the capital in 1822, and fixed his residence at Amparibe, where he erected his shop, and fitted it up in the European style, as far as circumstances would admit. Mr Chick was himself a powerful man; and the tools, the bellows, the anvil, and the large sledge-hammer which he used, filled the natives with the greatest astonishment. The report of his great strength soon reached the palace; and, shortly after he began his work, the king, with a number of his officers, paid him a visit. Mr Chick's boys were at work at an anvil of a middling size. A spare one, of considerable weight, was standing on the floor in another part of the shop; and the king, after looking about with admiration for some time, told his officers to lift the anvil that was standing on the floor. Each in his turn put forth his utmost strength, but could not raise it from the ground. "What!" said the king, "are you all conquered? Let me try." His majesty then laid hold of it with all his might, and tried to raise it from the ground, but with no better success than his officers. "Aoka izay," (said the king,) "avelao mba atao ny vazaha ankehitriny"—"Enough: let the white man try now." Mr Chick then lifted the anvil to a considerable height from the ground, to the great surprise of all present; and it is singular to notice the first impression which this evidence of the superior strength of the Englishman produced on the minds of the king and his suite. They all concurred in declaring that it would be dangerous to fight with such men.

A number of youths were placed, by order of the sovereign, under the charge of Mr Chick, as apprentices, and were carefully instructed by him in the several branches of his art. When the king commenced building the palace, Mr Chick furnished the iron-work for it; while thus occupied, he had about two hundred and fifty native smiths employed under him, and from that time may be dated the improvements made in smithing by the natives. Mr Chick's work at the palace entirely ceased when Radama died. He was employed by the present government to furnish the iron-work for the mills erected by Mr Cameron at Alakaly, and had under him about two hundred persons, who had every opportunity of improving themselves, and learning the more difficult branches of the business.

Many of the native smiths are now able to make hinges, screws, and a variety of the most valuable articles of iron used in civilised life. They have also attained considerable proficiency in wire-drawing.

They have also unhappily learned to fabricate implements of war, far more deadly than their original javelin and spear. The native goldsmiths and silversmiths discover considerable ingenuity; and a Frenchman has lately introduced many improvements in carpenter work. He it was who, so late as 1821, first introduced the saw among five millions of people. Now they have lathes; and many natives have made respectable proficiency in building, carpentry, and joining, and in manufacturing leather. Long before they had seen any Europeans, the native women spun and wove cotton and silk, both obtained by native industry. The spinning was performed by the primitive spindle, the weaving in the rudest and slowest manner; nor have the wheel and loom sent out by the Missionary Society yet succeeded. The weaver died, and the people of Madagascar are still clothed according to the wisdom of their ancestors. They prepare indigo and a few dyes; and both the patterns and texture of their fabrics are said to shew attention, accuracy, and good taste. They are ingenious in weaving the mats which they use for bedding and for the covering of their floors, and in plaiting a variety of useful and elegant baskets. They make coarse earthenware, of all sorts, for domestic purposes, and of handsome forms. Their dress is uniform and simple, though European and Oriental costumes have of late been introduced at court. Even among the rich, children of all ranks run naked until they are five or six years old. The dress of all ranks consists alike of two, or at most three garments, which the poor fabricate from native hemp, cotton, or the bark of trees, and the rich from soft, costly silk, or imported cassimere, or broad cloth. A salaka, about a yard in width, and two yards long, is worn much in the fashion of the Celtic philabeg, and the mantle or lamba, which is worn by both sexes, and by all ages and ranks, is equivalent, and indeed very similar to the plaid. The royal lamba or mantle latterly worn by Radama was of fine scarlet English broad cloth, ornamented with gold lace. The rich have their lamba of substantial native or foreign silk, stripped in a variety of brilliant colours, and the poor of hempen cloth, or white European cloth. Covering for the head is only lately introduced, and is still infrequent; nor was any protection for the feet known save the rude sandal of untanned bullock's hide, common to so many semi-barbarous nations. Shoes and stockings have now been introduced. Caps, or a sort of hats, are now used on the coast, made of common grass or rushes. Radama wore an ornamented cap of velvet; and a red worsted cap has been assumed as a piece of finery by secondary chiefs, while officers and courtiers now sport European cocked hats. European dresses and articles of luxury are in great request; and the government, besides large bands of builders, wood-cutters, smiths, and carpenters, now employ many tailors and sempstresses in making up wearing apparel. Few natives, however, appear wholly in foreign dresses. The present queen, upon the same principle which makes Queen Victoria order a quantity of silks from Spittalsfield, or poplins from Dublin, appears with the native white lamba spreading its ample folds over a dress of rich foreign velvet or silk. The natives are fond of ornaments, and wear as many necklaces, ear-rings, rings, bracelets, and chains, and ornaments on their forehead, and in their hair, as if they were a highly civilized, if not a very refined nation. Beads are used for a variety of ornamental purposes; and, of late, the women have acquired a taste for wearing feathers and artificial flowers at their dances. They are also fond of artificial perfumes; and the Hovas have discovered the use of cosmetics and dentifrices. Instead of black patches, the young Malagasy, to heighten their charms, paint minute pink spots on their faces. Formerly much time, even days together, were consumed in plaiting the hair; but one day the king, having first tried the experiment on one of his brothers, had his own hair cut in the European fashion, and immediately made the troops, and the scholars in all the missionary schools, follow the royal example. This daring innovation upon national custom produced a tragi-comical catastrophe. A number of discontented females held a meeting, or tabary, to express their disapprobation of the shearing of the plaits, and the alarming innovation made by combs and scissors.

Information of these proceedings soon reached the capital. About two thousand soldiers were immediately summoned; they renewed their oaths of allegiance, promising that whoever should be found guilty of creating a disturbance, even if their own parents should be implicated, they required but the king's order or permission to put them to death: after these assurances of fidelity, the soldiers were ordered to guard the capital. On the following day, four or five thousand females assembled at Ambatoroko, a village to the east of Tananarivo, and sent a kabary, or message, to the king, complaining of his having adopted foreign customs, and having allowed his people to be taught by Europeans. In reply, Radama went to ask them what were their grievances; if they were too heavily taxed, or if they were displeased at having their sons employed in the army; whether he were their king or not, and whether they had chosen some other king in his stead? They replied to these questions in the negative; but said, they were the nurses of the king, and complained because he had adopted the customs of the foreigners; had allowed them to teach him and his people; had changed the customs of his ancestors; and, finally, he had cut off his hair, and drank spirituous liquors. Radama sent back a message to ask, if, being king, he had not a right to do as he pleased with his hair without consulting women; reminding them, it was the inalienable right of the twelve monarchs to do as they pleased, and added, that he would presently give them a proof of this, by taking care that their own hair should never grow again. Having ascertained who were the ringleaders, five of them were selected, and orders were given to the soldiers of their districts and families so to cut off their hair that it should never grow again. The order was mournfully obeyed, and they perished under the bayonets of the soldiers in sight of the multitudes of females, and a vast concourse of people from the town. His majesty immediately sent for the Europeans, told them that a number of persons who were fools, and wished to remain such, had created a disturbance. I have ordered five of them, said Radama, to be put to death; but don't you be alarmed. I am here to protect you.—The bodies of the five women who were put to death, remained upon the spot until they were devoured by the dogs and birds.

The rest of the women, after being detained for three days, guarded by the troops, and kept without food or shelter, were released upon their earnest prayers, and probably never again interfered either with the king's cut of hair or his drinking cups. As an imperfect, yet pleasing sketch, of the manners of the natives, we shall extract the description of the ordinary occupations of a day:—

The Malagasy rise early; and in order to do this, it is customary to have a cock roosting in the south-east corner of the house, that he may give warning of the first approach of the morning. He first crows about three o'clock, which is much too early to begin the occupations of the day in a country where there is but little twilight, and where the sun does not rise before six. He repeats his call, however, about five, when, if any doubt should exist as to the actual dawn of day, the master of the house or one of his slaves opens the door, and, after glancing towards the eastern horizon, exclaims, "It is morning." The necessity for doing this, arises from the circumstance of the house having no glass windows, and being therefore entirely dark, except where a ray of light is admitted by an accidental crevice. The door has no other fastening than a piece of stick, about four inches in length, stuck in like a wedge at the bottom, or let into a small groove made for that purpose.

As soon as the family has risen, the master, and other members of the household, squat themselves down beside the fire-place, or outside the building, and, stretching out their naked arms, call to a slave to bring them water. A slave then advances, carrying in his left hand an empty pitcher, and in his right a zingia, or bullock's horn, with a stick fixed into it for a handle. This is filled with water, which he pours upon the hands of his master, who rubs them together, and dashes some of the water into his face, while the slave holds the pitcher or wooden bowl beneath. In the same manner the rest of the family are attended upon, the zingia being replenished by dipping it into the sily-be, or large water-jar. The slaves then assist each other to wash in the same way, none using the napkin to wipe off the water, but some rubbing it off with the lambs, and others leaving it to dry in the sun. After this operation, the master dismisses his servants, or accompanies them to their respective occupations.

At home the mistress ordinarily employs herself in arranging her room, and weaving. There are ordinarily a greater number of servants than can be constantly employed where the wants of the people are so few. One of these, perhaps, will remove the pigs or other animals from the corner of the house, by driving them out; another will release the calf from the post to which it is tied within the house; while another milks the cow. These, and other simple employments, with long intervals of squatting on the ground, occupy the slaves until the time of preparing for the first meal. This is not ordinarily taken until eleven or twelve o'clock, and the hour is computed by the length of the shadows on the ground.

Out-door labourers in Madagascar continue at work from the morning till sunset, when, about six or seven in the evening, thousands may be seen returning from the rice grounds, markets, and distant fields, bearing their spades on their shoulders, and bundles on their backs, sometimes cheered as they pass along by a native bard, who, seated on the ground, will chant his short but lively songs, descriptive of the pleasure of returning home after the toil of the day is over. On reaching their dwelling, another meal is spread, exactly resembling that of the morning; and while this is preparing, as well as after it is dismissed, the family amuse themselves with cheerful conversation. The day often closes with dancing and singing; after which they spread upon the ground their simple bedding, which consists of one or two mats, on which they repose until chanticler awakes them in the morning.

The occupation in which the people especially delight, is traffic carried on by hawking different things about for sale. Some go down to the coast, and obtain articles of British manufacture from the merchants. Others purchase articles manufactured by their own countrymen, in hope of realizing some profit by selling them. Perhaps no class of men gain less than these hawkers, certainly none endure greater hardships; yet none are so devoted to their employment, and so unwilling to exchange it for another. The native songs often describe the mpivavotra hawkers, sitting patiently all day at the market, or travelling from house to house until the sun sets upon their path, yet unwilling to cook a meal of rice until their hearts have been encouraged by obtaining some profit on their goods. To a corresponding feeling, in all probability, is to be ascribed the excessive fondness of the Malagasy for the public markets; these are the most favourite places of resort for all classes.

A great deal of haggling and cheapening is employed in making a purchase, the seller asking much more than he can expect to obtain, and the buyer offering less than he intends finally to give, if compelled. Nor is this peculiar to Madagascar.

Money-changers form a separate profession. They do not lend out at interest, but simply exchange, by weight, a number of parts of a dollar in cut money, for which the receiver of the entire dollar allows a profit, according to the rate of exchange at the time. Nothing is sold by weight save money—measure and the eye being the standard. In the interior, a bushel of best picked white rice may be had for a shilling, and red rice one-third cheaper. Eighteen or twenty fowls or ducks may be bought for a dollar, and the same money will purchase six geese and four or five turkeys. Sheep and pigs are about a shilling each; a bullock costs from three to eight dollars, a cow and calf three or four; twenty or thirty pine apples may be had for two or three pence, and a peck of grapes or bananas for the same money. Provisions have, however, risen rapidly of late; and near the coast the prices are higher than in the interior. Wages are correspondingly low. Twopence a day is a common wage for a labourer, with provisions. This is not so bad—not much inferior, indeed, to the rate of Irish labour at certain seasons. But many work for their rice alone, with an allowance of laoka or kitchen. Smiths and carpenters have about double the wages of labourers. A master will often hire out the labour of his slave, for which the remuneration is about twenty shillings a-year, with clothes and food. The people are in the habit of assisting each other upon important occasions, such as building a house or constructing a tomb, and a feast is indispensable at all such bees in Madagascar.

The Malagasy have one or two rude musical instruments; and, though not gifted with pleasing voices, they are fond of singing. The sovereign had a band of female minstrels who accompanied him whenever he left the palace, either for an airing or a distant journey. Their songs were in his praise, or to the praise of his royal race. The inhabitants of the country villages have attained greater proficiency in singing than the Hovas and the people of the towns; and it gives a pleasing idea of their manners, to learn, that in the villages singing may be heard in most houses in the evening; and that, when it is moonlight, they often assemble and pass a few hours in singing, dancing, and clapping their hands, accompanied by whatever instruments the village affords. Radama used to delight in hearing the children sing the songs and hymns they were taught in the missionary schools. The natives have several athletic games and sports peculiar to themselves. A favourite amusement is hunting wild cattle upon dark nights. Bull-fighting, bull-baiting, cock-fighting, are also favourite amusements. In 1824, when Mr Hastie accompanied Radama and the army in an invasion of the Sakalava country, they halted to hunt and dry-salt a stock of beef for future provision. The hunt was commenced with great solemnity.

Agreeably to the custom of the country, on the first herd being seen, the party halted, laid down their arms, with the muzzles of the guns and the points of the spears turned to the rear, and an aged chieftain implored for success on their enterprise in nearly the following terms:—"O thou great Rangora! master of these superb plains and herds, be it known to thee, that the mighty king Radama, attended by a formidable army, is thy visiter; and it will only be consistent with thine own dignity, and his exalted rank as governor of the earth, a king unequalled by any other king, that thou shouldst present him with a part of thy superabundant stock, for the use of his attendants. Be it known to thee, O Rangora! that the wants of the mighty king are bounded, but his liberality is without bounds; he is slow in accepting but lavish in bestowing favours. He comes not in hostile array, but, as thy visiter, in amity. O you Kotsifotsy and Taihana! guardians of your great master's innumerable flocks, let it be your care to do him honour in the selection of the presents that he may order for the use of his royal visiter, so that we, his attendants, may partake of such fare as will induce us to make favourable representations of your attentions to our mighty king, and hereby entitle you to his beneficent consideration. We again repeat, we are visitors in amity, and only claim your hospitable entertainment during our sojourn with you."

Before the troops returned, three hundred and forty six head of cattle were killed, besides the number wounded and followed by the spearmen: two days afterwards four hundred and thirty-one more were killed by the soldiers.

Upon another occasion, Mr Hastie saw six hundred head killed on the first day of the hunt. Fishing is principally left to the women, with seek a supply of food in the rivers. Crocodiles and alligators abound in all the streams, and many native superstitions are connected with these creatures. A game peculiar to the Malagasy is termed "kicking backwards." The game consists in the opposed parties kicking at each other, in the same manner as horses, asses, and other animals. In this game the young men, by early training, become very expert, and hundreds at a time will engage in a kicking match, which is often attended with broken legs and ankles. Throwing bamboos, tipped with iron, at a target, is the method of teaching the young men to throw the spear, and is also a favourite amusement. Trials of strength are made by lifting and throwing stones; and young people play with pebbles in the manner of shuttle-cock. They have a sedentary game resembling draughts; and cards have, of late, been introduced by the traders.

Instead of pursuing this desultory outline of the manners and customs of the people of Madagascar, we shall now turn to Mr Ellis's account of their intercourse with the English, in what we have called the most important epoch of their history.

Radama was uniformly kind to the English Residents and the Missionaries, and they in return have probably placed his character in the fairest possible point of view. The best thing that can be said of him is, that his foibles, self-will, and caprice, were, when under the influence of a superior mind, capable of being turned to the advantage of his country.

When Captain Le Sage, the first agent sent by Sir Robert Farquhar, visited Radama in 1816, at his capital of Tananarivo or "the city of a thousand towns," he was, in dress, manners, and superstitions, entirely a Malagasy; and, though naturally quick and intelligent, powerfully influenced by the prejudices and customs of his native country. He was found seated on the floor of his house on his mat, clothed in his native lamba, and with neither chair nor table, in the palace, which shortly afterwards was furnished with many European accommodations and elegancies. He ate only from silver dishes, which, together with being carried in a sort of palanquin, were exclusive privileges of the sovereign. He was much addicted to the use of spirituous liquors himself, though he rigidly continued the prohibition against them, promulgated by his father. He had permitted no road to be made to his capital; and Captain Le Sage, arriving on the coast in the unhealthy season, suffered severely in making his way through the bakes, swamps, and morasses which lie between Tamatave and the capital. His party had nearly sunk under fatigue and despondency; and they at last reached the capital with that insidious disease in their veins, to which so many Europeans have fallen victims in Madagascar. While the embassy was advancing, frequent messages, with presents of food, were sent by the King to Le Sage; and it was received with great honour.

On approaching the capital, the party were agreeably surprised by a fresh assurance of welcome, conveyed in a manner by no means indicative of a barbarous state of society. A company of persons, about eighty in number, suddenly appeared running towards them, divided into parties of twenty, and bearing on their heads rice, fruits, and different viands for the refreshment of the travellers, which all partook of on the spot, while the hospitable strangers danced and sang around them. They proved to be some of the most distinguished families forming the court of Radama. Their dress was very elegant, the women being adorned with silver chains, necklaces, and anklets, and their garments, consisting of a dark purple cotton lamba, wound round the body, and hanging in graceful folds so as to exhibit the knotted fringe in the most pleasing manner. The men wore on their heads a silver ornament somewhat resembling a coronet, and round the waist a belt, with a pouch for containing their amulets. They also had silver ornaments like the women, and were armed with muskets, many of which, instead of brass mountings, had silver ones, and stocks studded with silver-headed nails.

Dances and firing of cannon succeeded, until they reached the palace, when a strange ceremony followed. One of Radama's ministers first commanded silence to the crowd:—

He then addressed the people, saying, that Radama had given their country to his visitor; and on asking them if they consented, they answered, Yes. The minister then, with the same politeness, addressed Le Sage, telling him he was their king, and commanded their country and all that was in it; adding, that Radama commanded only at Mauritius. Le Sage placed himself upon a kind of stool covered with white linen, when Radama addressed his ministers and people to the same effect as his minister had done before, asking them if they consented that Le Sage should be their king; to which they all answered in the affirmative. He then told his guest that Madagascar was his, and his own country Mauritius. After some complimentary conversation, Le Sage then presented his credentials, which were read by one of the princes, when the king again assured his guest of the great pleasure his arrival afforded him.

Le Sage here observes of Radama, that his manners and conduct were totally different from those of any prince or chief he had seen in Madagascar. His address was extremely agreeable and prepossessing; and he was, even then, what might justly be termed a polite man.

The people of Madagascar long entertained the belief, that Europeans were cannibals; an opinion which originated in the slave-trade, and which is not yet quite exploded—"for what could the white men want the children but to eat them?" This opinion was renewed when Radama afterwards made the children be sent in great numbers to the mission-schools. They were then often concealed in the rice-holes by their alarmed parents, to save them from the "European cannibals." Two young brothers of Radama were, however, immediately after the visit of Le Sage, sent to the Mauritius, to be educated, and several of the chiefs visited Governor Farquhar about the same time. By their influence, and certain equivalents to be offered by the English Government, the Governor hoped to induce Radama to abolish the slave-trade.

Mr Brady, a non-commissioned officer in the British service, was left at the capital by Captain Le Sage, to instruct the troops of Radama in European tactics. He secured the good-will of the natives and the sovereign, and ultimately became a general of the native forces, and accompanied Radama in all his wars.

By a most fortunate arrangement, the two young brothers of Radama were, on their arrival in the Mauritius, placed under the care of Mr Hastie; and next year he accompanied them to the Court of Radama, over whose mind he acquired an influence almost unbounded, which he never once used save to promote the improvement and welfare of the country, and the respectability of the semi-barbarous prince. His going was nearly accidental, as he had undertaken to convey, in safety, a valuable present of horses, sent by the Governor to Radama, and the first animals of the kind seen in Madagascar. Horses are now becoming plentiful in the country of the Hovas. Mr Hastie was received with as much distinction as the British agent had been. The King was found dressed in a gay European costume, sent him from the Mauritius, and his house was furnished with chairs. He sent for Mr Brady, whom he introduced to Mr Hastie, telling him Mr Brady was now an officer. A crowd always surrounded the King, and whatever passed between himself and Mr Hastie, was interpreted to his captains and the people around, who uniformly agreed to whatever the King said.

The Resident, for such we may call Mr Hastie, though he was not yet appointed, enjoyed many opportunities of closely observing the character and dispositions of Radama, whom he appears to have thoroughly understood, and whom he soon moulded and wielded at his will, by the natural supremacy of a strong mind over a weak, but well-disposed one. Soon after Hastie's arrival, taking the proper precautions of wearing talismans and charms against accidents, Radama got on horseback, and, having conquered his first natural terror, he laughed loudly, screamed and danced, and declared that he had never been so delighted before.

As he grew more accustomed to the exercise, his enjoyment of it every time increased; and, like most learners who have attained a slight degree of proficiency, he evinced a consciousness of his own superiority, by wishing to see others placed in the situation which had lately appeared so perilous to him. Several of his officers were accordingly ordered to make the experiment, while he laughed heartily at their awkwardness. During the stay of Mr Hastie at the capital, several merchants arrived from the coast, for the purpose of purchasing slaves; but all were discountenanced by Radama. There were vast numbers of slaves at the capital, at that time, on sale; and it is not to be wondered at, that the traffic should have been encouraged by a people whose indolence induced them to give up all kinds of manual labour to this unfortunate class of their fellow-beings. The inhabitants of Tananarivo at that time never worked their grounds. Their land was tilled, their houses built, and their timber and clothing obtained by slaves. With regard to the abolition of this traffic, the king himself appeared, at an early period of the negotiations, to be won over by the arguments of Mr Hastie; but, though so absolute in his government, and his influence over his people, that every look and word of his was the subject of imitation, and the slightest command for silence obeyed in an instant by tumultuous thousands, there seemed to be a point to which he could not, dared not, lead his people—and this was, the abolition of the traffic in slaves.

Every morning, the principal councillors went to assemble in sight of the British agent, and, after long consultations, despatch two of their number to counteract all that Mr Hastie had accomplished on the previous day. Still his influence was increasing. At this time he had a opportunity of witnessing the poison-ordeal at Tangena.

One of the king's sisters had been ill for several days; and on the 24th of August became slightly delirious. Her female attendants, four in number, were subjected to the following processes, in order to ascertain whether she had been accessory to her sickness. For one day she was confined in separate huts, without being allowed any food, and on the following morning they were brought out, each to have administered to them three bits of the raw skin of a black fowl; after which, they were obliged to drink warm rice-water until they began to vomit. If each vomited the three pieces of skin, and did not in straining fall with her head to the south, she was to be considered innocent. The pieces of skin were swallowed whole, and unfortunately only one of the four was able to prove her innocence.

The customary fate of those considered to be guilty, is instant death. In this instance it was delayed nearly an hour, as one of the unhappy creatures was a great favourite with the king's mother, who, while Mr Hastie was with Radama, went to her son to beg her life. He refused to grant this favour, and desired his mother to withdraw. The supposed criminals were then taken to a rock on the south side of the capital, and, having their fingers, toes, arms, legs, noses, and ears cut off, were precipitated from the rock, the children from the surrounding crowd amusing themselves for nearly an hour after with throwing stones upon their mangled bodies. The two young princes were seen thus employed; and such was the general indifference to the fate of the sufferers, that Mr Hastie, who did not approach nearer than forty yards to the rock, could not see one anxious countenance in the whole crowd, who thronged to witness the scene. The women were all young, and the favourite handsome. As a part of this system of injustice, the survivor was handsomely rewarded.

As may be supposed from what has just been related of the young princes, they were now fast returning to the ordinary habits of their countrymen, although Mr Hastie still acted as their preceptor, and did his utmost to inspire them with higher tastes and feelings. A few days after they had taken a part in this barbarous and inhuman pastime, the elder of the youths not appearing at the usual time in the morning, his tutor sent to request his attendance, and, on being told that he was still asleep, went himself to arouse his young pupil, prompted partly by curiosity to see the interior of his dwelling. He found him in a small and mean apartment, his sleeping-place within a yard of the fire-place, and presenting a picture of idleness and filth scarcely to be surpassed in the meanest dwellings of the common people. The tutor remonstrated with his pupil upon this deviation from the habits he had acquired in the Isle of France: to which the young prince could only reply, that dirt was warm, and the weather cold, and he chose the former because it was customary.

When the time for Mr Hastie's departure arrived, so great was Radama's desire to detain him, that he first endeavoured to persuade Mr H. it was the Governor's wish that he should remain to superintend the education of the princes; and then, when it was explained to him that this was a misapprehension, he offered to reward Mr H. for his trouble, if he would stay and continue to act as their tutor. Delays and hindrances were also thrown in the way of Mr Hastie, whenever he wished to prosecute any plan for the benefit of the king or his people, by the general belief in the influence of unlucky days; so that when Mr Hastie asked for bullocks, with the intention of training them to carry burdens, the lucky day for such an attempt was never found. When he wished to visit the iron mines, the same hindrance presented itself; and when he proposed returning to Tamatave, difficulties appeared to increase. He was not willing to depart without again reverting to the conversation he had previously had with Radama on the subject of the slave-trade.

After a short visit to Mauritius, Mr Hastie returned to Radama's court, and employed all his address and influence with his royal friend in accomplishing the abolition of the slave-trade. Radama was willing to give up selling slaves himself, to gratify "his good father" the governor; but he could not compel his people to follow his example. He was vulnerable upon one point, on which all kings are peculiarly susceptible; Hastie had only to tell him that "he was governed by his people instead of governing them," or that the princes and people of Europe would be shocked to hear of any particular piece of unprincipled conduct, to induce Radama to yield. He had chosen a Reform minister, whose character Mr Hastie approved; a bold, sensible, and intrepid young man, resolved that his master should be obeyed, and who was generally esteemed by the people. The trade was abolished, and for this concession, Radama was to receive yearly a thousand dollars in gold, a thousand in silver, a considerable quantity of arms, ammunition, and cloth, with other presents. He, indeed, became, for a time, a sort of pet chief to the British Government; though General Hall, the acting governor of Mauritius, after Sir Robert Farquhar went to England, nearly threw away all the advantages of the treaty, by refusing the money and goods stipulated for as the equivalent for abandoning the trade. It was just when this breach of faith had been discovered by the indignant Radama, that the first two missionaries, sent out by the London Missionary Society, reached the coast of Madagascar. They experienced many hardships; and while Mr Jones with difficulty recovered, his companion, Mr Beran, and both their wives, fell victims to the terrible fever of the coast, before leaving Tamatave. Among other unwarranted acts of General Hall, subsequently disapproved by the British Government, was sending back to Madagascar six youths who had been taken to the Mauritius to be educated. "Why," said Radama,

"Would not your government at Mauritius permit these boys to be instructed, whom I had sent for that purpose? Although your government violated the treaty, and discontinued intercourse with me, I would gladly have paid for the education of the boys!"—an expression as characteristic of Radama as it was honourable to the chieftain of a partially civilized people.

The slave-trade was thus revived for a time, and only finally abolished by the influence and negotiation of Mr Hastie, after the return of Sir Robert Farquhar.

Radama had now several military Europeans in his service, and the superiority of disciplined troops was beginning to be understood. After a formal kabery, at which 20,000 persons assisted, a war was undertaken, which, instead of extending the conquests of the king, ended in defeat. The disciplined troops would not face the enemy. These disasters might have lowered his temper, for, when Mr Hastie was once more sent to him, to endeavour to atone for the ill conduct of Governor Hall, he was, contrary to expectation, very well received. In advancing from Tamatave (the great sea-port of Radama's dominions) to the capital, Mr Hastie, still doubtful of his reception, was re-assured by a letter from the king's own hand. Radama had previously been able to write his native language in Arabic characters, but now he wrote in what is termed Creole French, which was his language in conversing with the English. "Come along," wrote Radama, "I shall receive you. Do not be afraid. I am glad that you are coming, my friend Mr Hastie, to see me again. Come along, fear not. I am not so ready to cut off heads as people say I am." The reception was most cordial. Mr Hastie was accompanied by Mr Jones the missionary, whom he had ventured to carry along with him, and whose subsequent feats in horse-shoeing we have already noticed. Though somewhat alarmed at bearding the lion in his den, Mr Jones was also well received. Things wore a very different appearance now from that which Mr Hastie had seen on his first visit to Tananarivo three or four years before.

"At four o'clock," Mr Hastie writes in his journal—"Mr Jones and I ascended the hill, several cannons having been fired since our arrival at noon. About half-way up the ascent, we entered between two lines of troops, well dressed and accounted, and drawn out in honour of our reception. Though I have had frequent occasion to witness the orderly appearance of these people under arms, and the evidence they afford of the indefatigable labour and skilful discipline of Mr Brady, I must confess I was astonished at their present appearance. The lines extended all the way to the palace (a building which in this country really merits the name;) the court-yard being crowded with drums, shell-blowers, and singing-women. As I reached the head of the lines, the king appeared, coming from the old court-yard; and he received me with joy. I introduced to his notice my companion, Mr Jones, to whom he gave his hand with pleasure, accepting the hasina, or tribute, from each of us according to custom; after which he led us to the palace, and we ascended to the state-room by a massive ladder. I could not conceal my surprise on entering this elegant apartment, which was furnished and decorated in a very superior style. The king was quite overcome with joy, and took such extraordinary means of shewing it as I never before witnessed. He hugged me in his arms, pulling me close to him, and burst into such peals of laughter that he was unable to retain his seat. He frequently called out my name in a most friendly tone, and then took hold of me, as if to ascertain that I was really present with him. After a little time the troops were dismissed, and an excellent repast served up, to which Prince Rataffe, Field-Marshal Rafaralahy, Majors Rameno, Ramanetaka, Ramananolona, Captain Ramarosikina, Mr Brady the English drill, Mr Robin the secretary, Mr Jones, and myself, sat down. The king, seated at the head of the table, ate but little, and was very attentive to his guests, repeatedly asking after his Excellency Governor Farquhar and his family, and our sovereign King George. About eight the party separated; and in returning to the house which had been prepared for our reception, I found it in excellent order, and decidedly the largest in the capital. . . .

On the following day, the king received Governor Farquhar's letter, and read the letters from him to the two princes; but made no comment upon the purport of either, evidently intending to give the matter his cool and deliberate consideration. With the present of plate from the governor he was much delighted, but most of all with one of the horses, which he mounted immediately; remarking, at the same time, that it was not a gift, but a part of the stipulated equivalent. He then invited Mr Hastie and Mr Jones to ride with him, and led them over three miles of excellent road, fit for any carriage; an improvement in the neighbourhood of the capital truly astonishing to Mr Hastie, who had so often had cause to regret the want of such accommodation before. In the evening the travellers sat down, in company with eight persons, to an excellent dinner, served on the plate sent as a present to the king, and some manufactured in the island. A servant attended each chair, and there was as much formality observed as was consistent with the convenience of guests but recently accustomed to such habits. After tea, the king proposed to Mr Hastie a game at cards.

Many obstacles were, however, opposed to the renewal of the treaty for the abolition of the slave-trade. By Radama it had been observed with the strictest fidelity, until violated by Governor Hall. He had even put some of his nobles and relatives to death for infringing the law; and these executions, so unpopular among his subjects, now filled him with remorse, though an execution, more or less, does not seem to have affected Radama deeply. An assembly of counsellors was summoned, at which Mr Hastie pleaded the great national advantages which must result from abolishing the traffic, while the elders who opposed him inveighed against the bad faith of the English government. Many subsequent discussions took place, but the king carried his point. "Radama will be a king to-morrow," said the Resident—and Radama was a king! One of the conditions of the new treaty was, that ten of his subjects should be sent to Mauritius, and ten more to England, to be educated and instructed in the useful arts. The parents of the lads selected became alarmed; but Radama proceeded in his purpose in his kingly way. "A lad in perfect health yesterday," he said, "when called this morning was sick, and could not go. I soon found a remedy for his complaint: I gave orders he should receive fifty stripes, and be hoisted by the thumbs to such height on the flag-staff as that all the city may see the example." Radama, whatever were his motives, seems to have been most earnest and energetic in making the treaty be observed.

The French government became uneasy at the excellent understanding now established between Radama and the British. Presents, and the royal portrait, were sent to him by Louis XVIII. and he was dissuaded from admitting the missionaries into his territories. But, however indifferent he might be to their religion, he was now sufficiently enlightened to the value of their services as schoolmasters; and several schools had been established. The war was also renewed against the Sakalavas, a bold, black tribe, and was attended with success. On the morning when the army left the capital, Radama, as high-priest, sacrificed a cock and a heifer, and offered up a prayer at the tomb of the most renowned of his ancestors. The sikidy had also been diligently consulted as to the route to be taken, the water to be drunk, and the safest places for encampments; and the flight of birds over the heads of the troops was carefully observed as auguring good or bad fortune to the expedition. Radama was accompanied by Mr Hastie as his Talleyrand, and by his field-marshal Brady. His promiscuous army was exactly like a feudal levy. The people kept to their several clans; and each clan had its own leader. Every soldier furnished his own weapons, whether a gun or the spear and shield. The city of the "Thousand Towns" seemed deserted save by women and children; and, upon the day when it was calculated that Radama would enter the territory of Sakalava, all the females of the capital rose by daybreak, and, forming themselves into parties, began singing their war-songs, in form of predictions of and prayers for the success of the king and the army.

They stood with their faces turned towards the west, the direction of the Sakalava country, holding rods in their hands, and which they brandished like spears, and endeavouring by every kind of warlike movement to excite themselves to enthusiasm. This practice was continued every morning and evening, and sometimes through the principal part of each day. The words of the song consisted chiefly of the praises of the sovereign, such as, "God is gone to the west," "Conquer wherever thou goest." The warriors were also supposed to be addressed, "Bravely use the spear," &c.

The expedition was crowned, we have said, with success. Vast numbers of slaves and cattle were taken, and prisoners of war captured, who were afterwards sold as slaves, but within the island. Yet Radama's people had also suffered much, particularly from sickness.

On the king's return with the people, they rested a few miles west of Tananarivo. There Radama and all his followers bathed, as a religious ablution on returning from the war; after which the king proceeded in pomp to Tananarivo, and alighted on the holy stone at Andohalo. The idols were then brought to bless him; and a bullock brought to secure benedictions on the people, and indemnify and purify them from all blame. The king recapitulated, briefly, the events of the expedition; and praised those who had been left in charge of affairs at home, for their fidelity and attention; nor were the females permitted to go unrewarded with thanks, for able performances in singing the war-songs, and thereby contributing, as was supposed, to whatever measure of success he attended the expedition.

Next year the Sakalava war was renewed by this African Napoleon. Before entering the Sakalava country, he sent a kabary to the hostile chiefs, ordering them to submit to his authority and they would be placed on the footing of his natural-born subjects; while, if they rejected his terms, he would teach them who was their master. The answer of the black men was worthy of warriors—"Tell Radama, we know he has powder, so have we; he has fire-arms, so have we. Radama has his own to seek, and we have ours; let him prepare well, and come up, as take our village if he can." Their village, built upon a rocky eminence of difficult access, and strongly fortified, was subsequently stormed though they made a brave defence.

When asked why they would not be friendly with Radama, the general reply was, "Because he is the fohy of the white men, and all the white men are deceivers, therefore we never will submit to him." Radama's expression in reference to what he had now accomplished, was, that it was mere play, in comparison with what he intended to do; and with this determination, he ordered a party of 2000 men to go with spears and hatchets, build a village on the spot where an engagement taken place, over which and the surrounding district appointed Rakizorivo governor. He then set out in search of Ramitraba, king of the Sakalavas, his taking different routes in the pursuit.

The war terminated by Radama marrying, alimo, the only child of the king of Sakalava. On approaching his capital, he wrote Mr Hastie that he and his sable bride would dine with him on the day of their arrival at the capital.

To this Mr Hastie replied, that he should with the greatest pleasure receive the royal party, if Radama would consent to regard Basalimo as his only wife, for since he, Mr Hastie, could acknowledge but one king of Madagascar, so he could acknowledge no more than one queen. To this there was no objection made on the part of the king; and accordingly, on their arrival at the capital, the party repaired to the house of the British agent, where the nuptials were again celebrated. Radama was welcomed with every demonstration of affectionate loyalty. He alighted on the holy stone, and mounted the temporary stage as usual, where he received the congratulations of the people, and their hasina [tribute.] He then proceeded to his palace in a carriage which had been sent him from Mauritius, accompanied by his queen.

Those ministers of the king of Sakalava who had attended the new queen to Tananarivo were treated with the greatest respect, and taken to see all the wonderful things introduced by the English artisans; and Radama sent back some smiths and carpenters with them, to erect a proper house for their chief, his august father-in-law. They also received packets of seeds and plants, which they, however, very characteristically threw away on the road—observing, “Of what good are they to us?—we have plenty of plants in our own country.”

Notwithstanding the extreme jealousy of the natives, the missionary schools, warmly patronized by the king, were now in full operation; and many of the Malagasy youths were also receiving instruction in the useful arts from the intelligent and zealous artisans connected with the mission. Under the enlightened and philanthropic influence of Mr Hastie, King Radama became daily more liberal in his views, and more wise in his policy. The criminal code, if we may use the term, was modified and reformed in cases of minor offences; and the sumptuary laws, restricting the use of dress and food, were abrogated. The single exception to the abolition of all restrictions was, that the nobility alone were to be entitled to wear coral and gold in their hair. The removal of these vexatious restrictions caused universal joy. Many useful police and economical regulations were introduced, on the suggestion of Mr Hastie, a very remarkable man, and certainly the greatest public benefactor that Madagascar had ever seen, and, for a time, Radama appears to have been but a puppet in his hands, played for wise and beneficent purposes. Mr Hastie, however, found it impossible to effect the abolition of the poisonous, though he was able to shake the faith of the king in its truth and utility; and had the life of Radama been prolonged, there is reason to believe that this horrible scourge, and agent of fraud, injustice, and diabolical cruelty, would have fallen into disrepute.

About this time, Radama visited his sea-port of Tamstave on one of his frequent journeys of observation, accompanied by Mr Hastie and a splendid native military cavalcade, together with a vast host of irregular troops. He had now a musical band, which had been instructed in the Mauritius, and which gave great brilliancy to his public appearances.

He at this time dined on board an English vessel, the Ariadne, commanded by Captain Moorsom. Radama was now about thirty years of age, short and thin, and looking not more than twenty. Captain Moorsom pays him the compliment of saying that he approached, in personal character, to Peter the Great. This gentleman endeavoured to make his frequent conversations with Radama of benefit to the semi-civilized king, who characteristically expressed his ardent attachment to his brother George IV., by saying—“I hail him, old boy!” He went, with a number of his followers, round to the Bay of Antongil, in the Ariadne, and, while on board, seemed to be impressed with the power which caused the rapid motion of the vessel.

“Radama,” says Captain Moorsom, “is an extraordinary man. His intellect is as much expanded beyond that of his countrymen, as that of the nineteenth century is in advance of the sixteenth. But his penetration and straightforward good sense would make him remarkable under any circumstances. With all the impatience of a despotic monarch, exacting the most prompt and implicit obedience to his will, jealous of his authority, and instant to punish, he is yet sagacious, and cautious in altering established customs. His power is founded upon popular opinion: his game is to play the people against the chiefs, and he understands it well; for these fear, and those love him.”

Female schools had now been opened; a printing press was expected; and refractory and hostile chiefs were gradually submitting, at least for the moment, to the king. Many improvements had been introduced, and reforms effected.

Radama was wont, at times, to go about among his subjects in disguise, like the renowned Caliph Haroun Alraschid, or James IV. of Scotland, to gather the opinions of the populace on his measures, and to make his own observations on affairs. The last important expedition in which Radama was accompanied by Mr Hastie, secured him the nominal dominion of nearly the whole island.

The king returned to the capital from his last campaign, very ill in health; and, at a public habary, gave, as usual, a brief account of the operations of the war, and eulogised the services of Mr Hastie, who had induced the chiefs of many portions of the newly conquered provinces to submit voluntarily to his government. We must quote the royal speech:—

He told the people that he had enjoined the same laws on those new parts of the kingdom as he had on them, and exacted the same taxes as in Imerina. “The whole island,” said Radama, “is now mine; it is governed by one king, ruled by the same laws, and must perform the same service. There are no more wars. Guns and spears may sleep. I am the father of the orphan and the fatherless; the protector of the widow and the oppressed; the avenger of evils and wrongs; and the rewarder of the good and just. Here are soldiers to suppress rebels, should any arise; and to protect you and your children, your lives and your property. With regard to yourselves, you must now work, cultivate the waste lands, and plant all you can,—rice, wheat, barley, manioc, potatoes, cotton, hemp, flax, and the newly-introduced silk.

Unless you work the soil, you will be like this little bullock before you, without father or mother, or any one to pity or care for you. Rushes grow from the earth, and gold and silver will not be poured down upon you from the skies."

About 2000 children were, by this time, under course of instruction; and, although the original jealousy of the people had not yet been wholly surmounted, the king supported the schools, though anxious not to advance too rapidly, or to offend the prejudices of his people, with many of which his own mind was still deeply imbued. The constitution of Radama, early impaired by excess, suffered in his frequent military expeditions, and he was in very bad health before he lost, in Mr Hastie, one of the truest friends that ever he or his country possessed. Of the value of Hastie, King Radama had the merit of being quite sensible; and, when that gentleman lay on his death-bed, he visited him frequently, and sent hourly messages of inquiry to his house.

"I have lost many of my people, many of my soldiers, most of my officers, and several of the Maroserana, or highest nobles; but this is nothing in comparison with the loss of Andrian-asy.* He has been a faithful friend; vady ny Madagascar—a husband to Madagascar: the good he has done cannot be too highly spoken of by me. He has surpassed every agent that preceded him; and never will any who may succeed him, prove his equal. Many may come here, but none will feel more interest in Madagascar than Andrian-asy. Many may boast much, but none will do so much as he has done, nor endure the toils which he has endured. May God spare his valuable life to us!"

Every testimony of respect was paid to the memory of Hastie, whose funeral, contrary to custom, was attended by the King and the royal family, as well as by the judges and officers, and a vast concourse of the people. There had already been several deaths among the English; but this was by far the most important to the public interest.

The private history of Hastie is, in some respects, remarkable. He was a native of Cork, and his parents were Quakers. By them, he was, after the manner of their sect, carefully educated and instructed in his religious duties. The hand of discipline was probably felt too heavy and strict: and young Hastie, notwithstanding the sobriety of his training, early discovered that taste for gaiety and pleasure which sometimes breaks out wildly in the youthful Friend. He, no doubt, half broke the hearts of his parents, by entering the army as a private soldier in the 56th regiment, in which he served during the Mahratta war. He gained the esteem of his officers, was promoted to the rank of sergeant; and, like Cobbett, kept the regimental books. In 1815 he arrived at Mauritius; and, by his extraordinary and daring exertions, fortunately saved the Government House, during a conflagration at Port Louis. His conduct on this occasion attracted the regard of Governor Farquhar; and to Hastie he intrusted the two young brothers of King Radama, while he recommended him for a commission in the army. For seven years afterwards, Hastie was the agent of the British government in Madagascar, a country of which he proved the enlightened, indefatigable, steady, and most useful friend. Wild as his boyhood had been, the influence of his early moral discipline was strongly felt during his long and intimate connection with Radama.

In reference to the king, although he was clear and decided in his statements, inflexible and uncompromising in maintaining the truth, he always endeavoured to influence him rather by persuasion, and by suggestions which might find their way to his own judgment, and awaken and stimulate his own reasonings and wishes, than by any remarks which the king could deem intrusive or dictatorial. He knew Radama's vanity, and, without offering adulation, endeavoured to prompt and lead him on to exertion, by appearing merely to give the hint, and then allowing the credit of the measure to be appropriated by the monarch himself—thus in reality effecting far more than he could have done by direct proposals and urgent solicitations. He wished Radama to exhibit before his people, so far as he could, by his own royal example, a pattern of industry and improvement to his people—to be, in short, the principal builder, merchant, cultivator, planter, and gardener in the kingdom. His influence with the king increased rapidly from the time of their first acquaintance. Radama was cautious, but he shewed, in many instances, that he placed a confidence almost unbounded in the opinions and judgment of the British agent.

It would be fruitless to attempt anything like an account of the individual instances in which Mr Hastie endeavoured to promote the great work of civilization in Madagascar. The introduction of the first Protestant Missionaries to the capital; the wise, humane, and judicious counsels he gave to Radama; and the faithful, laborious, persevering efforts made to effect the abolition of the slave-trade, and the suppression of the piratical attacks on the Comoro Islands, have been already detailed. His successful efforts with the king to induce a commutation of capital punishments, by substituting hard labour in chains for death, is as creditable to his humanity, as the reduction of money from 70, 80, and 100 per cent. to 33, is to his sound policy, in a country where capital is small, and requires encouragement. Besides the good already stated, Madagascar is indebted to Mr Hastie for the introduction of the horse, and many other useful and valuable animals, and of seeds and plants of various descriptions. He had made arrangements with the king for the manufacture of sugar, and a short time before his decease, ordered apparatus from England for that purpose. He had also introduced two ploughs, a harrow, and some wheel-carriages, with various implements of industry; and to him the people were indebted for the method of training oxen for the yoke and to carry burdens. Though passionately and avowedly fond of amusements, he neither introduced nor encouraged them at Madagascar.

The Protestant Mission in Madagascar is deeply indebted to the support and countenance of Mr Hastie. He was not only ready on all occasions to sanction its labours when solicited, but voluntarily embraced every opportunity by which he could manifest the cordial interest he felt in its prosperity, believing it to be among the most important means for securing his favourite object—the civilization of Madagascar.

The high esteem in which Mr Hastie was also held by those traders at Mauritius who had commercial connexions at Madagascar, deserves to be noticed. During the period of his agency, he possessed the full measure of their confidence, for they knew that no exertions of his would be wanting to secure respect for their property.

Among Hastie's many useful acquirements was a respectable practical knowledge of medicine, and particularly of treating the Malagasy fever, which greatly increased his usefulness in the island, as both natives and Europeans had the utmost confidence in his skill.

* "Andriana," nobleman—a title of respect and honour; and Hastie contracted into "asy."

Although the missionaries were so much satisfied with Mr Hastie, it does not follow that he was always quite as well satisfied with them; but, as nothing of this occurs in Mr Ellis's work, neither shall we recur to it. His death was, within two years, followed by that of the king, who, in his last years, had given himself up to vicious indulgence. Both events were deeply injurious to the mission cause, and to the best interests of the nation. Radama was succeeded by the first among his nominal wives, Ranavalona, who, in this age of female sovereigns, now reigns in Madagascar. Though descended of a dynasty set aside by the father of Radama, and consequently a legitimate, she seems to have usurped the throne; but it is not easy to understand the law of succession in Madagascar.

The death of Radama was concealed until her intrigue was ripe; and some days had elapsed before it was announced that the King had "retired"—" had gone to his fathers ;" and that the successor appointed by his father was Ranavalona. The only acknowledged wife and queen was Rasalimo, the daughter of the black king of Sakalava, whose nuptials had been celebrated by a feast at Mr Hastie's, as we have noticed. Radama's only surviving child, the daughter of Rasalimo, is still alive, and is now about fourteen years of age. "His first child is said to have died; but grounds are not wanting for suspicion that cruel means were used to destroy the infant, in order to secure the succession to the crown for Rakotobe, the nephew of the king. The reigning queen, Ranavalona, has a son who is called the son of Radama, although born about twelve months after the king's death."

The accession of Queen Ranavalona was followed by the destruction of several members of the royal family. The missionaries fell gradually into disgrace; and not without cause became alarmed for their personal safety. Prince Rataffe and his wife, the eldest sister of Radama, were hunted in the woods with the royal blood-hounds, and both were cruelly assassinated, as their son, the nephew and favourite successor of the King, had previously been. The usurper, or the legitimate queen, and her counsellors, now returned in full tide to the idols and the "wisdom of their ancestors"—the old customs and usages of the Hovas. The treaty with Great Britain was annulled, though the slave trade was not resumed; and Mr Lyall, the Resident, appointed to succeed Mr Hastie, was, in the most ignominious way, driven from the capital, and yet in one exceedingly characteristic of the country. He had intimated his wish to proceed to Tamatave.

The answer of the government was, "He is to go, and his family with him." About a fortnight afterwards viz. on the 29th of March, he was alarmed by a large multitude of people coming to his house at six o'clock in the morning, headed by the keepers of the idol Ramahavaly, one of whom carried the idol on a long pole. One of Mr Lyall's servants had been seized and put in irons, himself and his sons were treated as sorcerers, and peremptorily ordered to leave the house, and proceed to the village of Ambokipeno, about six miles distant. He was not allowed to change his linen, to take any packages, or even to enter his house to take leave of his family. The court-yard of his house was filled with serpents, large bags-full of which had been brought and emptied out on the ground. These reptiles are the imagined servants of the idol Ramahavaly, and the executors of his anger; and it was desired that the people should regard the number then brought to the immediate vicinity of Mr Lyall's dwelling, as drawn to the spot by the influence of the idol; and hence they were held up by the priests as indications of the power and anger of Ramahavaly. Mr Lyall was told that the idol had ordered him to leave, and was come to send him away; and thus he was rudely hurried off on foot, the priest refusing to allow him to ride to the village where he was to wait the further intimations of the idol's will. As he was led away, the keeper of the idol Ramahavaly walked after him, carrying on the top of a pole the idol, enveloped in a small covering of scarlet cloth; fifty athletic men, either the keepers of the idol, or the relatives of such, followed immediately after, walking two abreast, and having their bodies uncovered to the waist, each man bearing in his hand a serpent, which he held by means of a small quantity of grass or straw. They were attended by a great number of the votaries of the Ramahavaly—or spectators, whose attention had been excited by their novel proceedings.

The procession moved along in the most profound silence, the men carrying the serpents, frequently lifting up the hand in which the reptile was held, exhibiting it, as it had twined its slimy folds round his hand or arm, to the great terror of the spectators, who expected that this manifestation of what they were taught to regard as Ramahavaly's anger, would be followed by still more serious consequences to the British agent. . . .

The reason assigned for the outrage upon the person and family of the British agent was, that he had proceeded himself, and had allowed his horse to approach one of the villages regarded as sacred to the idol, and which no horse or pig was allowed to enter; and that he had further transgressed, by sending his servants to catch butterflies and serpents, which he was collecting for scientific purposes. Radama had encouraged naturalists from Mauritius and elsewhere, and no prohibition of these pursuits had been made public. The government pretended that the whole had been done at the bidding of the idol, and thus endeavoured to avert any unpleasant consequences that might result. . . . Mr Lyall proceeded to Mauritius, where he died shortly afterwards. The treatment that he received at the hand of the native government was severely censured by the Secretary of State for the colonies at the time, by command of the Prince Regent; and the authorities in Madagascar were warned against a repetition of their conduct. Mr Lyall's servant was liberated, after having been confined nine days in irons, as this was deemed sufficient to inspire the natives with the dreadful anger of the idol, and to shew that his restrictions were not to be violated with impunity.

The coronation of the queen, a show got up to amuse the people, and which took place shortly afterwards, was attended with as much mummery and ceremonial as if she had been crowned at Westminster. We shall give a small specimen of this solemn farce. After homage had been done to the idols,

When the queen entered the place of assembly, she was carried towards the sacred stone, which stands about one hundred yards north-west of the platform on which the sovereign usually appears. Alighting on the south side of the stone, her majesty ascended it, and stood with her face towards the east, being surrounded by five generals, each holding his cap or helmet in one hand, and a drawn sword in the other, the band at the same time playing the national air. The queen, standing upon the sacred stone, exclaimed, "Masina, masina, v'aho?" i. e. "Am I consecrated, consecrated, consecrated?" The five generals replied, "Masina, masina, masina hianao!"—"You are consecrated, consecrated, consecrated!" Then all the crowd shouted, "Trarantitra hianao, Ranavalomanjaka!"

i. e. "Long may you live, Ranavalomanjaka!" The queen then descending from the stone on the east side, took the idols Manjakatsiroa and Fantaka into her hands, and addressed them, saying, "My predecessors have given you to me. I put my trust in you; therefore, support me." She then delivered them into the hands of their respective keepers, entered her palanquin, and was borne towards the platform, which she ascended by the east side.

The royal chair or throne, which was covered with scarlet cloth, richly adorned with gold lace, was placed at some distance from the eastern side of the platform, on ascending which, the queen proceeded to the royal chair, on which she took her seat. On her right hand sat her eldest sister, the mother of prince Ramboasalamarazaka; in front of the princess sat a major of the body guard, holding a large silk umbrella over the head of the queen. On her majesty's left hand stood the prince, heir-apparent; and on the right and left behind him, the members of the royal family sat on the platform. Behind these again, in the arms of her nurse, sat the only daughter of Radama. The wives, and some of the family of Radama, were also seen sitting among the wives of the judges below, on the north and the south of the platform. On the east and west sides sat the judges, civil and military officers, and the nobles. At each corner of the west side of the platform, the idols, Manjakatsiroa and Fantaka, were held up by their respective keepers. The idols themselves were covered as already described, and the greater part of the splendid cloth of scarlet and gold employed for this purpose, waving in the breeze, and viewed by the people with a degree of superstitious awe, added much to the impressiveness of the occasion and the scene.

It is supposed that about 60,000 people were convened in this vast assembly; of these eight thousand were soldiers.

After remaining a short time on the royal chair, the queen arose, the bands at the same time playing the national air. Her majesty leaned on her eldest sister, whom she requested to receive the hasina, or money presented from the officers, from heads of provinces, and of districts, from foreigners, &c., in token of acknowledging her supremacy. The queen then addressed the immense assembly to the following effect:—

"Veloma Zanadralambo, veloma Zanakandriandro-raka, veloma Zanakandriamasinavalona," &c., i. e. "I salute you," (different clans as named), and continued, "If you have never known me before, it is I, Ranavalona, who now appear before you." The people then shouted, "Hoo, hoo." Then she said, "God gave the kingdom to my ancestors, they transferred it to Andriampolimerina, and he again to Radama, on condition that I should be his successor. Is it not so, Ambaninandro?"—(my subjects). All replied, "It is so." Again she added, "I will not change what Radama and my ancestors have done; but I will add to what they did. Do not think that because I am a woman, I cannot govern the kingdom: never say, she is a woman weak and ignorant, she is unable to rule over us. My greatest solicitude and study will always be to promote your welfare, and to make you happy. Do you hear that, Ambaninandro?" All replied, "Yes."

Rainimahay, her prime minister, stood at a little distance west of the platform, and addressed the queen, saying, "Veloma hianao Ramavalomanjaka, veloma hianareo Ramirahavavy, veloma Rambosalamarazaka." He then turned to the people, and addressed them, saying, that they could put every confidence in the queen, and repeated to them the speech she had just delivered, with some appropriate observations on it. Then the first class or clan, called Zanadralambo, rose up, and one of their chiefs or heads addressed the queen, assured her of their fidelity, and presented to her, as their hasina, i. e. their mark of respect or homage, a Spanish dollar; then the next clan, Zanakandriamasinavalona did the same; then the Zanakambony; then the people of different provinces and districts, through their heads or representatives; then the Arabs of Muscat, who had but recently arrived with merchandises; then the Europeans; and, last of all, the generals, as the representatives of the army; Ravalonaslama, the oldest general, being selected to speak on behalf of the rest, assured the queen that the army would be found faithful in supporting her throne. . . . The firing of cannon indicated the return of the queen to her palace. Having reached the court-yard of the Tranovola, the queen left her palanquin, and, standing near the grand tomb of Radama, took the flag of Manjakatsiroa and Fantaka into her hands, and offered up a short prayer to Radama, which she concluded by saying, "May thy name ever be respected."

The dress of the queen and her attendants was strictly national, but of the most splendid and costly description; and the Wellington and Melbourne of Madagascar topped their parts. The accession of the Queen was followed by the revolt of several of the provinces which had reluctantly submitted to the arms of Radama; and an expedition arrived from France which had been intended to act against him. Some time was spent in negotiation, and fresh troops arrived from Europe to supply those destroyed by Radama's General Tazo, (fever,) who fell in their turn. The enterprise was abandoned; and the natives displayed a spirit which will not tempt its repetition. "On one occasion, when the officers on the coast sent up a report of the claims of the French to a part of the territory, the nobles and chiefs of the principal districts in the interior were assembled; and when the demand of the French was made known, their reply was, 'No: before we will consent to give them one foot of land, we will face them ourselves, and, if needful, will send our slaves. If this be not sufficient, our wives shall go and fight against them rather than allow them a place on our shores.'"

Though thus daring and frank upon great occasions, the more civilized tribes of the Malagasy are remarkable for going about the bush—for servile flattery, manœuvring, and blarney. Duplicity is a conspicuous trait in their characters, as it is in that of every people not openly enslaved, and yet far below the dignity of free-men.

It is said to be often impossible to understand their object for an hour or more, as they will talk on the most apparently dissimilar subjects, but with a visible restlessness, until, after all the windings of plausibility are travelled through, they hit, as if by accident, on the point designed from the beginning. It is remarkable, that this characteristic equally distinguishes all public proceedings. Every petition to the sovereign is prefaced by a long prologue of flattery and servility, when the petition is made to close the address often in the following words:—"And since this is finished, since the introduction is accomplished, we have to beg and petition," &c. &c. Every answer to a proclamation of the sovereign asking advice of the chieftains, is commenced by an eloquent but hackneyed detail of their sovereign's royal pedigree, supremacy, equity, &c. The sovereign also usually smooths the way for any unpalatable declaration by little of the oil of flattery previously poured into the people's ears, calling them "the ancient soot," (which has adhered for generations to the house of their ancestors,) and the "under the day," the "under it sky," &c. to which many other illustrations might be added.

The accession of Ranavalona has been the era of a retrograde movement in many things, though perhaps much of the spurious or forced civilisation of her predecessor was like the gaudy blooms stuck into a baby's garden, which, having no root in the soil, speedily wither. The court and the government, who had returned to the old regime, became seriously alarmed at the innovating spirit of knowledge, and the levelling principles of Christianity. Gradually were the new converts and the schools discountenanced, until what had begun in suspicion ended in persecution. At first the queen had granted the same toleration for public worship and the administration of the sacraments, as Radama; but, the natives using wine in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, was found to be an infringement of the law prohibiting to every one the use of wine and spirits. An exception had always, indeed, been made in this regulation, in favour of foreigners; but the queen's subjects were not to be longer permitted to violate the laws by pleading the ceremonies of their new religion. The Missionaries compromised on this point, by substituting water; but other difficulties arose. One of the most eminent of the converts, who had originally been a diviner, but who was now baptized, and took the venerable name of Paul, was become so obnoxious to what is here called the "heathen party" in the government, that he was charged with witchcraft,* and obliged to submit to the ordeal of the Tangena. Fortunately, he escaped, to the joy of his friends, and the triumph of the cause; for, in his death, his new religion would have suffered. It was now evident that the mission was valued only for the skill and knowledge of the artisans connected with it, and its mechanical uses to the government. First, natives were prohibited from receiving the sacraments, and then, with a policy worthy of the slave States of the republic of America, an edict was issued, forbidding slaves to be taught to read, on pain of the master forfeiting his property in the slave, and being himself reduced to slavery.

A married pair arrived from England to open an infant school and instruct teachers; but, when it was found that they could neither teach the painting of portraits nor yet any useful art, and, in short, do nothing more than the missionaries, either in manufactures or handicraft work, their presence was not wanted. In the schools, a general conscription for the army had, among other causes, left the Missionaries with comparatively few pupils; while the people became more averse to the schools and all kinds of instruction, on finding that the boys sent to be educated or taught mechanic arts were pressed into the service of the government. Restricted in their spiritual labours, the missionaries occupied themselves in translating into Malagasy, and printing the Scriptures. No foreigner is allowed to hold land in Madagascar and, by a law of the Hovas, permission can be granted to strangers to remain for ten years only. When Mr Griffiths, one of the missionaries, who had remained for this length of time, craved to have his permission of residence renewed, the peremptory message of the queen ordered him "to tie up his luggage and return to his native country;" and Mr Conham, another of the number who had originally come out as an artisan, but had left off work, was also ordered to depart at the end of the limited period. Yet all this while the labours of the artisans who were capable of teaching the people to work in wood and iron were very highly prized; and, while those who taught only book knowledge and religion were rejected, Mr Cameron, who had completed the erection of mills, was engaged to undertake the establishment of a foundry and a glass manufactory. The artisans were ever the main dependence of the missionaries in carrying out their special object; but this, too, failed at length. An edict was promulgated prohibiting all teaching except in the state schools—i. e., those established by the government; and the Queen's three favourite ministers no longer disguised their design of expelling the missionaries. Formal complaints were laid against the native Christians, among which was this strange one, "that they were all of one mind respecting their religion." When blamed for speaking evil of idols and other native dignities, the native Christians persisted, for conscience sake, in their course, and the incensed Queen declared that "they would not stop till some of them lost their heads." She, accordingly, published another edict of a kind which, we imagine, those who admire the monarchical principle will allow she had full right to do, and which does not seem half so despotical as many Christian proclamations which we have seen or read of, directed against Jews, Poles, Huguenots, Covenanters, or Roman Catholics. We shall give the leading passages of this important Conservative state paper.

"And I also inform all you Europeans, that whilst you reside here in my country, you may, among yourselves, observe all the customs (religious observances) of your ancestors, and your own customs; and do not entertain any fears, for I do not change the customs of your ancestors, or your customs, for the disposition that you have manifested to my country is good: however, though I state that, if the law of my country be violated, the party is guilty, whoever he may be; nor is that done in this country only, but throughout the world—wherever the law of the country is violated, the party is guilty."

That which has been established by my ancestors I cannot permit to be changed: I am neither ashamed nor afraid to maintain the customs of my ancestors."

The missionaries respectfully remonstrated, and entreated that they might be allowed to teach their religion, together with the sciences. A great kabary was forthwith held, amounting to 150,000 persons; and 15,000 troops were marched to this Wittengamote, to demonstrate that the government would enforce the decrees promulgated in a third edict, of which we select one choice morsel:—

* What the people of Madagascar term mpamasesavy. In English there is no equivalent word. The Scotch say in the same sense, uncanny or not canny.

"As to baptism, societies, places of worship distinct from the schools, and the observances of the Sabbath, how many rulers are there in this land? Is it not I alone that rule? These things are not to be done, they are unlawful in my country, saith Ranavalomanjaka; for they are not the customs of our ancestors, and I do not change their customs, excepting as to things alone which improve my country. Now then, those who have observed baptism, entered into society, and formed separate houses for prayer (or worship,) I grant ye one month, saith Ranavalomanjaka, to confess, (to make self-accusation,) and if you come not within that period, but wait to be first found out, accused by others, I denounce death against such, for I am not a sovereign that deceives, and servants are not to be deceived.

"Remember it is not about that which is sacred in heaven and earth, that which is held sacred by the twelve sovereigns, and all the sacred idols, that you are now accused; but it is that you are doing what is not the custom of our ancestors; that I abhor, saith Ranavalomanjaka."

The queen was resolved to be every inch a queen, and, moreover, the supreme head of the church in Madagascar. Persecution was now let loose on the native Christians; fines were levied; they were obliged to give up public worship; and their Bibles and other books were taken from them. The far greater number quietly submitted to the queen's decree. Yet the conduct of many of the new proselytes has received the greatest praise from those who witnessed their steadfastness. Some were tried by the ordeal and murdered; none apostatized. The missionaries now gradually withdrew from the capital, and also the artisans, of whom the principal persons have since settled in South Africa; and when the last of them took their departure, the paternal government afforded every facility for their journey, as if heartily glad to be rid of them. The last of the number, Mr Johns and Mr Baker, remained until the summer of 1836, when they went to Mauritius, where they have since directed their especial attention to the natives of Madagascar residing on that island.

Since the expulsion of the missionaries, little is known of the internal condition of the country; but it is believed far from being secure or prosperous. The people have been impoverished by levies to carry on the various wars in which the queen has engaged, and oppressed with a military conscription. To avoid those oppressions, multitudes have fled from the towns and villages, and, settling in the forests, have become banditti, living by plundering travellers or seizing cattle. Nearly two hundred of these robbers or guerillas were, in 1835, executed at one time in Tananarivo. The success which at first attended the queen's arms has failed; and in the later expeditions, fraud, and the most barbarous cruelty, had taken the place of the courage and good military conduct which made Radama victorious over so many of the inferior chiefs. In one province, after the people had submitted to the queen and given up their arms, ten thousand of them were collected in a low, swampy place, under the pretence of "striking the waters," a ceremony employed in taking the oath of allegiance, and were massacred in cold blood! And no sooner was this wholesale butchery effected, than all the boys who might soon become capable of carrying arms, were separated from their mothers and families, and, if found above a certain height, put to death. The rest of these miserable people, with their cattle and other property, were then driven to Imerina as slaves. This is but one chapter in the chronicle of the late sanguinary wars of the Queen of Madagascar. The chiefs of the southern provinces in 1837, sent an earnest application for protection to the British authorities at Mauritius, denying that they had ever acknowledged the right of the Hovas to their country.

Cultivation had been neglected while so many of the people were engaged in military services; and, in 1837, a great dearth of rice, the principal food of the people, if not an absolute famine, aggravated the general distress. In 1836, the queen sent an embassy to France and England. In London the embassy was well received; but nothing important followed, and the government of Madagascar seem to have been disappointed at the result, and to have, from that time, more rigidly than ever declined all foreign interference with its internal affairs.

The present condition of the native Christians and their future prospects is extremely interesting, and calculated to awaken the deepest sympathy in all Christian nations. In 1837, Mr Johns went to Tamatave, and had a meeting with some of them, and, although they had, in compliance with the royal edict, given up public worship, it is said that These native Christians were accustomed to read the Scriptures at the hour of midnight in their own houses, or other places of concealment, and to meet in small companies for singing and prayer. They were also, at the capital, and in some of the provinces, in the habit of meeting together on the Sabbath, either in retired places in the forest, in caverns among the rocks, or on the summit of a mountain, for the reading of the Scriptures, and social worship.

Some of the native disciples had assumed the duties of spiritual teachers, and the missionaries retain the hope that their labours will not be in vain, and that a seed of truth has been deposited in Madagascar, which will yet flourish and bear good and abundant fruit. One female convert has already with her blood watered this little seed. Upon a Sunday in August 1837, a number of Malagasy Christians assembled on a mountain near the capital, for singing, reading the Scriptures, and prayer. They were discovered, and reported to the queen.

The premises of the suspected parties were searched, for the purpose of finding ground for accusation against them, and a box of books, viz. copies of the Scriptures, and other Christian publications, that had been given by the missionaries, being found buried near the house of that eminent Christian woman, Rafaravavy, who had been previously accused of reading the Bible, she was apprehended and imprisoned; her house, her entire property, was given up to plunder; her person secured, and her hands and feet loaded with heavy iron rings. She was menaced in vain during a period of from eight to ten days, to induce her to impeach her companions. She remained firm and perfectly composed; and was put to death by spearing on the 14th of August 1837. She had said repeatedly by letter to her friend, Mrs Johns, "Do not fear on my account. I am ready to die for Jesus, if such be the will of God." She was most wonderfully supported to the last moment of her life. Her age at the time of her death was thirty-eight years. No feature in her Christian character appears to have been more distinctly manifested than her steadfastness and fidelity even to the death. Many, even of the old people, remarked they had never seen any one so "stubborn" as Rafaravavy; for although the queen forbade her to pray, she did pray, even when in irons; and continued to preach Christ to the officers and to the crowd that followed her for nearly three-quarters of a mile, from the place of public condemnation to the place of common execution.

This heroic woman had been previously discovered and threatened. She has left one orphan girl. Fifteen more of the converts have, with their families, been condemned to irredeemable slavery, and had their property confiscated; and, by the latest accounts, the severity shewn to the Christians had not been mitigated. Infanticide has, it is said, been revived in the country, though we should doubt if that crime had ever been wholly discontinued; but, the slave-trade has not been renewed, nor, if the policy of the government, which forbids all intercourse with foreigners, be maintained, can it be carried on save by pirates and banditti about the coast.

We have hitherto said much more of Madagascar than of the history of it. That the work was wanted, which skilfully lays open a country of great natural capabilities, already in an advanced state of civilization, and occupied by five millions of human beings, no one will question; and though it bears occasional marks of haste, and want of proper concoction, it must be received as a valuable contribution to the most important of all knowledge, that of our race. A large portion of the materials employed was furnished by the missionaries, for what was originally intended to form a "History of the Protestant Mission to Madagascar;" but the design extended, and other excellent materials were collected by Mr Ellis, besides those accounts of Rochon and Dury, and of Benyowsky's expedition, and the other works on Madagascar, with which the public is familiar. Access to the voluminous and interesting official journals of Mr Hastie was obtained from the Colonial Secretary. If these journals exactly correspond with the unpublished private diaries of Hastie, we are bound to say that, comparatively, very slender and imperfect use has been made of them. The latter we have had the pleasure of perusing; and so complete a picture of the interior movements of a court, and of a sovereign prince, in a certain stage of civilization, but with all the instincts of royalty in full bloom, has, we believe, never yet been given to the world. These MS. diaries are the faithful transcript of the daily transactions of the Resident, and of his conversations with Radama. They give, besides, a minute account of his many journeys with the King, whether warlike expeditions or surveys and royal progresses. They are certainly elliptical and imperfect, leaving much to be guessed from the context; but they also contain many minute and graphic strokes and snatches of autobiography, with which Mr Hastie would not probably have troubled the Colonial Office. On this account we the more regret that Mr Ellis does not seem to have perused those papers. As a whole, they may not be of equal value, but they possess inimitable parts, that would have formed most appropriate additions to a history of Madagascar, in all its relations, and in its most important epoch.

Let us, however, be grateful for the excellent work we have obtained, and to which, in all matters under their particular direction, the publishers have done ample justice to the author. The engravings, if not fine, are true; and really illustrative of manners and usages; and we have a very good map, framed from the late survey of the coast, made by Commodore Owen. Mr Freeman, one of the missionaries, has given, in an appendix, an essay upon the Malagasy language, and an outline of its grammatical structure. The poetry, and the legends and fables of the natives, are illustrated, and the specimen of poetry given is certainly not that of a rude or unintellectual people. The translator may have adorned it somewhat; but he could not have added the high and abstract cast of thought and of contemplative moralizing. Suitable attention is also paid to the geography and natural history of this important island—the Great Britain of Africa; which, whether for weal or wo, must henceforth occupy a more prominent place in the world's annals.

MY FATHERLAND.

"Duftende Erge og kornvige vango," &c.

Our valleys and straths are bespangled with daisies,
We've silver-blue seas and a rich wooded strand;
Our maids are like graces,
With sweet smiling faces—
Oh, these are the riches and joys of our land!

Our sailors have furrowed each field of the ocean,
To circle the globe they have gallantly striven;
Our corn-fields up-heaving,
Are gloriously waving,
And glowing like gold with the bounties of heaven.

The graves of our heroes who battled for freedom,
Are hallowed for aye in each green Danish dell;

We've planted the pines,
To bloom o'er the shrines
Where patriots conquered and Tyranny fell.
Mighty our monarchs, with sword and with sceptre,
And stalwart the lances they had at command;
The skalds poured in rhyme
Inspirations sublime;
And Fame built her fane in our dear Danish land!
Deep-rooted and strong is the fair tree of Freedom;
It flourishes green 'neath our cold northern sky;
Whilst glory and honour
Await on our banner;
And Tyranny quails at our fierce battle-cry!

NOOKS OF THE WORLD.

NO. II.—A VISIT TO THE WHITWORTH DOCTORS.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

THE proverbial credulity of John Bull is in nothing more miraculous than in the avidity with which he runs after quacks, and in the enormous deluge of their lethal, but legalised trash, which he pours into his stomach. To look at the portraits of honest John, one would not suspect, for a moment, that that "fair, round paunch" was with aught but "good capon lined," except the ancient and honourable staple of his table, roast-beef and plum-pudding, standing side by side with his cool tankard of "jolly good ale and old." Lord, what a mistake! It is a notorious fact, that John drinks physic, and physic of the worst kind, with greater eagerness than he does stout October; and that fair rotundity of corporation, and elephantine massiveness of legs, with which he is represented, may be more than suspected to be half drouthy dropsy and cumbrous disease. It would be a patriotic action for some one to obtain from the Stamp Office the amount of money annually paid for stamps on quack medicines, and thereupon calculate, as might readily be done, the sum spent every year, in this enlightened empire, on the vilest and most deleterious mass of death, in the shape of pill and potion, that ever was put together by impudence and conscienceless cupidity, and distributed, by the aid of patents, and the public and the private press,* through every channel of the community. The sum would be found to be enormous and startling beyond conception. I wonder the advocates of the Temperance Society have not opened upon this scent. I would wish most earnestly to put them upon it. They have decanted on the gin-palaces and the distribution of liquid fire amongst the poor, to good purpose; but are they not aware that an immense quantity of gin circulates under the disguise of quack nostrums, amongst the poorest of the poor? Do they not know that these have purposely all the allurements and all the effect of drams—the momentary stimulus—the sense of warmth and comfort—and then the sinking, sickening feeling, and the greedy, ravenous craving and inward cry of "More! give me more!" They have all this; with the far worse pretence and delusion of cherishing and curing, while they are killing. The tippler of gin—the squalid haunter of the gin-palace—does not pretend to believe, and the heartless vender of the destroying-fire-water does not pretend to tell him, that it does him any good. The wretch goes to his ruin and his grave with his eyes open. He knows that his daily, and, if he can get it, hourly dram is, to use his own language, "eating his inside out;" but the poor tippler of quack physic is persuaded by the daring puffs of the vender, and persuades himself, that his potion is putting him a new one in. The thing is, mind you, not a thing of odium and reprobation, a thing denounced and warned against, but it is licensed and legalized by the government. It has the stamp of its sanction, approval, and authority. "What!" says the poor but credulous man, "will you tell me that our great and learned legislators would stamp and recommend this medicine if it were not good? And will you persuade me that our patriotic proprietors of newspapers, who are every day crying for right and justice to the poor man, would fill their papers with advertisements and praises of those medicines, if they were not wholesome?"

"Patents must be bought;
Venders and puffers for the poison sought;
And then, in many a paper, through the year,
Must cures and cases, oaths and proofs, appear:
Men snatched from graves as they were dropping in,
Their lungs coughed up, their bones pierced through their skin;

Their liver all one schirrus, and the frame
Poisoned with evils which they dare not name;
Men who spent all upon physicians' fees,
Who never slept, nor had a moment's ease—
All now as roaches sound, and all as brisk as bees!"

I again earnestly call upon the influential members of Temperance Societies, and, indeed, upon all friends of humanity, to turn their attention to this subject. I would advise them to read the seventh Letter of Crabbe's "Borough," from which the preceding lines are taken, for a fuller and more accurate exposé of the quack-murder system than can be given here. They will there find what they will soon find confirmed in real life, if they will take the trouble to look into it—that, as to quacks—

"No class escapes them: from the poor man's pay
The nostrum takes no trifling part away.
See those square patent bottles from the shop,
Now decoration to the cupboard's top!
And there a favourite hoard you'll find within,
Companions meet! the julep and the gin."

A whole volume could not describe more completely the character and the career of the regular quack, than Crabbe has done it already. That character and career were drawn from the life, and Neddy may stand an everlasting type of his class. The lad, who was the zany of the school, happening to find in an old book the name of oxymel of squills, thereupon turned quack doctor, and succeeded.

"Now all the profit fell to Ned's control,
And pride and avarice quarrelled for his soul.
When mighty profits by the trade were made,
Pride built a palace, avarice groaned, and paid;
Pride placed the signs of grandeur all about,
And avarice barred his friends and children out."

Who could not point out at least half-a-dozen of these Neddies? In my own experience, could point to several who are now living in their palaces, while their puffs, with wood-cut at their heads, are going through every new paper in the kingdom, in order to extinguish what little health remains in the squalid huts of the mechanics of crowded towns. It is true that the mischief is not confined to the poor ; it pervades all ranks ; and the silly rich have done no little to strengthen this destructive infatuation of the lower orders, by their pompous patronage of their St John Longs, animal magnetizers, et hoc genus omne. But for the aristocracy of fools I feel comparatively little compassion. It is one thing to kill oneself half by luxurious indulgence, and then the other half by an absurd credulity, from which station, education, means of better information, better advice, and better aid, ought to have been sufficient safeguards—to do this on a silken sofa, with our feet on Turkey carpets, and a table before us with every delicacy of the season upon it, and so to put ourselves out of a world where we are of no real use ; and another, and much more deplorable one, for the poor man, worn with excessive labour and despair, to be lured to his death in the hope of recovering his vigour, and that on his straw mattress, on his cold brick floor, with squalor and wretchedness surrounding him, in the shape of broken windows, fireless grate, empty pantry, and a wife and children who are deplorable objects of misery now, but who on his death, see before them only separation and unknown hardships in Union Prisons, and under severe taskmasters.

If any one think this a fanciful picture, I do not ask him to believe it, or to believe anybody that he may meet, and who may tell him that it is true ; but I ask him, if he lives in a manufacturing town, to take a few turns in its alleys and alley-courts ; and I tell him, and all whom it concerns, (and whom does it not concern, if we are not a little behind the generous heathen who said, “Homo sum,” &c., “I am a man, and I think nothing indifferent which affects humanity?”)—I tell them these few following facts from a dozen years of professional experience. The quantity of quack medicines consumed by the poor is not merely enormous, but has been steadily increasing for the last ten years. For this there are two causes—one is the increased facility for advertisements by the multiplication of advertising papers, and by the reduction of the stamp-duty on advertisements : but the great and frightful cause is the increase of distress amongst the working population. This is one of the many horrible ramifications of the Corn-and-Cattle monopoly, which, while it has restricted commerce, and thus reduced mechanics’ wages on the one hand, has, on the other, carefully hedged out, not only corn under a certain price, but every species of fresh meat at any price, and thereby driven the poor, not only to overwork themselves, but to seek to satisfy themselves by the most wretched and disease-inducing food ; and, even these failing in quantity, to seek to deaden their natural appetite by gin, tobacco, opium, and quack spirits, under the delightful names of Cordial, Balm of Gilead, Balm of Rakassir, and all kinds of nectars and nepenthes. I have contemplated with horror the rapid increase of the consumption of opium, and its spirituous tincture, laudanum, within the last ten years. The ravenous fierceness with which opium-eaters enter the druggists’ shops, when want of money has kept them from their dose beyond their accustomed time of using it, and the trembling impatience with which they watch the weighing of the drug, (every moment appearing to them an age,) and the avidity with which they will seize and tear off their wonted dose, and swallow it—are frightful to be seen ; yet must have been seen by many on such occasions. The extent to which this drug is administered by poor women to their children, too, is another crying evil, of which the humane public has little notion ; and it is one for which there never will be found any remedy but the abolition of the abominable restrictions on the importation of food. The wretched mother, while her husband is thundering away in his loom, for sixteen hours a-day, and her older children are gone out to the factory, or elsewhere, to help to increase the scant family revenue, which, altogether, does not reach the point of sufficiency, and with, perhaps, two or three little half-clad and half-starved brats about her, has also one in the cradle. She has no snug nursery—she has no nurse—she cannot afford even to keep at home an elder daughter for that purpose ; but, on the contrary, she has to cook the family food, such as it is, to wash and mend the family clothes ; and, very probably, besides this, to take in washing or other work. While she is busy at the wash-tub, the child wakes and cries. What shall she do ? At night, while she and her husband should and must sleep, or they cannot go through their daily work, the child again wrangles and cries. What shall she do ? There is nothing for it but to go to the druggist’s shop for—A PENNYWORTH OF PEACE ; and what that is, anybody in Lancashire can tell you ; and, if you are not in Lancashire, I can—it is laudanum, or opium disguised in treacle, and termed in other places Godfrey’s Cordial. It is in vain to remonstrate with the poor on this practice—they always ask you what they are to do, and think it unanswerable to add—“A pen’orth of peace is worth a penny.” Thus are the constitutions of the poor sapped and stupified even in the cradle, and all the wisdom of England cannot point any remedy but that of taking off the violent pressure on the means of existence ; and, if that will not enable the poor of this country to live on bread and cheese and honest beef, instead of opium and quack medicines, then there will be nothing for it but their escaping to those new lands where they can.

In commencing this article, my intention was, as may be seen by my title, to have noticed merely a set of medical practitioners, who, compared with those I have alluded to, would be libelled by the name of quacks. They are country practitioners, who have taken up this profession of themselves, and who, however great may have been their ignorance, were honest in their endeavours to benefit their patients. Amid the mischief which, in some cases, they must inevitably do, they, no doubt, did a considerable quantity of good. This class of Doctors has been put down by the regular medical men, who have obtained an Act for the purpose; and thus a very curious class of old English leeches, full of original character, has been annihilated, while the great evil itself of quackery has been permitted to go on and prosper on the vitals of the poor, under not merely the nose but the sanction of Government.

My readers may possibly some of them call to mind the trial of a man of this class, of the name of Warburton, in Staffordshire, some years ago, who was prosecuted by the medical men of his neighbourhood under the aforesaid act; and whose examination caused enormous merriment in the court. He professed to practice on the principle of the Whitworth Doctors, and, being asked in what doses he gave his medicine, whether in grains or scruples, replied he had neither grains nor scruples, but dealt it out by handfuls. Sir William Garrow, the judge, asked him if he doctored horses, and he replied—"Yes, and humans as well." The Whitworth Doctors, whom Warburton professed to follow, were, however, far superior in their knowledge and practice to him. They are indeed the most remarkable men of the class that ever perhaps appeared in England, and have accordingly become proportionably celebrated. For originality and eccentricity of character, there are few of those many varieties of singular personages with which the lower walks of English life have abounded, which may be compared with them. As this class of characters is therefore fast becoming extinct under the operation of the Apothecaries' Act, and as the descendants of the original Whitworth Doctors have been obliged to qualify themselves at our regular medical schools, it may be interesting to many to have on record such particulars of these singular men, as a visit to them twenty years ago, and what I have been able to learn of them from other sources, have furnished. It must, however, be kept in mind that this visit was twenty years ago, and that such matter as floats about in common conversation may require some correction. But, in the main, I believe the following relation will be about as correct as can be obtained.

Whitworth is a little village of Lancashire, about three miles from Rochdale. In this village, I suppose half a century ago or more, resided John Taylor, a farrier, and, most likely, originally a blacksmith. This man, who possessed a strong, rough, but sagacious character, was eminently successful in practice upon horses. It is probable that, seeing the beneficial result of his pharmaceutical and surgical operations on horses, like Warburton, he began to imagine that they would succeed on "humans as well." It is certain, however, that their efficacy was tried, and with such consequences that his neighbours began to have a great opinion of his skill, and not only to put themselves under his hands, but to sound his fame abroad in the country. His patients increased to such a degree that "the humans" soon became more numerous than the brutes. John Taylor did not, on this account, however, despise and abandon the brutes; on the contrary, he continued to practice on "horses and humans as well" during his life; and it is said that, to the last, he gave the preference to, and had the greater pride in, the veterinary department of his business. Long after his death, it will be seen, as we proceed, that stocks for securing horses while any operation was performed on them, were standing before the door of the house, and may be standing there now, for aught I know—but they were, at the time of my visit there, not merely standing but in use. John Taylor's fame soon became preeminent for the cure of cancers, for setting broken bones, and straightening twisted and contracted limbs. For these and numberless other causes, people of all ranks flocked to him from all parts of England. He seems to have been a curious compound of rude independence and good nature. Whoever went to him, gentle or simple, lord or labourer, were treated just in one way. John was no respecter of persons, but he seemed to have strong feelings of the rights of man, and an unbendable sense of justice. It was with him, first come first served; as every one entered his dressing-room, or surgery, or call it what you will, he took his place, and was attended to in his turn, and no sooner. If he came in his carriage or on his bare-feet, it was all one—he would get no preference, and suffer no neglect. If any one, presuming upon his wealth and rank, attempted to claim prior attention, he was sure to get a rebuff that satisfied him on that head; and, if he chose to take affront and go away, why, so he might—John Taylor would neither seek to conciliate him, nor care about it.

Dr Radcliffe, of free-spoken notoriety, who told William III. that he would not have his two legs for his three kingdoms, or Abernethy of our day, could not be more rude and uncereemonious in their manners than John Taylor. He charged all alike, rich and poor; and such a charge!—hear it, O ye doctors!—eighteenpence a-week for medicine and attendance! It was plain he did not want to make a fortune; and yet, even at this rate, such was the immense numbers who flocked to him, he did make a fortune. The rich, it is true, who received benefit from him, often made him handsome presents; but, if they made these before they left, they got no better attention than they would have done without—for it was his principle to do all that his art could for every one; and, if the poor never paid him, as many never did, he never asked them for it; they staid as long as they pleased, and they went when they pleased. They had lodgings in the cottages of the village, and I believe that it was owing to the need of lodgings that the village itself sprung up. There was a subscription box kept to help such of the poor as could not support themselves; and when John Taylor heard of any cases of great need amongst them, he would carry round the box himself amongst the more affluent of his patients, and contribute liberally too. It is no wonder that such numbers hastened to the Whitworth Doctor. The medical men of the neighbourhood, of course, exerted all their influence against the spread of John Taylor's extraordinary reputation, and carefully trumpeted about all the cases in which they could learn that he had been unsuccessful; and, no doubt, there were plenty of these, especially as almost every patient who went to him had been under the hands of a regular practitioner till his faith had failed; and a great proportion of them were such as had been dismissed from hospitals and infirmaries as incurable. But John Taylor cared for none of these things. It was his daily delight to deride the skill of the medical men of the country; and, sure enough, he had always before him plenty of instances of signal failures on their part. "Ay," he used to say, as he sat dressing his patients, and looking round on perhaps such a group of cripples and invalids as no infirmary in England contained, "the doctors call me a quack, and a horse-doctor; but who have been doctoring you, I wonder? What makes all you come to Whitworth, eh? if you have good doctors at home? I should like to know that. Can any one tell me that?" And then he would laugh, and tell them what had passed between himself and some of the neighbouring doctors. "A famous doctor of Manchester," said he, on one occasion—and naming a leading physician—"met me the other day as I was going along the street. 'Well, John Taylor,' said he, 'you go on killing as usual, I suppose.' 'Ay,' replied I, to humour the man, 'but at somewhat a cheaper rate than thou does.'"

That John did some signal cures there can be no question. It is probable that his clear, strong head, and a native turn for surgery, gave a precise knowledge of what his drugs and applications could effect, and that his boldness carried him through what more scientific hands dared not have undertaken. I knew a lady well who had been given up by the ablest surgeons of her neighbourhood as incurable. Her complaint was a cancer in the breast. Though living a hundred miles from Whitworth, she resolved, as a last resource, to go to John Taylor. When John had examined the breast, he looked at her, and said—

"What art thou come here for, woman?"

The lady, who was a woman of a dauntless heart, replied, "To be cured, to be sure."

"Cured!" said John in a stern voice; "not all the doctors in England can cure thee: thou may go home again, and dee!"

"I tell you, John Taylor," replied the lady, "I shall do no such thing. I am come here to see whether you are as much cleverer than other men, as you are represented. Try your hand, John Taylor, on me. You think I am afraid of being hurt, but you are mistaken; I can bear what you can inflict; and I say, try your hand—let it be kill or cure. I can but die at last."

"Thou art a brave lass," replied John, in evident surprise. "Then, I will try—and God prosper us both!"

The lady remained there six months, and, during that period, she suffered as much as it is perhaps possible for a human creature to bear; but she came home a sound woman, and lived thirty years afterwards. I have often sat, when a boy, and heard her tell what passed at Whitworth. Dr John, as he was called, had then two sons, grown up, who assisted him, George and James. George was married, and Mrs George acted as the compounder of his medicines; and the lady, who seemed herself to catch the spirit of the place, used to help her. The principal remedies used were, a diet drink to purify the blood; an active caustic, called by the appropriate name of "Keen," with which they eradicated cancers; a spirituous liniment, called "Whitworth Redbottle;" a black salve; a snuff, of wondrous virtues, for the head; and blisters. All these, Mrs George and the lady found abundant occupation in preparing, and in the most primitive manner. They used to boil a whole kettle of ingredients for the black salve; then mop the floor, and fling the salve out upon it while it was wet; after which they cut it into portions, and rolled into it little sticks. They made diet drinks by gallons; and made pills by the thousand.

Dr John was not only sought by patients of high rank at Whitworth, but he was, on several occasions, sent for to them to considerable distances. One of these journeys was to Cheltenham, to attend a lady of high rank—a duchess—where arriving, and finding her surrounded by a great number of people, he ordered all out but the husband and maid; and, ascertaining that the complaint was an abscess, with her permission he opened it, and gave her instant relief. This raised such an opinion of his skill, that George III., who was there with his family, afterwards sent for him to the Princess Elizabeth, who had a complaint in the head which resisted all the skill of the royal physicians. John Taylor gave the princess some of his famous snuff, and eventually relieved her. Of some characteristic passages which occurred then, we shall speak anon.

When I visited Whitworth, old John Taylor was dead, and his son James, and the two sons of George, (then dead, too,) were the doctors. I remember James as a stout man, in a blue coat, about fifty years of age, having much the appearance of a respectable farrier. The elder of the two nephews appeared a fine active young man of three or four-and-twenty; the other, a youth two or three years younger.

I well remember approaching Whitworth from Rochdale. The way lay along a very miry, winding road, which it would not have been easy to traverse on foot but for a raised footpath with one single row of flag-stones. The country round was of the wildest description; desolate moors and moorland hills, with scattered fields of the most neglected aspect, with banks with a flag-stone here and there raised on the top of them, and a few bramble-bushes for fences. Winding round a brown moorland hill, I came to a sort of opening in the side of it, up which continued the causeway of single flag-stones. In this cove or opening of the hill, I found the village—a group of grey-stone houses, above which swelled away a great heathy hill, almost deserving the name of mountain, and, as I soon learned, called “Brown-Wardle.” The poor patients, such as lodged beyond the precincts of the village, were just coming away from the dressing-room; and never did I see such a sight on any other occasion. It appeared to me that the allegory of the “Mountain of Miseries” was here become a reality, and was pouring out all its evils in a bodily and human shape. A crew of the poorest and most emaciated creatures came hobbling along, some on crutches, and some on sticks, with shrunken forms and ghostly countenances, bearing in them all the signs of physical suffering. What rendered their wretched aspect still more wretched was, that most of them were clad in that coarse grey cloth in which the pariah authorities now generally array paupers. We found the village an assemblage of poor cottages, such as the houses of Lancashire weavers generally are, and the inhabitants living chiefly on dry oat-cake, milk, and potatoes. Such a thing as fresh meat, we were told, was rarely seen there, except at the doctor’s and the inn, or in lodging-houses where patients of some property were. The only barber in the village was a woman. Luckily we found the inn a tolerably good village public-house; and, more luckily still, we found two or three highly-respectable and intelligent people staying in it; part of whom were patients, and one a wealthy old gentleman of Leeds, who was in the habit of coming and spending some weeks there annually, from the grateful pleasure of having been there cured of a most formidable disease, which had baffled the most able surgeons of his own town. The inn was at the top of the glen, close under the foot of Brown-Wardle; the doctor’s house on the same side of the village, but lower down. Having established ourselves in our quarters, we soon issued forth to reconnoitre the place and see the Doctors. Of all the “Nooks of the World,” never was I in such a nook as this. All about the village were wretched invalids walking, some with patched faces, some with an arm or a leg bound fast to a board—I suppose, in order to straighten them; some with splints on their arms, shewing that they had been broken; others moving slowly along like spectres, in the lowest state of physical exhaustion; and others inwardly groaning as they passed, evidently from the torture they were undergoing from the keen. Dante might have there learned new forms of torture for his “Inferno.” The Doctors’ house was sufficiently pointed out by its larger size, and by the wooden machine standing in the street before it, for fixing immovably horse-patients when under their hands. On entering the dressing-room, a scene still more singular than that without presented itself. In the village there were, at that time, more than a hundred patients. In this room there were at least fifty, waiting to be dressed or examined. They were all arranged in a row round the room, and in one corner sat James Taylor, with his surgical apparatus—such apparatus as, I suppose, was never seen in any other surgery. It was, in plain truth, the old shoeing-box of the blacksmith—such as, I presume, most of my readers have seen; an oblong, shallow box, with an iron handle, in the shape of a bow, rising over the middle of it, to carry it by—the very box, no doubt, which had served on many an occasion of shoeing a horse before doctoring became John Taylor’s trade. In this box were a few bottles and pots of their invariable remedies—“keen,” green salve, red-bottle, some blisters and plaisters ready spread, a large wooden skewer or two, and some hurds. The patients came in succession before the Doctor, and he rapidly examined and dismissed them. Some he sent to Mrs George for medicaments; to others he handed out a plaister or quantity of head-anuff; others came with a blister ready risen; on seeing which he took a skewer, wrapped some hurds round it, and with that desperate weapon flirited the blister straight off at once, gave the raw place a good rubbing with the hurds, and, handing the writhing patient a plaister, told him to go and put that on, and come again in the afternoon, when the same process would be repeated. Some were dressed with the “keen,” who, in the agony of it, darted out of the place full speed; and some with rheumatic contractions in the arms or hands were sent to rub the hand-rail of the stairs for half an hour. The whole scene was most singular; but nothing was so remarkable as the stoical endurance of pain by the patients. I suppose it was seeing how lightly pain was treated by the Doctor, that every one felt himself bound, before so many witnesses, to betray no effeminacy; but certainly endurance which, under ordinary circumstances never would have been dreamed of, there was general. That very morning I saw a stout blacksmith present himself. His arm had been broken, and had been set crookedly by his surgeon. James Taylor told him to sit down in a chair in the centre of the room, and, signing a strong man to go behind and put his arms round the patient, and hold him fast in the chair, he ordered another man to take him by the hand and pull out the ailing arm with all his might. He then laid his hand on the ill-set fracture, and, with a sudden pressure, crack went the bone; splints were at hand, and it was set again in a space of time that appeared but as a moment. There, thought I, that man has had enough for one day; yet in the afternoon I met this blacksmith walking about the village with his arm in a sling, and quietly whistling, as if at perfect ease.

The young George was the one who took the department of bone-setting, and he went all round the country, often to very great distances, for that purpose. He had a capital horse, and rode anywhere to set a bone, at the simple charge of one shilling a-mile, operation included! A gentleman who had been there some time, told me that he saw this George have the arm of a strong man strapped to the iron palisades on the garden wall, and two strong fellows pulling at the man, while he himself took a run-jump, and struck the man on the arm, in order to break again an ill-set fracture, which was, however, too firmly knit to give way to any gentle means; and that, fearful as the operation appeared, the man's arm was soon reset and did well.

To complete the picture of this singular place, we must see, while these things are going on, numbers of patients walking about, having all the appearance of violent colds in their heads, the effect of taking the head-snuff; now and then a horse coming up to be doctored, which the Doctor would walk out to, leaving all his "humans" to wait his return within. The younger James, however, appeared, whilst I was there, to take the horse department. I saw him order a horse to be put in the stocks one morning, with his head fixed fast aloft, and, coming out of the house with a red-hot iron, he bored, very deliberately, five or six holes with it under the horse's jaws, and as coolly then said—

"Take him away, and keep him from any other horses; the disease is contagious, and he'll never be any better."

"If he will never be any better," I asked, "why put the poor creature to that torment?"

"Ah," said James, "but how did I know that till I had tried how far the disease was gone?"

This James might often be seen walking about before the house, with an old hat slung before him by a cord over his shoulders. In this hat he had a large lump of some compound, which he worked into pills as he went about. The hat was fairly saturated through and through with the drug, and appeared to have been used for that purpose for years. When he had made a hat-full of pills, he went and turned them into a box, took another lump of compound, and again commenced his walk and his pill-making.

These curious, primitive people, by this time were become very wealthy. The place, and a great deal of land round it, belonged to them. They kept a pack of hounds, and were very fond of hunting; and often would the Doctor leave the dressing-room without a word, mount his horse, and be off after the hounds before the patients were aware of his intentions. No doubt, it must have been a great relief to him, to get out of the fetid air, and from amongst the miseries of the dressing-room, and enjoy the freshness of the moors and the excitement of the chase; for, callous as the Doctors seemed outwardly, and blunt in their behaviour, there was no want of humanity in them. James used to sit as he dressed his patients, endeavouring to amuse them with all the local stories he could recollect. He often entertained them too with anecdotes of his father, Dr John; of which we may give an instance or two.

A gentleman of great wealth came to Whitworth. He drove up to the inn in his carriage, and with a very splendid equipage. He soon sent down a very smart and powdered servant, requesting John Taylor to wait on him. "Wait on him!—wait on him!" exclaimed John, in apparent astonishment. "Tell the man I wait on nobody—those who come here must wait on me. If he wants me, he must come to the dressing-room like the rest, and take his turn." This answer was so offensive that the gentleman, though suffering excruciating pain from a complaint pronounced by his own medical men to be hopeless, was, like Naaman, when the prophet told him to go and dip in Jordan, so indignant that he ordered his carriage out, and told the coachman to drive home again. His servants, however, prevailed on him, as it was of so much consequence to himself, to humour this Lancashire bear, as they called him. He did so, and when he entered the dressing-room—"Thou lazy dog," said Dr John, "what hast thou come here for? If it is not worth thy coming from the inn, it was not worth coming all the rest of the way, I think." The gentleman smothered his indignation, and John eventually sent him home a sound man.

At another time, a nobleman brought his lady to Whitworth. She could not walk, and was carried into the private dressing-room. John inquired what was the matter, and was told that she had been startled by a sudden fright; had fallen; and from that time had never been able to put one foot to the ground. John Taylor told her to try to walk. The lady, smiling, answered, that if she could have walked she need not have come to him. Nothing would satisfy John, however, but that she must try to walk. So, being raised up by her husband, and leaning on him, she made the attempt. As she stood in great pain, John went behind her, and gave her a sudden push with his knee. The lady gave a scream, and a start, and fell into her husband's arms. The nobleman, very indignant at the insult he supposed put upon his wife, asked the Doctor very fiercely what he meant. "Why," said John, "I mean to see what good that has done her. Let her try to walk again now." The nobleman was very angry, and the lady very much alarmed and agitated; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the Doctor could get them to listen any farther to him. "Why, if you are fools, ye are fools," said John. "Let the woman, I say, try to walk again." They were at length prevailed on to consent, when, to the astonishment of the lady, she found the power of her limb in a great measure restored, and was able to get across the room, leaning on her husband. The nobleman was now as full of amazement as he was before of wrath. "In the name of wonder," said he, "how came you to hit on that scheme?" "Why," replied the Doctor, "the woman's hip was out. It was put out in a fright, you said, and I thought a fright was just as likely to jump it in again. There it is, you see. She must have it well bandaged for a while, then all will be safe.

But you may go home to-day if you like." Of course, the joy of both husband and wife was not small. The nobleman, in his gratitude, pressed upon John a purse of gold; but he refusing to take more than his regular fee, the nobleman threw the purse on the table and left it.

James related this story of himself. He was in Staffordshire, near Lichfield, and, it becoming known, he was sent for to a gentleman who was in bed. When he got into his room, he found him surrounded with abundance of bottles of physic. He immediately rung the bell, and ordered the servants to throw all those into the yard; and to get up their master, and let him sit down to dinner with him. They all exclaimed, that was impossible, for their master had not been out of bed for some months. "Never mind," said James; "get us some dinner here; and bring your master a glass of brandy and water. What he is dying of is want of nourishment." With much persuasion the gentleman was got up; drank the brandy and water, and took some food. Next day, he felt a great deal better. James had him down stairs to dinner; and, in a very few days, had him out with him on horseback, and after the hounds.

James used to relate his father's visit to the Royal Family, to prescribe for the Princess Elizabeth, with much gusto. The complaint of the Princess was a continued pain and stupor in the head. Of course, John Taylor immediately ordered her to take his snuff. This snuff is made of the powdered leaves of the Assarabacca, (Asarum Europæum), which has the property of purging the head, and of which plenty was grown in the garden at Whitworth. John, having given his order, and delivered the snuff, looked about him, and, seeing the Princesses all there, he clapped the Queen familiarly on the back, and said—"Well, thou art a farrently woman* to be the mother of such a set of straight-backed lasses."

Charlotte took this unusual familiarity with a very good grace, smiling, and replying—"Yes, Mr Taylor, and I was once as straight-backed a lass as any of them."

John had not, however, retired from the presence of royalty very long, when he was sent for again in great haste. "Well, and what is the matter now?" asked he, on entering.

"Oh! the Princess is taken with such a continual sneezing, that we are quite alarmed."

"Is that all?" said John; "then let the girl sneeze; that is the very thing that will do her good."

John is said to have had the honour of completely relieving the Princess of her complaint. We must, however, give one more characteristic anecdote of him before we withdraw him from court. One morning, as he sat chatting with the Queen and Princesses, a draper's man brought in, by order, a number of pieces of Irish linen for the Queen's inspection. On looking it over, none was found to be so fine as was desired. The man was ordered to bring some much finer. He, of course, assured her Majesty that every effort should be used to meet her wishes, but that he was doubtful whether any finer really was made. "Oh, dear, yes!" exclaimed both Queen and Princesses, "much finer than this, we are confident."

The man bowed and retired. When he was gone, John Taylor, who sat closely observing all that passed, said—"Now, do you expect the man will bring you any finer?"

"Oh! certainly!"

"Well," said John, "I don't."

"You don't? Why, Mr Taylor, what makes you think so?"

"Because," replied John, "I don't believe there ever was finer made than one piece amongst these. But I can tell you what the man will do. He'll go home and rest a while, and then he will come back with the finest piece of cloth, and put a good deal higher price upon it, and then it will do."

"Oh, no!" exclaimed Queen Charlotte. "I am a better judge of linen than you give me credit for, Mr Taylor. Besides, the man dare not do such a thing—he would at once lose our patronage—he dare not do such a thing."

"Well," said John, "we shall see."

"Well, now," said the Queen, "we will see. You shall remain here till the man return, and be convinced."

He did so. The man, after a while, came back with a single piece. He assured her Majesty that they had sent all over the city, and had had the good fortune to discover this piece—certainly the most extraordinarily fine piece of linen which he had ever beheld. The Queen and Princesses, on examining it, at once joined in expressions of admiration of it. "That was fine, indeed! That was much superior to the finest of the former pieces!"

As soon as the man had withdrawn—"There!" said the Queen, turning triumphantly to John Taylor, "what do you think now, Mr Taylor? You will admit, I think, that you were mistaken."

"That may soon be settled," said John. "If that be the fine piece which the man had here before, there is the mark of my thumb on it; for I never saw finer linen than that in my life, and, expecting what the man must do, I privately wet my thumb, and rubbed it in the chimney, before I took hold of the piece."

There was an instant eager examination of the piece, and there, sure enough, was John Taylor's mark.

The country people in the neighbourhood had such an opinion of Dr John's ability, that they believed nothing was too difficult for him. James often told this story. A country fellow one day appeared before the house with a couple of wretched old horses, and asked to speak with the Doctor. John Taylor went out to him; and, on seeing the man's cattle, supposed he was come to sell them for the hounds. What then was his surprise when the fellow gravely told him that he got his living by carting coals with these two horses; that they were now nearly worn out; and that he was too poor to buy fresh ones; so he would be much obliged if he would take them, and make him one preatty good 'un out of them. If he could not do that, he was a ruined man.

"One preatty good 'un!" said John, looking very grimly at the horses; "why, fellow, what preatty good 'un can be made out of two such bare-boned old dog-tits as those, thinkest thou? But, however, take them and turn them into the close by the barn there, and come again in a fortnight. I must try what I can do for thee."

With many thanks, the man made his bow, and took his leave. Duly at the end of the fortnight, to the day, the man appeared, and asked the Doctor if he had done the job for him. John Taylor called a man, and told him to go and bring the horse that he made the other day. Accordingly, the horse was brought from the neighbouring croft, and the fellow, looking him all over with the air of a judge, declared that the horse was certainly better than both of the old 'uns put together; "but," said he, "Doctor, you've made one mistake, and a great 'un."

"What's that?" asked the Doctor.

"Why," said the fellow, "it is a wall-eyed 'un; and, of all things, I canna abide a wall-eyed 'un."

"Get away, thou fool!" said Dr John, "thou shouldst ha' told me that before. It can't be altered now." So the man, walked his beast off the ground, never for a moment doubting but it was compounded of the two old ones. or thinking it at all wonderful that Dr John had done such a thing. The Doctor had plenty of horses on the moor, reserved for his hounds; and out of these he had picked the best.

One of the peculiar features of the place was in the strange things which wealthy people, who had received benefits from the Doctors, had sent them as presents—gewgaws, and things the most unlikely to be valued by such men, and which shewed more gratitude than judgment in the senders. I was astonished one day to find, in a house-trough, in a lane, a quantity of fine gold fish. On asking the Doctor why they were put there, he replied—"Some silly people had sent them, and he did not know what to do with them. He thought they were as well there as anywhere." Another present, of silver-pheasant fowls, found a better reception. George had them up at a barn above the village, and took great delight in them; and truly they were a most splendid flock of fowls indeed.

But we must draw to a close. Great changes time has made amongst the Whitworth Doctors, as well as amongst other people, since that day.

Old John had a sister married to a great manufacturer, of the name of Madon, at Bacup. A friend of mine once went with James there, to see his sister, and met with a most hospitable reception. He there saw an old woman of 105 years of age. She had lived in the Madon family 90 years, and nursed four generations of them. She had then a young child in her arms, and related to my friend the history of the family into which she had entered at the age of 15. Her wages were then sixpence a-week, which were afterwards raised to one penny a-day. She appeared at this advanced time of life still very cheerful, being allowed to do just as much or as little as she pleased, but still attending to the nursery, and retaining it as her peculiar task to clean an old-fashioned grate which no one else could keep bright enough for her. She had a daughter of her own, about 70, whom she jocularly called the old woman.

But not only has time swept away this patriarchal old nurse, but Dr John, and Dr James, and Mrs George, and one of the younger ones too. I have heard something of the two young men going out shooting, and one accidentally shooting the other; of the younger branches going to study and taking their medical degrees at the University; that one or more still remains at Whitworth; one practises largely, much in the old style, at Oldfield Lane, Manchester; and one is settled at Todmorden. The newspapers, in giving an account of the riots at Todmorden the other day, stated that the house of James Taylor, Esq., a magistrate, and one of the family of the famous Whitworth Doctors, had been entered by the rioters, and his family paintings cut to pieces. Can this be the James of the days of my visit to Whitworth—the slim youth of the old pill-manufacturing hat? If so, it is probable that the portraits of Drs John, and James, and George, of Mrs George, and all the famous Whitworth Doctors, are gone to destruction, beyond the art of their successors, or all the powers of "keen," red-bottle, or black-plaster, to restore them. The rascally rogues of Todmorden rioters! A cotton-mill might have been rebuilt; but who shall return to the world the likeness of honest John Taylor, who made nobles come to him as common men; who clapped the Queen of England on the back; and made, for a believing countryman, one "preatty" good horse of two bad ones? The loss is irreparable; and, perhaps, even this slight reminiscence may be the most palpable record of him remaining.

REMINISCENCES.

THE pleasure that from contemplation springs
Of nature's beauties, doth not quickly die,
But is a living fount of harmony,
To which the goddess Memory often brings

Float over us with joy upon their wings.
Calm as the light which in the summer sky
The placid moon doth round about her cast,
Pure as the thoughts which glisten in the eye
And speak in smiles of artless infancy,
Is the remembrance of a former joy,
Streaming in shapes of beauty o'er the past.

LAKE REMINISCENCES, FROM 1807 TO 1830.

BY THE ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

NO. III.—WILLIAM WORDSWORTH—Continued.

It was at Alfoxton that Miss Mary Hutchinson visited her cousins the Wordsworths; and there, or previously, in the north of England, at Stockton-upon-Tees and Darlington, that the attachment began between Miss Hutchinson and Wordsworth, which terminated in their marriage about the beginning of the present century. The marriage took place in the north; somewhere, I believe, in Yorkshire; and, immediately after the ceremony, Wordsworth brought his bride to Grasmere; in which most lovely of English valleys he had previously obtained, upon a lease of seven or eight years, the cottage in which I found him living at my first visit to him in November 1807. I have heard that there was a paragraph inserted on this occasion in the Morning Post or Courier—and I have an indistinct remembrance of having once seen it myself—which described this event of the poet's marriage in the most ludicrous terms of silly pastoral sentimentality; the cottage being described as "the abode of content and all the virtues," the vale itself in the same puerile slang, and the whole event in a style of allegorical trifling about the muses, &c. The masculine and severe taste of Wordsworth made him peculiarly open to annoyance from such absurd trifling; and, unless his sense of the ludicrous overpowered his graver feelings, he must have been much displeased with the paragraph. But, after all, I have understood that the whole affair was an unseasonable jest of Coleridge's or Lamb's.

To us who, in after years, were Wordsworth's friends, or at least intimate acquaintances—viz., to Professor Wilson and myself—the most interesting circumstance in this marriage, the one which perplexed us exceedingly, was the very possibility that it should ever have been brought to bear. For we could not conceive of Wordsworth as submitting his faculties to the humilities and devotion of courtship. That self-surrender—that prostration of mind, by which a man is too happy and proud to express the profundity of his service to the woman of his heart—it seemed a mere impossibility that ever Wordsworth should be brought to feel for a single instant; and what he did not sincerely feel, assuredly he was not the person to profess. Ah, happy, happy days!—in which, for a young man's heart that is deep and fervid in his affections, and passionate in his admirations, there is but one presence upon earth, one glory, one heaven of hope!—days how fugitive, how incapable of return, how imperishable to the heart of all that a man has lived! Wordsworth, I take it upon myself to say, had not the feelings within him which make this total devotion to a woman possible. There never lived the woman whom he would not have lectured and admonished under circumstances that should have seemed to require it; nor would he have conversed with her in any mood whatever without wearing an air of mild condescension to her understanding. To lie at her feet, to make her his idol, to worship her very caprices, and to adore the most unreasonable of her frowns—these things were impossible to Wordsworth; and, being so, never could he, in any emphatic sense, have been a lover.

A lover, therefore, in any passionate sense of the word, Wordsworth could not have been. And, moreover, it is remarkable that a woman who could dispense with that sort of homage in her suitor, is not of a nature to inspire such a passion. That same meekness which reconciles her to the tone of superiority and freedom in the manner of her suitor, and which may afterwards in a wife become a sweet domestic grace, strips her of that too charming irritation, captivating at once and tormenting, which lurks in feminine pride. If there be an enchantress's spell yet surviving in this age of ours, it is the haughty grace of maidenly pride—the womanly sense of dignity, even when most in excess, and expressed in the language of scorn—which tortures a man and lacerates his heart, at the same time that it pierces him with admiration.

"Oh, what a world of scorn looks beautiful
In the repelling glances of her eye!"

And she who spares a man the agitations of this thralldom, robs him no less of its divinest transports. Wordsworth, however, who never could have laid aside his own nature sufficiently to have played his part in such an impassioned courtship, by suiting himself to this high sexual pride with the humility of a lover—and, perhaps, quite as little have enjoyed the spectacle of such a pride, or have viewed it in any degree as an attraction—it would to him] have been a pure vexation. Looking down even upon the lady of his heart, as upon the rest of the world, from the eminence of his own intellectual superiority—viewing her, in fact, as a child—he would be much more disposed to regard any airs of feminine disdain she might assume, as the impertinence of girlish levity, than as the caprice of womanly pride. He would not, indeed, like Petruchio, have hinted a possibility that he might be provoked to box her ears—for any mode of unmanly roughness would have seemed abominable to his nature, with the meanest of her sex; but much I fear that, in any case of dispute, he would have called even his mistress, "Child! child!" and perhaps even (but this I do not say with the same certainty) might have bid her hold her tongue. Think of that, reader, with such lovers as I am placing in ideal contrast with these!

—image to yourself the haughty beauty, and the majestic wrath, never to be propitiated after hearing such irreverent language—nay, worse than irreverent language—language implying disenchantment! Yet still, it may be said, can a man forget—absolutely and in all moments forget—his intellectual superiority? You yourself, for example, who write these sketches, did it follow of necessity that the woman you loved should be equal (or seem equal in your own eyes) to yourself in intellect? No; far from it. I could not, perhaps, have loved, with a perfect love, any woman whom I had felt to be my own equal intellectually; but then I never thought of her in that light, or under that relation. When the golden gate was opened, when the gate moved upon its golden hinges that opened to me the paradise of her society—when her young, melodious laughter sounded in my too agitated ear—did I think of any claims that I could have? Too happy if I might be permitted to lay all things at her feet, all things that I could call my own, or ever hope to do so—yes, though it had been possible that by power divine I should possess the earth, and the inheritance of the earth—

“The sea, and all which they contain.”

What was intellect, what was power, what was empire, if I had happened to possess them all in excess! These things were not of the nature of, had no common nature with, did not resemble, were no approximation to, the sweet angelic power—power infinite, power deathless, power unutterable, which formed her virgin dowry. O heart, why art thou disquieted? Tempestuous, rebellious heart! oh, wherefore art thou still dreaming of things so long gone by, of expectations that could not be fulfilled, that, being mortal, must, in some point, have a mortal taint! Empty, empty thoughts! vanity of vanities! Yet no; not always; for sometimes, after days of intellectual toil, when half the whole world is dreaming—I wrap my head in the bed-clothes, which hide even the faintest murmurs yet lingering from the fretful day—and then through blinding tears I see again that golden gate; again I stand waiting at the entrance; until dreams come that carry me once more to the Paradise beyond.

“The gaudy, blabbing, and remorseful day;”

If, however, no lover in a proper sense—though from many exquisite passages one might conceive that at some time of his life he was, as especially from the inimitable stanzas beginning—

“When she I lov’d was strong and gay,
And like a rose in June;”

or perhaps (but less powerfully so, because here the passion, though profound, is less the peculiar passion of love) from the impassioned lamentation for “the pretty Barbara,” beginning—

“’Tis said that some have died for love:
And here and there, amidst unhallow’d ground
In the cold north,” &c. &c. :—

yet if no lover, or (which some of us have sometimes thought) a lover disappointed at some earlier period by the death of her he loved, or by some other fatal event, (for he always preserved a mysterious silence on the subject of that “Lucy,” repeatedly alluded to or apostrophized in his poems, and I have heard, from gossiping people about Hawkshead, some snatches of tragical story, which, after all, might be an idle semi-fable, improved out of slight materials)—let this matter have been as it might—at all events he made, what for him turns out, a happy marriage. Few people have lived on such terms of entire harmony and affection as he has lived with the woman of his final choice. Indeed, the sweetness, almost unexampled, of temper, which, in her early and middle years, shed so sunny a radiance over Mrs Wordsworth’s manners, sustained by the happy life she led, the purity of her conscience, and the uniformity of her good health, made it impossible for anybody to have quarreled with her; and whatever fits of ill temper Wordsworth might have—for, with all his philosophy, he had such fits, though rarely—met with no fuel to support them, except in the more irritable temperament of his sister. She was all fire, and an ardour which, like that of the first Lord Shaftesbury, and, as this ardour looked out in every gleam of her wild eyes, (those “wild eyes,” so finely noticed in the “Tintern Abbey”) as it spoke in every word of her self-baffled utterance, as it gave a trembling movement to her very person and demeanour—easily enough it might happen, that any apprehension of an unkind word should with her kindle a dispute. It might have happened; and yet, to the great honour of both, having such impassioned temperaments, rarely it did happen—and this was the more remarkable, as I have been assured that both were, in childhood, irritable or even ill-tempered; and they were constantly together; for Miss Wordsworth was always ready to walk out—wet or dry, storm or sunshine, night or day; whilst Mrs Wordsworth was completely dedicated to her maternal duties, and rarely left the house, unless when the weather was tolerable, or, at least, only for short rambles. I should not have noticed this trait in Wordsworth’s occasional manners, had it been gathered from domestic or confidential opportunities. But, on the contrary, the first two occasions on which, after months’ domestic intercourse with Wordsworth, I first became aware of his possible ill-humour and peevishness, were so public, that others, and those strangers, must have been equally made aware of the scene.

“O’er-inform’d its tenement of clay;”

Having brought down the history of Wordsworth to the time of his marriage, I am reminded by that event to mention the singular good fortune, in all points of worldly prosperity, which has accompanied him through life. His marriage—the capital event of life—was fortunate; so were all the minor occasions of a prosperous life. He has himself described, in his “Leech-Gatherer,” the fears that, at one time, or at least in some occasional moments of his life, haunted him, lest at some period or other he might be reserved for poverty. “Cold, pain, and hunger, and all fleshly ills," occurred to his boding apprehension—

"And mighty poets in their misery dead."

"He thought of Chatterton, the marvellous boy,
The sleepless soul that perished in its pride;
Of him who walked in glory and in joy,
Beside his plough, upon the mountain side."

And, at starting on his career of life, certainly no man had plainer reasons for anticipating the worst evils that have ever persecuted poets, excepting only two reasons which might warrant him in hoping better; and these two were—his great prudence, and the temperance of his daily life. He could not be betrayed into foolish engagements; he could not be betrayed into expensive habits. Profusion and extravagance had no hold over him, by any one passion or taste. He was not luxurious in anything; was not vain or even careful of external appearances—(not at least since he had left Cambridge, and visited a mighty nation in civil convulsions;) was not, even in the article of books, expensive. Very few books sufficed him; he was careless habitually of all the current literature, or indeed of any literature that could not be considered as enshrining the very ideal, capital, and elementary grandeur of the human intellect. It will be seen, further on, that, in this extreme limitation of his literary sensibilities, he was as much assisted by that accident of his own intellectual condition, which the Germans of our days have so usefully brought forward to the consciousness, and by which so many anomalies of opinion are solved—viz., his extreme, intense, unparalleled one-sidedness, (einseitigkeit), as by any peculiar sanity of feeling. Thousands of books, that have given the most genuine and even rapturous delight to millions of ingenuous minds, for Wordsworth were absolutely a dead letter—closed and sealed up from his sensibilities and his powers of appreciation, not less than colours from a blind man's eye. Even the few books which his peculiar mind had made indispensable to him, were not so in the degree which they would have been to a man of more sedentary habits. He lived in the open air; and the enormity of pleasure which both he and his sister drew from the common appearances of nature and their everlasting variety—variety so infinite that, if no one leaf of a tree or shrub, according to Leibnitz's principle, ever exactly resembled another in all its filaments and their arrangement, still less did any one day ever repeat another in all its pleasurable elements—this pleasure was to him in the stead of many libraries—

"One impulse, from a vernal wood,
Could teach him more of Man,
Of moral evil, and of good,
Than all the sages can."

And he, we may be sure, who could draw,

———"even from the meanest flower that blows, Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears;"

to whom the mere daisy, the pansy, the primrose, could furnish pleasures—not the puerile ones which his most puerile and worldly insulters imagined, but pleasures drawn from depths of reverie and meditative tenderness far beyond all power of their hearts to conceive:—that man would hardly need any large variety of books. In fact, there were only two provinces of literature in which Wordsworth could be looked upon as well read—Poetry and Ancient History. Nor do I believe that he would much have lamented, on his own account, if all books had perished, excepting the entire body of English poetry, and, perhaps, "Plutarch's" Lives."

With these simple or rather austere tastes, Wordsworth (it might seem) had little reason to fear poverty—certainly not with any moderate income; but meantime he had none. About the time when he left college, I have good grounds for believing that his whole regular income was precisely = 0. Some fragments must have survived from the funds devoted to his education; and with these, no doubt, he supported the expenses of his continental tours, and his year's residence in France. But, at length, cold, pain, and hunger, and "all fleshly ills," must have stared him in the face pretty earnestly. And hope of longer evading an unpleasant destiny of daily toil in some form or other there seemed absolutely none.

"For," as he himself expostulates with himself—

"For how can he expect that others should Sow for him, build for him, and, at his call,
Love him, who for himself will take no thought at all?"

In this dilemma he had all but resolved, as Miss Wordsworth once told me, to take pupils; and perhaps that, though odious enough, was the sole resource he had; for, with all his immeasurable genius, Wordsworth has not, even yet, and from long experience, acquired any popular talent of writing for the current press; and, at that period of his life, he was gloomily unfitted for bending to such a yoke. In this crisis of his fate, possibly it might be—a fact which a mere accident once caused Miss Wordsworth to mention to me, in a whispering tone, and (as if ashamed of it) she never recurred to it—that Wordsworth, for once, and once only, became a martyr to some nervous affection. That raised pity; but I could not forbear smiling at the remedy, or palliation, which his few friends adopted. Every night they played at cards with him, as the best mode of beguiling his sense of distress, whatever it might be; cards, which, in any part of the thirty and one years since I have known Wordsworth, could have had as little power to interest him, or to cheat him of sorrow, as marbles or a kite—(Scotica, a dragon!) However, so it was; for my information could not be questioned.

The crisis, as I have said, had arrived for determining the future colour of his life. Memorable it is, that exactly in those critical moments when some decisive step had first become necessary, there happened the first instance of Words-

* I do not mean to insinuate that Wordsworth was at all in the dark about the inaccuracy and want of authentic weight attaching to Plutarch as an historian; but his business with Plutarch was not for purposes of research: he was satisfied with his fine moral effects.

worth's good luck ; and equally memorable that, at measured intervals throughout the long sequel of his life since then, a regular succession of similar but superior God-sends have fallen in, to sustain his expenditure, duly as it grew with the growing claims upon his purse. A more fortunate man, I believe, does not exist than Wordsworth. The aid which now dropped from heaven, as it were, to enable him to range at will in paths of his own choosing, and

" Finally array

His temples with the muses' diadem," came in the shape of a bequest from Raisley Calvert, a young man of good family in Cumberland, who died about this time of pulmonary consumption. A very remarkable young man he must have been, this Raisley Calvert, to have discerned, at this early period, that future superiority in Wordsworth which so few people suspected. He was the brother of a Cumberland gentlemen, whom I have seen ; a generous man, doubtless ; for he made no sort of objections (though legally, I have heard, he might) to his brother's farewell memorial of regard ; a good man to all his dependents, as I have generally understood, in the neighbourhood of Windy Brow, his mansion, near Keswick ; and, as Southey always said, (who must know better than I could do,) a man of strong natural endowments ; else, as his talk was of oxen, I might have made the mistake of supposing him to be, in heart and soul, what he was in profession—a mere farming country gentleman, whose ambition was chiefly planted upon turning up mighty turnips. The sum left by Raisley Calvert was £900 ; and it was laid out in an annuity. This was the basis of Wordsworth's prosperity in life ; and upon this he has built up, by a series of accessions, in which each step, taken separately for itself, seems perfectly natural, whilst the total result has undoubtedly something wonderful about it, the present goodly edifice of his fortunes. Next in the series, came the present Lord Lonsdale's repayment of his predecessor's debt. Upon that, probably, it was that Wordsworth felt himself entitled to marry. Then, I believe, came some fortune with Miss Hutchinson ; then—that is, fourthly—some worthy uncle of the same lady was pleased to betake himself to a better world, leaving to various nieces, and especially to Mrs Wordsworth, something or other—I forget what, but it was expressed by thousands of pounds. At this moment, Wordsworth's family had begun to increase ; and the worthy old uncle, like everybody else in Wordsworth's case, (I wish I could say the same in my own,) finding his property very clearly " wanted," and, as people would tell him, " bespoke," felt how very indelicate it would look for him to stay any longer ; and so off he moved. But Wordsworth's family, and the wants of that family, still continued to increase ; and the next person—viz., the fifth—who stood in the way, and must, therefore, have considered himself rapidly growing into a nuisance, was the Stamp-Distributor for the county of Westmoreland. About March 1814, I think it was, that his very comfortable situation was wanted. Probably it took a month for the news to reach him ; because in April, and not before, feeling that he had received a proper notice to quit, he, good man, this stamp distributor, like all the rest, distributed himself and his office into two different places—the latter falling, of course, into the hands of Wordsworth.

This office, which it was Wordsworth's pleasure to speak of as " a little one," yielded, I believe, somewhere about £500 a year. Gradually, even that, with all former sources of income, became insufficient, which ought not to surprise anybody ; for a son at Oxford, as a gentleman commoner, would spend, at the least, £300 per annum ; and there were other children. Still it is wrong to say that it had become insufficient ; as usual, it had not come to that ; but, on the first symptoms arising that it soon would come to that, somebody, of course, had notice to consider himself a sort of nuisance elect—in this case, it was the distributor of stamps for the county of Cumberland. His district was absurdly large : and what so reasonable as that he should submit to a Polish partition of his profits—no, not Polish ; for, on reflection, such a partition neither was nor could be attempted with regard to an actual incumbent. But then, since people had such consideration for him as not to remodel the office so long as he lived, on the other hand, the least he could do for " people" in return, so as to shew his sense of this consideration, was not to trespass on so much goodness longer than necessary. Accordingly, here, as in all cases before, the Deus ex machina who invariably interfered when any nodus arose in Wordsworth's affairs, such as could be considered vindice dignus, caused the distributor to begone into a region where no stamps are wanted, about the very month, or so, when an additional £400 per annum became desirable. This, or perhaps more, was understood to have been added by the new arrangement, to the Westmoreland distributorship : the small towns of Keswick and Cockermouth, together with the important one of Whitehaven, being severed, under this regulation, from their old dependency, or Cumberland, (to which geographically they belonged,) and transferred to the small territory of rocky Westmoreland, the sum-total of whose inhabitants was, at that time, not much above 50,000 ; of which number, one-third, or nearly so, might be collected into the only important town of Kendal ; but, of the other two-thirds, a larger proportion was a simple agricultural or pastoral population, than anywhere else in England. In Westmoreland, therefore, it may be supposed that the stamp demand could not have been so great, not, perhaps, by three quarters, as in Cumberland ; which, besides having a population of 160,000, had more and larger towns. The result of this new distribution, was something that approached to an equalization of the districts—giving to each, as was said in round terms, a thousand a-year ; but, in more accurate terms, perhaps £900.

Thus I have traced Wordsworth's ascent through its several steps and stages, to what, for his moderate desires and habits so philosophic, may be fairly considered opulence. And it must rejoice every man, who joins in the public homage now rendered to his powers, (and what man is to be found that more or less does not?) to hear, with respect to one so lavishly endowed by nature, that he has not been neglected by fortune; that he has never had the finer edge of his sensibilities dulled by the sad anxieties, the degrading fears, the miserable dependencies of debt; that he has been blessed with competency even when poorest; has had hope and cheerful prospects in reversion, through every stage of his life; that at all times he has been liberated from reasonable anxieties about the final interests of his children; that at all times he has been blessed with leisure, the very amplest that ever man enjoyed, for intellectual pursuits the most delightful; yes, that even for those delicate and coy pursuits, he has possessed, in combination, all the conditions for their most perfect culture—the leisure, the ease, the solitude, the society, the domestic peace, the local scenery—Paradise for his eye, in Miltonic beauty, lying outside his windows, Paradise for his heart, in the perpetual happiness of his own fire-side; and, finally, when increasing years might be supposed to demand something more of modern luxuries, and expanding intercourse with society in its most polished forms, something more of refined elegancies, that his means, still keeping pace, in almost arithmetical ratio, with his wants, had shed the graces of art upon the failing powers of nature, had stripped infirmity of discomfort, and (so far as the necessities of things will allow) had placed the final stages of life, by means of many compensations, by universal praise, by plaudits reverberated from senates, benedictions wherever his poems have penetrated, honour, troops of friends—in short, by all that miraculous prosperity can do to evade the primal decrees of nature—had placed the final stages upon a level with the first. This report of Wordsworth's success in life, will rejoice thousands of hearts. And a good nature will sympathize with that joy, will exult in that exultation, no matter for any private grievances, and with a non obstante to any wrong, however stinging, which it may suppose itself to have suffered. Yet, William Wordsworth, nevertheless, if you ever allowed yourself to forget the human tenure of these mighty blessings—if, though wearing your honours justly—most justly, as respects A. and B., this man and that man—you have forgotten that no man can challenge such trophies by any absolute or meritorious title, as respects the dark powers which give and take away—if, in the blind spirit of presumption, you have insulted the less prosperous fortunes of a brother, frail, indeed, but not dishonourably frail, and in his very frailty—that is, in his failing exertions—and for the deficient measure of his energies, (doubtless too much below the standard of reasonable expectations,) able to plead that which you never cared to ask—then, if (instead of being 68 years old) you were $\frac{3}{4}$, I should warn you to listen for the steps of Nemesis approaching from afar; and, were it only in relation to your own extremity of good fortune, I would say, in the case of your being a young man, lavish as she may have been hitherto, and for years to come may still be—“Yet fear her, O thou minion of her pleasure!

Her audit, though delay'd, answered must be,
And her quietus is—to render thee.”⁶

But now, reverting to the subject of Wordsworth's prosperity, I have numbered up six separate stages of good luck—six instances of pecuniary showers emptying themselves into his very bosom, at the very moments when they began to be needed, on the first symptoms that they might be wanted—accesses of fortune stationed, upon his road, like repeating frigates, connecting, to all appearance, some preconcerted line of operations; and, amidst the tumults of chance, wearing as much the air of purpose and design, as if they supported a human plan—so much the more, also, to a thoughtful observer, as the subject of this overflowing favour from the blind goddess, happened, by the rarest of accidents, to be that man whom many of us would have declared the most worthy of that favour, most of us, perhaps, as in the case of Themistocles, would have declared, at the very least, second best. I have come down to the sixth case. Whether there were any seventh, I do not know: but confident I feel, that, had a seventh been required by circumstances, a seventh would have happened. At the same time, every reader will, of course, understand me to mean, that not only was it utterly out of the power or will of Wordsworth to exert any, the very slightest influence upon these cases, not only was this impossible—not only was it impossible to the moral nature of Wordsworth, that he should even express that sort of interest in the event, which is sometimes intimated to the incumbents of a place or church-living by sudden inquiries after their health from eager expectants—but also, in every one of the instances recorded, he could have had not the slightest knowledge before-hand of any interest at issue for himself. This explanation I make to forestal the merest possibility of misapprehension. And yet, for all that, so true it is, that still, as Wordsworth needed a place or a fortune, the holder of that place or fortune was immediately served with a summons to surrender it—so certainly was this impressed upon my belief, as one of the blind necessities, making up the prosperity and fixed destiny of Wordsworth, that, for myself—had I happened to know of any peculiar adaptation in an estate or office of mine, to an existing need of Wordsworth's—forthwith, and with the speed of a man running for his life, I would have laid it down at his feet. “Take it,” I would have said—“take it—or in three weeks I shall be a dead man.”

⁶ Shakespeare's Sonnets.

Well—let me pause : I think the reader is likely, by this time, to have a slight notion of my notion of Wordsworth's inevitable prosperity—and the sort of liem that he had upon the incomes of other men who happened to stand in his way. The same prosperity attended the other branches of the family, with the single exception of John, the brother who perished in the Abergavenny : and even he was prosperous up to the moment of his fatal accident. As to Miss Wordsworth, who will, by some people, be classed amongst the non-prosperous, I rank her amongst the most fortunate of women ; or, at least, if regard be had to that period of life which is most capable of happiness. Her fortune, after its repayment by Lord Lonsdale, was, much of it, confided, with a sisterly affection, to the use of her brother John ; and most of it perished in his ship. How much I never felt myself entitled to ask ; but certainly a part was on that occasion lost irretrievably. Either it was that only a partial insurance had been effected, or else the nature of the accident, being in bome waters, (off the coast of Dorsetshire,) might, by the nature of the contract, have taken the case out of the benefit of the policy. This loss, however, had it even been total, for a single sister amongst a family of flourishing brothers, could not be of any lasting importance. A much larger number of voices would proclaim her to have been unfortunate in life, because she made no marriage connexion ; and certainly the insipid as well as unfeeling ridicule which descends so plentifully from vulgar minds, upon those women who, perhaps from strength of character, have refused to make such a connexion where it promised little of elevated happiness, does make the state of singleness somewhat of a trial to the patience of many ; and to many the cruelty of this trial has proved a snare for beguiling them of their honourable resolutions. Doubtless the most elevated form, and the most impassioned, of human happiness cannot be had out of marriage. But, as the opportunities are rare in which all the conditions concur for such connexions, how important it is that the dignity of noble-minded (and, in the lowest case, of firm-minded) women, should be upheld by society in the honourable election they make of a self-dependent state of virgin seclusion, by preference to a heartless marriage ! Such women, as Mrs Trollope justly remarks, fill a place in society which, in their default, could not be supplied, and are disposable for duties requiring a tenderness and a punctuality that could not be hoped from women preoccupied with household or maternal claims. In another point, Mrs Trollope is right : few women live unmarried from necessity—few indeed. Miss Wordsworth, to my knowledge, had several offers—amongst them, one from Hazlitt ; all, without a moment's hesitation, she rejected decisively. And she did right. A happier life, by far, was hers in youth, coming, as near as difference of scenery and difference of relations would permit, to that which was promised to Ruth—the Ruth of her brother's* creation—by the youth who came from Georgia's shore ; for, though not upon American savannahs, or Canadian lakes—

“ With all their fairy crowds
Of islands, that together lie
As quietly as spots of sky
Amongst the evening clouds”—

yet—amongst the loveliest scenes of sylvan England, and (at intervals) of sylvan Germany—amongst lakes, too, far better fitted to give the sense of their own character than the inland seas of America, and amongst mountains as romantic and loftier than many of the chief ranges in that country—her time fled away like some golden age, or like the life of primeval man ; and she, like Ruth, was for years allowed “ To run, though not a bride,

A sylvan huntress, by the side” of him to whom, like Ruth, she had dedicated her days ; and to whose children, afterwards, she dedicated a love like that of mothers. Dear Miss Wordsworth ! How noble a creature did she seem when I first knew her !—and when, on the very first night which I passed in her brother's company, he read to me, in illustration of something he was saying, a passage from Fairfax's Tasso, ending pretty nearly with these words—

“ Amidst the broad fields and the endless wood
The lofty lady kept her maidenhood”—

I thought that, possibly, he had his sister in his thoughts. Yet “lofty” was hardly the right word. Miss Wordsworth was too ardent and fiery a creature to maintain the reserve essential to dignity ; and dignity was the last thing one thought of in the presence of one so artless, so fervent in her feelings, and so embarrassed in their utterance—sometimes, also, in the attempt to check them. It must not, however, be supposed that there was any silliness or weakness of enthusiasm about her. She was under the continual restraint of severe good sense, though liberated from that false shame which, in so many persons, accompanies all expressions of natural emotion ; and she had too long enjoyed the ennobling conversation of her brother, and his admirable comments on the daily reading which they pursued in common, to fail in any essential point of logic or propriety of thought. Accordingly, her letters, though the most careless and unelaborate—nay, the most hurried that can be imagined—are models of good sense and just feeling. In short, beyond any person I have known in this world, Miss Wordsworth was the creature of impulse ; but, as a woman most thoroughly virtuous and well-principled, as one who could not fail to be kept right by her own excellent heart, and as an intellectual creature from her cradle, with much of her illustrious brother's peculiarity of mind—finally, as one who had been, in effect, educated and trained by that very brother—she won the sympathy and the respectful regard of every man worthy to approach her. All of us loved her—by which us I mean especially Professor Wilson and myself, together with such Oxford or Cambridge men, or men from Scotland, as either of us or as others introduced to her society. And many a time, when the Professor and myself—travelling together in solitary places, sleeping in the same bedroom, or (according to accidents of wayfaring life) in the same bed—have fallen into the most confidential interchange of opinions upon a family in which we had both so common and so profound an interest, whatever matter of anger or complaint we might find or fancy in others, Miss Wordsworth's was a name privileged from censure; or, if a smile were bestowed upon some eccentricity or innocent foible, it was with the tenderness that we should have shewn to a sister. Properly, and in a spirit of prophecy, was she named Dorothy; for, as that name apparently predestines her who bears it to figure rather in the character of aunt than of mother, (insomuch, that I have rarely happened to hear this name, except, indeed, in Germany, without the prefix of aunt,) so, also, in its Greek meaning,* gift of God, well did this name prefigure the relation in which she stood to Wordsworth, the mission with which she was charged—to wait upon him as the tenderest and most faithful of domestics; to love him as a sister; to sympathize with him as a confidante; to counsel him as one gifted with a power of judging that stretched as far as his own for producing; to cheer him and sustain him by the natural expression of her feelings—so quick, so ardent, so unaffected—upon the probable effect of whatever thoughts, plans, images he might conceive; finally, and above all other ministrations, to ingraft, by her sexual sense of beauty, upon his masculine austerity that delicacy and those graces which else (according to the grateful acknowledgments of his own maturest retrospect) it would not have had.

* “The Ruth of her brother's creation :”—so I express it ; because so much in the developement of the story and situations necessarily belongs to the poet. Else, for the mere outline of the story, it was founded upon fact : Wordsworth himself told me, in general terms, that the case which suggested the poem, was that of an American lady whose husband forsook her at the very place of embarkation from England, under circumstances and under expectations, upon her part, very much the same as those of Ruth. I am afraid, however, that the husband was an attorney.

"The blessing of my later years

Was with me when I was a boy:
She gave me hopes, she gave me fears,
A heart the fountain of sweet tears,

And love, and thought, and joy."

And elsewhere he describes her, in a philosophic poem, still in M.S., as one who planted flowers and blossoms with her feminine hand upon what might else have been an arid rock—massy, indeed, and grand, but repulsive, from the severity of its features. I may sum up in one brief abstract the sum total of Miss Wordsworth's

* Of course, therefore, it is essentially the same name as Theodora—the same elements being only differently arranged. Yet how opposite is the impression upon the mind! and chiefly, I suppose, from the too prominent effect of this name in the case of Justinian's scandalous wife.

character, as a companion, by saying, that she was the very wildest (in the sense of the most natural) person I have ever known; and also the truest, most inevitable, and, at the same time, the quickest and readiest in her sympathy with either joy or sorrow, with laughter or with tears, with the realities of life or the larger realities of the poets! Meantime, amidst all this fascinating furniture of her mind, won from nature, from solitude, from enlightened companionship, Miss Wordsworth was as thoroughly deficient (some would say painfully deficient—I say charmingly deficient) in ordinary female accomplishments, as "Cousin Mary" in Miss Mitford's delightful sketch. French she might have barely enough to read a plain modern page of narrative; Italian, I question whether any; German, just enough to insult the German literati, by shewing how little she had found them or their writings necessary to her heart. The "Luise" of Voss, the "Hermann und Dorothea" of Goethe, she had begun to translate, as young ladies do "Telemaque;" but, like them, had chiefly cultivated the first two pages: with the third, she had a slender acquaintance, and with the fourth, she meditated an intimacy at some future day. Music, in her solitary and out-of-doors life, she could have little reason for cultivating; nor is it possible that any woman can draw the enormous energy requisite for this attainment upon a modern scale of perfection out of any other principle than that of vanity (at least of great value for social applause) or of deep musical sensibility; neither of which belonged to Miss Wordsworth's constitution of mind. But, as everybody agrees in our days to think this accomplishment of no value whatever, and, in fact, unproduceable, unless in an exquisite state of culture, no complaint could be made on that score, nor any surprise felt. But the case in which the irregularity of Miss Wordsworth's education did astonish one, was in that part which respected her literary knowledge. In whatever she read, or neglected to read, she had obeyed the single impulses of her own heart; where that led her, there she followed: where that was mute or indifferent, not a thought had she to bestow upon a writer's high reputation, or the call for some acquaintance with his works to meet the demands of society. And thus the strange anomaly arose, of a woman deeply acquainted with some great authors, whose works lie pretty much out of the fashionable beat; able, moreover, in her own person, to produce brilliant effects; able on some subjects to write delightfully, and with the impress of originality upon all she uttered—and yet ignorant of great classical works in her own mother tongue, and careless of literary history, unless where it touched upon some topic of household interest in a degree which at once exiled her from the rank and privileges of blue stockingism. The reader may perhaps have objected silently to the illustration drawn from Miss Mitford, that "Cousin Mary" does not effect her fascinations out of pure negations. Such negations, from the mere startling effect of their oddity in this present age, might fall in with the general current of her attractions; but Cousin Mary's undoubtedly lay in the positive witcheries of a manner and a character, transcending, by force of irresistible nature, (as in a similar case recorded by Wordsworth in "The Excursion,") all the pomp of nature and art united, as seen in ordinary creatures. Now, in Miss Wordsworth, there were certainly no "Cousin-Mary" fascinations of manner and deportment, that snatch a grace beyond the reach of art: there she was indeed painfully deficient; for hurry mars and defeats even the most ordinary expression of the feminine character, its gentleness: abruptness and trepidation leave often a joint impression of what seems for an instant both rudeness and ungracefulness: and the least painful impression was that of unsexual awkwardness;—but the point in which Miss Wordsworth made the most ample amends for all that she wanted of more customary accomplishments, was, this very originality and native freshness of intellect, which settled with so bewitching an effect upon some of her writings, and upon many a sudden remark or ejaculation, extorted by something or other that struck her eye, in the clouds, or in colouring, or in accidents of light and shade, of form, or combination of form. To talk of her "writings" is too pompous an expression, or at least far beyond any pretensions that she ever made for herself. Of poetry she has written little indeed; and that little not, in my opinion, of much merit. The verses published by her brother, and beginning—"Which way does the wind come?" meant only as nursery lines, are certainly wild and pretty; but the other specimen is likely to strike most readers as feeble and trivial in the sentiment. Meantime, the book which is in very deed a monument to her power of catching and expressing all the hidden beauties of natural scenery with a felicity of diction, a truth, and strength, that far transcend Gelpin, or professional writers on those subjects, is her record of a tour in Scotland, made about the year 1802. This book, unless my recollection of it, from a period now gone by for thirty years, has deceived me, is absolutely unique in its class: and, though it never could be very popular, from the minuteness of its details, and the luxuriation of the descriptions, yet I believe no person has ever been favoured with a sight of it that has not regretted that it is not published. Its own extraordinary merit, apart from the interest which now invests the name of Wordsworth, could not fail to procure purchasers for one edition, on its first appearance. Coleridge was of the party at first; but afterwards, under some attack of rheumatism, found or thought it necessary to leave them. Melancholy it would be at this time, thirty-six years and more from the era of that tour, to read it under the afflicting remembrances of all which has been suffered in the interval by two at least out of the three who composed the travelling party; for I fear that Miss Wordsworth has suffered not much less than Coleridge: and, in any general expression of it, from the same cause—viz., an excess of pleasurable excitement and luxurious sensibility, sustained in youth by a constitutional glow from animal causes, but drooping as soon as that was withdrawn. It is painful to point a moral from any story connected with those whom one loves or has loved; painful to look for one moment towards any "improvement" of such a case, especially where there is no reason to tax the parties with any criminal contribution to their own sufferings, except through that relaxation of the will and its potential energies, through which most of us, at some time or other—I myself too deeply and sorrowfully—stand accountable to our own consciences. Not, therefore, with any more intention of speaking in a monitorial or censorial character, than in passing, after dark, through Grasmere churchyard, and trespassing a little to the left, I could be supposed to have the intention of trampling upon the grave of one who lies buried near the pathway, and whom once I loved in extremity, do I here notice a defect in Miss Wordsworth's self-education of something that might have mitigated the sort of suffering which, more or less, ever since the period of her too genial, too radiant youth, I suppose her to have struggled with. I have mentioned the narrow basis on which her literary interests had been made to rest—the exclusive character of her reading, and the utter want of pretension, and of all that looks like blue-stockingism in the style of her habitual conversation and mode of dealing with literature. Now, to me it appears, upon reflection, that it would have been far better had Miss Wordsworth condescended a little to the ordinary mode of pursuing literature; better for her own happiness if she had been a blue-stocking: or, at least, if she had been, in good earnest, a writer for the press, with the pleasant cares and solitudes of one who has some little ventures, as it were, on that vast ocean. We all know with how womanly and serene a temper literature has been pursued by Joanna Baillie, by Miss Mitford, and other women of admirable genius—with how absolutely no sacrifice or loss of feminine dignity they have cultivated the profession of authorship; and, if we could hear their report, I have no doubt that the little cares of correcting proofs, and the forward-looking solitudes connected with the mere business arrangements of new publications, would be numbered amongst the minor pleasures of life; whilst the more elevated cares, connected with the intellectual business of such projects, must inevitably have done much to solace the troubles, which, as human beings, they cannot but have experienced; and even to scatter flowers upon their path. Mrs Johnstone, of Edinburgh, has pursued the profession of literature—the noblest of professions, and the only one open to both sexes alike—with even more assiduity, and as a daily occupation; and, I have every reason to believe, with as much benefit to her own happiness, as to the instruction and amusement of her readers: for the petty cares of authorship are agreeable, and its serious cares are ennobling. More especially is such an occupation useful to a woman without children, and without any prospective resources ; resources in objects that involve hopes growing and unfulfilled. It is too much to expect of any woman (or man either) that her mind should support itself in a pleasurable activity, under the drooping energies of life, by resting on the past or on the present : some interest in reversion, some subject of hope from day to day, must be called in to reinforce the animal fountains of good spirits. Had that been opened for Miss Wordsworth, I am satisfied that she would have passed a more cheerful middle-age, and would not, at any period, have yielded to that nervous depression which, I grieve to hear, has clouded her latter days. Nephews and nieces, whilst young and innocent, are as good almost as sons and daughters to a fervid and loving heart that has carried them in her arms from the hour they were born. But, after a nephew has grown into a huge hulk of a man, six feet high, and as stout as a bullock ; after he has come to have children of his own, lives at a distance, and finds occasion to talk chiefly of oxen and turnips—no offence to him—he ceases to be an object of any very profound sentiment. There is nothing in such a subject to rouse the flagging pulses of the heart, and to sustain a fervid spirit, to whom, at the very best, human life offers little of an adequate or sufficing interest, unless when idealized by the magic of the mighty poets. Farewell, Miss Wordsworth ! farewell, impassioned Dorothy ! I have not seen you for many a day—shall never see you again perhaps ; but shall attend your steps with tender thoughts, so long as I hear of you living : so will Professor Wilson ; and, from two hearts at least, that loved and admired you in your fervid prime, it may sometimes cheer the gloom of your depression to be assured of never-failing remembrance, full of love and respectful pity.

Here ceases my record of the life and its main incidents, so far as they are known to me, of William Wordsworth ; to which, on account of the important services which she has rendered him ; on account of the separate interest which, apart from those services, belongs to her own mind and character ; on account of the singular counterpart which in some features they offer to those of her brother ; and, on account of the impressive coincidence and parallelism in this remarkable dedication of Dorothy to William Wordsworth, with that of Mary to Charles Lamb—I have thought that it would be a proper complement of the whole record, to subjoin a very especial notice of his sister. Miss Wordsworth would have merited a separate notice in any biographical dictionary of our times, had there even been no William Wordsworth in existence.

I have traced the history of each until the time when I became personally acquainted with them ; and, henceforwards, anything which it may be interesting to know with respect to either, will naturally come forward, not in a separate narrative, but in connexion with my own life ; for, in the following year, I became myself the tenant of that pretty cottage in which I found them ; and from that time, for many years, my life flowed on in daily union with theirs.

THE GRAVE OF LOVE.

AWAY, dim twilight !—O thou star,
Lead all thy host to mourn !
Each eyeing, from his radiant car,
Pale Beauty o'er the urn.

Oh, he is gone !—the pallid flower
Is waving o'er his head,
Wet with a maiden's heart-wrung shower,
Low bending o'er his bed.

The soft breeze wafts the waving hair
Back from her dewy cheek ;
Her marbled hands are pressing there—
In wo she dare not speak.

Those ringlets on her bosom's swell
Have found a troubled pillow,
As when the night-wind breathes its spell
Low moaning o'er the willow.

The star-beams pour their fitful light
Full on her lofty brow ;
Where grief, amid its struggling might,
Has shed a hallowed glow.

Hark ! as the swelling of the breeze,
Love-laden, hurrying on,
Dies in low plaintive melodies—
Was it a mortal tone ?

Alas ! the leaf is red and sore,
And the hills in silence brood,
When winter, stealing on the year,
Sighs forth a low prelude.

Who now will shield thee, gentle one ?
Whose smiling look will cheer ?
Whose love, like the unfading sun,
Shall awe the world's cold sneer ?

Whose quivering lip and downcast eye,
Amid the stranger's hall,
Will glance in voiceless ecstasy,
As flits thy light footfall ?

When cold looks check thine eager eyes,
Oh, then, thou'lt think of him—
Though Love should smile, warm tears will rise—
It would not smile like him.

Oh, let the moaning of the brook,
As for its mountain shrine,
The waving bough, the heaven's sad look,
Blend sympathy with thine.

For thou art like the diadem
That brightens morning's eye ;
But frail as is the fragile stem,
That bends to every sigh.

BLANCHE DELAMERE.

CHAPTER X.

Rosamond's Bower!

THE bright-eyed morning of the still vernal summer wore its fresh dew and innocent beauty, when the carriage of the Lady Blanche Delamere drew up at a small green portal, which broke the high wall over which sweet-scented hawthorn sprays and blooms, and the gorgeous flowers of the horse-chestnut, were shedding a luxuriance of floral loveliness. It had cost the servants some trouble to discover the sequestered residence by any address that Blanche or her governess could imagine as appropriate to "the lady living under the protection of Mr Devereux." She could not be known as Mrs Devereux—nor, the mother of a family of children, as Miss Weston. In fact, the inmate of the pretty detached cottage, in former days playfully named, by Mr Devereux, "Rosamond's Bower," and known in his family as "Frederick's country seat," went by the most common and convenient of all names—that of "Mrs Smith." From the narrow precincts of her domain, of an acre and a half, or thereabouts, laid out in flower-beds, orchard, and lawn, the prying eyes of the curious and vulgar were as jealously excluded as if the cottage had been an aristocratic mansion, embosomed amidst "the pomp of groves and garniture of fields," in the lordly park of the Fanfaronades, over whose high walls even the prying eyes of the bagman, on the top of the fast coach, could hardly catch a passing glimpse, though straining his neck like a crane, that he might have the pleasure of telling, ever after, at dinner, how he had seen Lord F.'s "cha'ming place." 'Tis the worshippers make the idol.

The sudden opening of the green door in the bowery lane revealed a fairy scene, as the fairydom of gentility is imagined in England—a cottage, of the order picturesque, ornamented with French lattices and a verandah, and embosomed, or rather matted and mosaicked, by roses and honeysuckles, passion-flowers, fuschias, myrtles, and clematis—the latter disporting their vagrant fancies in a luxuriant entanglement of blossom and foliage. The bright, fresh turf of the trim, span-breadth lawn, was embroidered with violets, and primroses, and the wild blue hyacinth; and the folding glass door of the hall, thrown open beyond it, shewed, in tasteful confusion, skin mats, rustic seats, and baskets, and stands with plants in flower; with a few stuffed birds and animals, and fishing-rods and fowling-pieces, along up with garden rakes fit for a lady's hand. But the principal ornament of the saloon, was a large and handsome Newfoundland dog, stretched across the threshold, and basking sleepily in the morning sun, while a lovely little girl strewed his glossy, ebon coat with flowers from the stores in her lap. Her brother had been attracted from her side by the appearance of the ladies, whom the maid-servant now admitted with the fuss and bustle consequent on that wonderful phenomenon, the appearance of female visitors in a place where nothing that could, by any stretch of politeness, be called a lady, ever had appeared—save the poor sempstress who lost some of her best and most virtuous customers by making frocks and bonnets for Mrs Smith's children.

"How sweet a spot!" whispered Blanche to her friend—"how pure, and peaceful, and homelike!" She stooped to pat the child and the dog—the one giving her welcome by bright smiles—the other with a benevolent growl, and wag of his tail. "Were this indeed poor Rosamond's home—these her children—which yet are her children—how delightful our visit—how pleasant to renew early friendship—how gracious a continued intercourse with one amiable and affectionate—the mother—the wife—surrounded by all the sweets of home and family—and oh! more than all, enjoying the security, the self-approval, wanting which all else is without value, if not the source of remorse and unappeasable anguish! How dreadful for an affectionate-hearted woman to have placed herself in a condition in which she must be compelled to wish her children unborn or buried!"

The ladies were meanwhile ushered into a light and airy morning room, in which breakfast was set out. The sunbeams were dancing through the clustering foliage of the lattice upon its gay chintz furniture, and brilliant paper hangings, and airy draperies, and its few choice cabinet pictures, and well-stored Lilliputian bookcases. The whole scene, and every comfortable or elegant accessory, were so thoroughly domestic, yet so cheerful and happy—that Blanche, addressing the little girl who toddled after her, for a moment forgot her errand, and where she stood. Her recollection was instantly recalled by a portrait in crayons, which, as the most cherished ornament of the home, hung over the mantel-piece.

"That's papa," said the boy, following her eye. It bore, indeed, a striking resemblance to the alleged head of the household, if head it might ever be said to have. He was, however, the absolute master of the inmates; their sole hope and dependence—by whom and for whom they existed; the lord of their destiny. Other households have claims and rights; legal protection; friends, neighbours, sustaining social sympathy—that strongest bulwark of the security of families, which is bound up with the general weal of society: this little household was thrust beyond its pale. It had been drawn together for the licentious or selfish pleasure of one man—it had existed at his mercy—it was now to be annihilated by his fiat. With such thoughts passing through their minds, the unexpected visitors silently waited the appearance of Molly's "Missis," who, the handmaiden took upon her to assure them, would appear "in a jiffy." As she disappeared, the boy informed the ladies that "mamma was not very well this morning."

"If you are from town, ma'am, perhaps you will see papa. He has not been down for some time. If I could write, I would send him a letter, bidding him come, for mamma is not able to write him now, she says—her headache is so very bad; and she cried so, when I would not let Mary put papa's flute away from mamma's pianoforte."

Twice had the quick ear of Blanche caught a faint rustle, as if a child touched the door-handle, and had then desisted as if afraid to venture in. At a third palpable attempt, the boy threw open the door, and the sad, pale, drooping, and trembling young woman staggered, rather than walked forward, and failed in an incoherent attempt at speech. It was not the innocent, happy, and buoyant Rosamond Weston of past times, though there were many traces of her in the tall emaciated woman, who, still in mourning for her infant, wore a dress somewhat resembling that of the Sisters of Charity. Lady Blanche advanced with a grave expression of sympathy and friendliness; and the Quakeress also advanced, with that air of mild and benign kindness and courtesy, which won all unsophisticated hearts. There was instant though silent mutual recognition.

"I may seem an unpardonable intruder," said Blanche; "but the motive of my visit must plead my apology." The words of the young woman, in reply, were unconnected and unintelligible; her eyes were downcast and brimming with tears; her voice tremulous. The boy pressed to his mother's side, in sympathy with those signs of distress, and took her hand—and the tears overflowed their bed.

"You are the Lady Blanche Delamere," she whispered at last; "and I can guess your errand—yet, for a few moments, spare me." She gasped as if for breath, and her colour went and came. Blanche turned away in compassionate sympathy, and busied herself in opening the lattice to give her freer air.

"You are very ill, dear mamma," said the boy, anxiously pressing his mother's damp hand.

"I will be better soon—go now, Horatio—go, dear boy. Take Eleanor into the garden, Mary, till I call you. I have business with the ladies." The boy had been trained in the obedience of love; and, though very unwilling to leave "poor mamma" and the strangers, about whom he was curious, he never thought of disputing her will. She hastily shut, and even bolted the door, and, rushing towards the Quakeress, threw herself on her knees before her, and gave way to the passion of sorrow and shame which she had struggled to subdue in presence of her infants. No words passed for some time; and Blanche, bending over the weeping Magdalene, kindly and respectfully pressed the thin hand, on whose white attenuated fingers the rings, forgotten by the wearer as by the bestower, though tokens of fond remembrance, if not troth-plights, yet glittered. And now Blanche almost embraced, in gently raising the feeble despairing creature, over whom she leaned, while she whispered—"I am, as you guess, your former playmate, Blanche Delamere—but not here, Rosamond, to give you pain or sorrow—oh, no!" And she led her old companion to an ottoman, and sat down by her. "Since you remember me, and have heard of me, you may also have learned where I am living—whose attentions, and almost courtship, I have, in ignorance, been receiving. I have been in imminent danger of becoming the affianced bride, while another is, or ought to be, the wife of Mr Devereux."

"Softly, dear child!" interposed the Quakeress, alarmed at the impetuosity of her pupil, whose impulses, if always benevolent, were not always, she feared, under the restraint of cool judgment; but Blanche heard her not.

"Your claims, Rosamond, are of older date and of more sacred character than mine."

"Ah, no, no—alas, no!" answered the young woman; "I have no right—no claim—none which law sanctions—none which society allows;—to him alone I looked—to his love for us."

"What! are not your children his—is not this the home which he has given you, and shared with you for so many years?"

"Alas, yes!—my poor innocent children!—I have gathered the apples of Sodom—but, for them remain the ashes. Oh, could I be the only sufferer, I should ask no more!"

It was at last to the benign Quakeress that the unhappy girl was beguiled into confiding her whole story. From her young, rich, beautiful, and—as her still devoted, and, therefore, jealous heart whispered—her triumphant rival, she shrank with mingled shame and apprehension. Her feelings far more refined, and her heart as purely feminine as that of simple Phoebe Waterton, she also attempted no self-justification—permitted no reproach, no complaint, to escape her against the author of her misfortune. There was in her manner and her words, a degree of meek forbearance, of deep humility, which almost chafed the quick and high spirit of Blanche.

She spoke in French to her gouvernante, who perfectly understood, without ever allowing her lips to be polluted by pronouncing one word of that polished language of gallantry and sentiment, compliment and double-entendre.

"One might fancy this poor woman agreed in opinion with the generous world—that her seducer is the injured party, and she the only culprit, because he is about to be slightly whipped by the natural consequences of his pleasant vices—or from having to deal with a person so eccentric, for one in her rank, as my humble self, in her opinions of morality, religious obligation, and social rights—who, knowing it is my highest duty to love my neighbour as myself, cannot think it fit to marry my neighbour's husband."

The flushed cheek of the unhappy girl shewed that she understood the scope of this speech.

"You understand what I have taken the liberty to say," added Blanche, hastily. "Tell me, then, frankly, do you think you have no claims on Mr Devereux? Are your youth, your affection, your womanhood, your honour and happiness, of no value, save the wretched, pecuniary recompense it is at his pleasure either to set upon them or to withhold?"

"Yes, alas!—sometimes, when despair has, for a moment, given way to indignation, and to that natural pity for myself which I may not deserve from the virtuous, I have dared, for a few moments, to think so:—but, oh! no! no! Me he could not now marry, without the disgrace I could never bring upon him, were he even willing to incur it for me. Is it for me—weak, infatuated as I have been, and now justly punished—to come between him and the brilliant fate which may yet be his?"

Blanche was not satisfied.

"Right, indeed, it must be," she said, in a tone of asperity, "that men decree that what in them is a jest—an amiable weakness, a venial trespass of youth—should on their frail partners, be visited with social proscription, ruin, misery, irreparable degradation and infamy, since women themselves can vindicate the opinions and rules which their masters establish for their own benefit, or to secure indemnity for their most cruel injustice."

"It is not for me, who have for ever forfeited the world's good opinion, to brave it now," sighed the afflicted woman. "The poor children, of whom he seemed so fond—save for them, I am resigned to everything. Mine, in my happiest moments, when Devereux loved me well, has ever been a troubled joy."

"Loved you!" exclaimed Blanche, scornfully. "Durst this man so profane the attribute by which God Himself chooses to be revealed to his creatures? How false, how shameless a mockery!—Loved you! while his every act degraded you in the eyes of your fellow-creatures and in your own. Thus the wolf loves the lamb, which he tears to glut himself with its tender flesh; thus the vermin loves the fruit in whose bosom it riots till it become wasted and loathsome."

She felt that she had spoken too strongly; and, considering the delicate situation and sensitive feelings of the unhappy object of her indignant pity, perhaps harshly; and endeavoured to soften the expression of her opinion, by adding—

"I do perhaps feel too strongly on those points; but it is because the world—even the virtuous part of it—seems so hardened as not to feel at all."

The delicate, but ingenious questioning of the Quakeress could not draw from the unhappy Rosamond that she had ever received any direct promise of marriage from her lover.

"I never demanded one," she said, with tones of pathos which thrilled to the heart of Blanche. "At first, while happy in his love, how could I doubt?—at last, how could I speak?"

It was too true. Mr Devereux spared himself and her on the past, and she never found courage to speak of the future, until the dawning intelligence of her eldest child alternately presented it in uncertainty, or darkness and terror. After 'the birth of that child, with infinite pain and sorrow she made up her mind to separate from the man in whom her soul, with all its affections and hopes, was centred; but Mr Devereux, who had no other serious attachment, and who was not yet tired of his gentle and elegant companion, took alarm at the idea of his Rosa's desertion; and her wise and virtuous resolution was overruled by his remonstrances. The Quakeress considered this unwise submission a very great aggravation of the original error of the unhappy girl, whom she, nevertheless, sincerely pitied; but this severe opinion she suppressed; and, to afford a temporary diversion of feeling to her involuntary hostess, she begged for a cup of coffee, aware that poor Rosamond might feel it presumption, or impertinence, to offer her guests refreshments after their early drive. Breakfast was accordingly served, and slightly partaken—the children again appearing, and prattling to the kind strangers—to the handsome and the good lady—with all the captivating simplicity of their age, while the mother's eyes gushed over, and Blanche gazed pitifully on the lovely Paria family, sprung of English aristocracy. The little girl, Eleanor, what—as she grew up in beauty, and with the refined and sensitive feelings of her sex—were to be her sufferings and mortifications!

"Eleanor is papa's pet," said the little boy, raising to Blanche the candid brow which already said—

"Here, shame is ashamed to sit!"

What were to be his feelings when time revealed to him the ignominy of his birth, and the humiliation and wrongs of her who was now the angel of his life?

When the slight repast was concluded, the party went into the garden for freer air; and, while the children tumbled on the grass plats, or gambolled in the walks, the former conversation was resumed, in that bowery summer-house which, in fine weather, was the usual afternoon haunt of Rose and her protector. Blanche had whispered to her bonne that it would refresh her spirit could poor Rosamond only be roused to one burst of hearty, honest indignation against him; but all she obtained was one fugitive glance of joy, one bright gleam of rapture, when she energetically declared that, between herself and Mr Devereux, every tie was severed—that, whatever the world, or even the law might pronounce, she considered him an unmarriageable man, if an unmarried one; bound by the deepest obligations to his children, and with much to atone for to them, and very much to be forgiven. Tears streamed down the cheeks of Rosamond—a soul-relieving flood. All that she dared wish for was not to be separated from her children just yet, while they were still so very young; while, on the other hand, her judgment whispered, that the sooner the dreaded sacrifice was made, the better for them.

"The law, I believe, Rosamond, cannot deprive you of your children; in that respect you are more happy, as a mother, than women whose rights it protects, as wives. Oh, no! Our masters, the law-makers, seek no power over those unhappy children whose existence only embarrasses them. It leaves children in the sole power of those women who are presumed to be vicious and corrupted, and who certainly are degraded and ruined in the world's esteem, and strips the virtuous married mother of all power over her own offspring! You smile, ma bonne, at my not unusual warmth; but there is something rotten in this our state of Denmark, and why should not I denounce it?"

"Whatever be my wishes or my rights, how can I oppose the decision of Mr Devereux, in disposing of my poor children? On his will they must depend for the very bread they eat, while my watchful care, my yearning love, can only bring blight and shame upon the dearest object of my soul."

"Gracious heavens!" exclaimed Blanche, when again seated in the carriage, "that man's selfish vice and woman's weakness should thus convert the finest and sweetest feelings of a nature, even in its frailty so exquisitely feminine, into scorpions to sting her! What is to be the fate of her little ones? How often have I heard you descant on the many chances against the healthful growth and development of the moral principles and feelings of illegitimate children!"

The mother had not ventured to follow the guests, whose respectful sympathy and parting injunctions that she would take no step and consent to no arrangements until she heard from them, had fallen like healing balm on her crushed and desolate heart; but the joyous children followed to the green door, the boy requesting that papa might be sent down, and the little girl holding up her rosy mouth to be kissed, as, all glee and smiles, she lipied her pretty farewell.

On the homeward drive, the conversation naturally turned on the scene they had witnessed, and the condition of deserted women, with illegitimate offspring. Before they reached home, the bonne quietly inquired of her impetuous pupil what she meant to do? "Need you inquire? My kiss on the lips of that innocent child, is the seal of my covenant that through me no injury or injustice shall ever come to her or her unhappy mother." She was in the drawing-room ere the words were well uttered.

A note, left for Lady Blande, had merely stated that Lady Blanche was to drive into the country a little way with Mrs Thompson, to visit an old friend, but would be back early; and though there was a little wonder at the very independent manner in which the young lady often acted, and some doubtful augury at this capricious and ill-bred breach of a formal appointment, with a lover all but vowed, it was quietly set down to Lady Blanche's way; and her friend, embracing her, sportively exclaimed—"Ah, run-away! give an account of yourself directly. Here has Horatio been twice—and will soon be a third time—most lorn and lover-like, that you should choose to absent yourself on this particular morning. I set it down in my own mind to the true cause—dear caprice—vagrant virgin fancies; but would not so far impeach my late order as to own as much to him. But seriously, Blanche, why do you look so very grave? Where have you been?"

"I have been where I presume you never were, Eleanor—though there is much to be seen to interest your feelings—I have been to Streatham, and, farther, to visit the family of your brother, Mr Devereux."

Lady Blande coloured violently, and, with all her tact and use, became confused and at a loss what to reply to so blunt and home a thrust; but the thought was quick—this must be some wild flight of romantic generosity, indulged by a young lady who entertained very extravagant notions on many subjects, and especially on what she was pleased to consider her duties, and who, no doubt, having unfortunately heard of their existence, must have been seized with the crotchet of some imaginary duty, obliging her to adopt and educate the children of the man whom she was about to make the master of her fate.

"I do not affect, with your keen perception, to misunderstand you, my love; yet you astonish me. There was, I have understood—for you know little birds will sometimes whisper naughty tales, which ladies should not hear:—there was, ages ago, some vain and silly girl, and some boyish entanglement, which Horatio, who is the very fool of women's tears, found it difficult to get handsomely rid of, until his solicitors cut the gordian knot, in the ordinary manner, with a golden scythe. I understood there was a child or children, which made the matter much more unpleasant to my brother; but, on my honour, it is all over ages ago. You cannot imagine that I would sanction the attentions of my brother, dear to me as he is, to my guest and dearest friend, with the knowledge that any entanglement of this sort existed."

Blanche made no reply.

"I understand from Blande—for, of course, I cannot discuss such points with Devereux—that the young woman, who was quiet in her ways, and rather respectably conducted, is most grateful for his generosity to the children. But I am surprised, Blanche, you are not more shocked though much worse things are quite the order of the day among our lords and masters, and, I suppose, always will be. But come, tell me your adventures, dearest—make me your confidant—your only one—for I own that I am stricken dumb. I know that you possess that noble and magnanimous way of thinking which Devereux so fervently adores; yet, I confess, to visit these little wretches, would, in similar circumstances, have been too much for me. I might have hated the precursors of my own children; but, Devereux swears, magnanimity is the brilliant peculiar virtue of Blanche Delamere. I must, however, as an elder sister, assume the privilege of experience and knowledge of the world, caution you against either committing or encumbering yourself with the brats. The Counts will, assuredly, not take such liberal views as her generous grandchild. Even mamma, though she adores Horatio, may take to the high ropes on the question of the decorous, if not of the right; nor need Horatio himself know the length your warm and generous feelings have carried you. All men, my dear Blanche, are more or less conceited. I must candidly warn the inexperience of my friend against my own brother. They are all apt to misconstrue our motives, and to resent interference with what they consider their especial or exclusive concerns; and, besides, no one has more refined—I may say more fastidiously absurd—notions about female proprieties than Devereux.—But hush!—is not that his voice? The woman and the children are entirely in the hands of the men of business; Horatio, I imagine, concludes they have long since left the country; and that is all as it should be."

During this long and hurried speech, Blanche had kept her eye steadily and gravely fixed upon the flattered speaker. At its conclusion, she silently turned away her eyes with a calm and stern expression, which, to those who could read her character, said—"Why expostulate with this woman? I never could make her understand me. Her worldly opinions and their hollow foundations I can comprehend; she cannot fathom mine."

Lady Blande, as the expected gentleman did not immediately appear, again resumed:—"Did Mrs Thompson learn why the creatures are not gone abroad, or to Wales, or Scotland, or somewhere—for I am certain Devereux not only wishes but believes it?"

"One reason of delay may be the very delicate health of the mother," replied Blanche. "She has had fever, and seems to me still hovering between life and death. Your Ladyship cannot be aware that Rosamond Weston was the loved and admired playmate of my childhood."

Lady Blande started, without any affectation.

"Such as I can remember her, lovely and spotless, kindly and amiable, must not I, with my whole heart, abhor the selfish being, calling himself man, who could steal the treasure of her young affections, and use his power over her devoted heart only to rob her of her innocence, to humble her maiden pride, and, finally, cast her forth to shame and sorrow."

"You talk with strange inconsiderateness, my dearest Blanche," whispered the lady. "Pardon me for saying so; and, for heaven's sake! for my sake! be silent, until we have more leisure to confer. This girl your friend!—and you are much excited. Had you not better retire, love. It is not from your lips surely, with your lofty ideas of maidenly purity and womanly dignity, that we are to hear an apology for an ill-conducted woman?"

Lady Blanche coloured with indignation, but she made no motion to retire; and Mr Devereux and his brother-in-law entered the drawing-room—the latter playfully questioning Blanche about her stolen march, though unable by his jocularity to move her ominous gravity.

"I betted that you had gone to Hanwell, to study mad people in a philosophical way," said the jocular peer.

"Needed I have gone so far?" replied Blanche, coldly.

"Or else to the Friends' Meeting, in the expectation of some outpouring; or, perhaps, to the Penitentiary."

"You were nearer the mark there," replied Blanche.

"But why not carry Devereux along with you? The poor fellow has been fluttering about all the morning like a hen whose ducklings have taken the water."

The jest, such as it was, told on no one. Blanche rose, with an air of grave dignity; and, fixing her eyes steadily upon Devereux, said—

"I promised you an interview this morning, Mr Devereux, on a subject of the highest importance to both of us; but a higher duty called me to Streatham.—Nay, hear me! I have breakfasted, along with my friend Mrs Thompson, at your late residence there, with your lovely and amiable children, and their unhappy mother—once my own innocent and beloved Rosa Weston—that erring and culpable, but deeply injured, friendless, and helpless creature, whose greatest weakness has been forgetfulness of her own honour and happiness, from blind, unmeasured confidence in your honour and tenderness, and excess of infatuated attachment to the man—not to his rank nor to his fortune. Her years exceed mine but by some few; and, with a woman's warmest feelings, she is invested with the sacred character of a mother. But it is not my province, nor yet my inclination, to lecture or dictate to you, Mr Devereux. In many of our late conversations, your opinions on such topics seemed to be more just than those too generally acted upon by men—even when they are proclaimed in words. But let that pass. I have only to consult my own honour and happiness, and to follow the clear dictates of my principles, as a Christian woman—softened, it may be, in this instance, by my feelings, as a partaker of the same frail nature with that poor girl whose condition fills me with grief—the more profound, that her case, as the world views it, is beyond all help of womanly sympathy. I cannot restore Rosamond to innocence, and to the ever-grateful esteem of her fellow-creatures; but, while I protect myself, I can and will mark my indignant sense of the selfish and cruel system of which she is the victim. I need scarce, therefore, tell you, that we meet no more; and that, in Mr Devereux, I can henceforth only know either the husband, or the seducer of Rosamond Weston."

Before the petrified gentleman addressed could gain breath to attempt reply, she had walked out of the room in "unblenched majesty." Devereux turned his eyes on his sister, who looked the image of vexation, and of irritation with difficulty suppressed. Lord Blande first found his voice—

"What means all this, Eleanor? What prying, officious devil has put this heroic damsel on the scent of your little Rose, Devereux? It is a deuced unlucky contre-temps, to be sure! I fancied Mrs Smith and her babes in the Isle of Man, or some such asylum for love-families, long ago. Are you dumfounded, good folks?"

"Nothing was ever so provoking," exclaimed Lady Blande. "It must have been that busy, intriguing Quakeress: a very Maintenon she is, in her love of power and cool cunning." Mr Devereux was walking across the room with hasty steps.

"A cool thing enough in the young lady!" continued Lord Blande. "Conceive her audacity! A jealous, furious wife could not have done more than stormed poor Rose's retreat; and have put her to the question in the grand moral and philosophical style. It absolutely beats fiction. Have you lost your voice, Devereux?"

"You surely have your usual fine tact, Blande," cried his vexed and angry lady. "What is to be done, Horatio? Blanche is so strange, so singular a creature, that common rules, as I have often told you, do not apply to her. That odious Quaker woman, with her precise, puritanic notions, ferreting out that worthless girl, has done it all. No one else would, could, or durst have presumed to carry to Blanche such unwelcome tales of the man to whom, I may say, she was all but married; but I must follow her, and make the best of it."

"A thousand thanks, Eleanor!" exclaimed the brother. "From your admirable tact—your true sisterly kindness—I reckon on everything. —Yet what accursed meddling fiend can have done all this! Durst Rosamond complain?" And he knitted his brows in pale anger.

"Use your own wits, also, Horatio. I assure you, you will have need of them all in this emergency. Generosity—magnanimity—romance—these are your cue."

When Lady Blande, having tapped, found admission into the dressing-room of her guest, she found Blanche already unshawled and unbbonneted, and busy writing; while near her, Mrs Thompson, at whom her Ladyship looked scorpions and basilisks, was quietly pursuing her perpetual fine needle-work. She offered apologies for intrusion, and looked as if she wished the matronly friend away; who, understanding her meaning, and rather desirous to leave her pupil to entire self-reliance and self-guidance in this delicate crisis, quietly disappeared.

The clew which Lady Blande possessed to the feelings of Blanche at this time, was necessarily as imperfect as her knowledge of the rare character of her guest. She concluded that the proud and lofty-minded heiress might be, even more than the ordinary run of young ladies, shocked, jealous, offended, affronted; and she was ready to make every concession to feelings so natural, as she said, and so proper. She accordingly condemned, in good-set general terms, the usages of the wicked world, and the weakness and wickedness of women, to which Mr Devereux had fallen a prey; but she also, in his behalf, pleaded, remonstrated, appealed to, and touched every passion, and every shade of feeling in the female gamut, so far as she could sound it, from the bottom to the top of the scale—from the maddening despair of the lover, to the dread laugh of May Fair.

It was in vain.

"Would you, Lady Blande, in plain terms," Blanche demanded steadily, "have me marry either the husband or the seducer of Rosamond Weston?—that is the true and narrow question on which you have, pardon me, wasted much needless eloquence."

"Nay, pardon me, dearest Blanche," replied Lady Blande, exercising that strong control over her feelings which proved that the passions of quick-tempered ladies are often more in their own power than they are sometimes willing to acknowledge. "You wrong your excellent understanding when you talk in this strain. You cannot mean to affront me, by alluding to the possibility of this unfortunate person—admitting that she has been faithful and well-behaved—becoming my brother's wife. I allow fully for your feelings—for your just indignation—though, believe me, you will outlive it. I blame only those who have secretly aimed a blow at your happiness, by reviving this piece of antiquated scandal, only to mar my brother's felicity, and disappoint all our hopes."

"And, pardon me, Eleanor; but those who imagine that I could, in the same circumstances, talk in any other strain, entirely misunderstand me. No question of right and wrong, which ever interested me, or was left to my own decision, has been more simple—it has no sides."

"Why, the Countess herself," returned the lady, evading direct reply, "would, I am convinced—notwithstanding her little prejudices, from mere knowledge of the world and of society—see this silly affair (magnified by malice into undue importance) in the true light; especially when matters have proceeded so very far between you and Devereux. You cannot imagine, my dear Blanche, that, flattering and delightful as this alliance is to all my family, but particularly to one who, like myself, so highly and warmly appreciates your admirable qualities, who so anxiously desires to obtain you for the sister of her heart, the second mother of her children—you cannot imagine that I have used any improper influence, direct or indirect, to forward the wishes of my brother; yet, the flattering encouragement with which his attentions have been received by you, can be construed only in one way. I would not offend your modesty—I would propitiate your very prudence, dearest Blanche; but you have given Horatio hopes, which, to disappoint now, is, I know, impossible with your feelings of probity and honour—laying the judgment of society out of account."

Blanche was covered with blushes at this implied accusation. Though her judgment and memory of the past did not quite acquit Lady Blande of all participation in the hopes or schemes of her brother, she was unable to fix the blame of any specific act upon her. Lady Blande had done nothing unhandsome, or not more than was sisterly; and Blanche candidly confessed her precipitance.

"I may have too heedlessly, too lightly, both for his sake and my own, accepted the attentions of Mr Devereux. I am new to fashionable society, and know not well where rapid gallantry ends and serious courtship begins; and I will confess that the manners and sentiments of Mr Devereux—his opinions—must I now call them abstract, speculative—not such as influence, much less strictly regulate, men's conduct to women?—made a strong impression on me:—yes, I was imperceptibly beginning to love him—to listen to him with deference—to expect and rely upon his sympathy in my peculiar opinions—to do, in short, what every woman, who places her love happily, must do—look up to him with fond homage. Now I look down upon him! He is a man of great talents and knowledge, and I am but a girl, a weak woman—yet am I that man's superior!"

Lady Blande was again thrown out. The proud energy with which the last words were pronounced, was more intelligible to her than their import; and she still fancied Blanche only very angry and jealous; and, accordingly, said, in her softest and most cajoling tones—"Well, dearest, we shall sleep and wake on it. I am quite sure that, to-morrow, you will see the affair in the true light. I am content with any penance, however severe, that you may choose to inflict on Horatio, so that it be not extended beyond the season—that July realizes his hopes, and makes us all united and happy."

"There is but one light in which it can be seen—nor, till my nature is changed, can I ever view it in another; and I wish I could make you see it with my eyes, Eleanor; for the world and its false glare has not yet dazzled me. A mutual error (to view the conduct of your brother to this friendless young woman in the most lenient way) is, to her and her children, followed by ruin and infamy,—by even what you, Eleanor, must confess to be deep and lasting injury to one party, and that the weak and helpless—the trusting, the betrayed; while the other—But, no, I cannot speak of it. Yet some—even you, my friend—fancy that these transactions, and their consequences, should be no bar to your brother's prosperity and happiness, to his immediate alliance with a noble heiress—ay, pardon my candid pride, with Blanche Delamere."

"You cannot rate the pride and happiness of such an alliance more highly than I do, dearest Blanche. Yet, for heaven's sake, keep those very singular notions you have formed to yourself," said the lady, pettishly. "I do not pretend to vindicate many parts of the conduct which society, and women themselves, tolerate in young men of fashion—in all men; but that my brother has brought any stain on his honour—done anything unbecoming the character of an English gentleman—no one will dare to affirm. His liberality to that indiscreet young woman, on whom the laws of society justly visit the consequences of her own folly and guilt, has even been cause of censure to more prudent persons—of praise, I grant, to those who, like you, think more charitably."

"This is no subject for debate between us, Lady Blande," returned Blanche, coldly; "you forget that I have seen this unfortunate person, and her tenderly-nurtured children only this morning—that I knew and loved her in happier times, though that does not far influence my judgment now. You will not permit me to allude to Mr Devereux, as the possible husband of Rosamond Weston, nor do I wish to force so repugnant an idea upon you; but the seducer of Rosamond Weston—I say it again, and for the last time—her seducer cannot be named or thought of as the husband of Blanche Delamere without the deepest offence."

This was said in a tone so decided that Lady Blande was silenced for a minute; and Blanche resumed her writing, concluded and folded the letter, and ordered her own footman to take it to the post-office.

"Cannot your epistle go in the ordinary way?"

"No—I am unwilling to lose a post. I am announcing my instant return to Holy Cross to my grandmother. I wish to spare her the pain and fatigue of a needless journey to London, on my account. It is now scarce worth while to say, that, in answer to Mr Devereux's application, my grandmother sanctions his addresses, since she informs me she has written him to that import."

"Good heavens! and that letter, so welcome, will probably be waiting Horatio at his lodgings. For God's sake recall your letter"—and she ran to recall the man herself, but he was gone. "Give, were it but one day, to reflection—let me entreat you, dearest Blanche—by your regard for me, give yourself time to think; conceive the grief of the Countess—the ridicule of society; spare me, spare yourself the disgraceful eclat of such an affair; let it, at all events, go off gently; and be assured that, though I had set my whole heart upon calling you sister, I shall never renew the subject; nor is Horatio—adoring, worshipping you as he does, placing the sole happiness of his future life, as he has told, on the dear hope you have allowed him to entertain, of calling you his—a man likely to urge any lady beyond the point to which her own feelings for him freely lead her; but spare me the open breach. You do not, dear Blanche, with all your acquirements, know wicked London society quite so well as I do. The breaking off of a match, in high life especially, merely because the gentleman has a discarded mistress, would positively render you the jest of all the clubs, the ridicule of all the coteries, for a month;—the men would absolutely combine against you—so atrocious a case of prudery would be condemned as utter indelicacy by the women—they would never pardon you, for knowing so much of what it does not at all concern us women to know."

"Not concern us! The purity of the morals of our lovers—the fidelity of our husbands? You astonish me, Lady Blande—what then does concern us? The title—the diamonds—the settlements—the provision for matrimonial discord, hatred, and separation—all these concern us, and are cared for accordingly."

"I spoke not for myself, but others; yet ridicule, sneers, impertinent remarks, are not less certain in this case."

Despising herself for a conscious weak susceptibility to the threatened species of contemptible annoyance, yet unable to brave the idea of the laugh of "society" with indifference, Blanche reddened with vexation, even while she calmly replied—"I must, I find, if I mix much in what is called society, teach myself to bear, for the sake of my conscience and principles, persecution hotter than the passing flash of a fool-born jest."

Before the interview concluded, Lady Blande having learned that the letter to Holy Cross was a simple announcement of an abrupt return in consequence of unforeseen circumstances, extracted a reluctant promise that Blanche would take no farther measure for two days, with the understanding that she should not, in the interval, be intruded on by Mr Devereux, nor past occurrences be referred to in any shape. If she then still persisted in returning home, and would not fulfil the promised term of her visit, her noble hostess declared herself bound in honour to restore her, in person, to her grandmother, though in the middle of the season. This was a ceremony with which Blanche would gladly have dispensed.

This had been a day in which the high-spirited, but womanly-hearted heiress of Delamere had fulfilled a duty which demanded no ordinary exertion of moral courage and fortitude. At its close, she was far from happy, and not even satisfied with herself. How false and hollow, and teeming with sin and misery, seemed the world on which she was entering! and how powerless her efforts to amend the ills over which she grieved, even in one solitary instance! Her spirits had never been more low and desponding; and a secret, creeping, insidious, world-begotten sense of impropriety, if not of indelicacy, of conduct, although her conscience and her pride scouted the idea, had yet power to annoy her. This feeling was betrayed, rather than owned, to her friend at their customary hour of confidential talk.

"Grandmamma will, no doubt, be extremely angry when she learns that I have visited Rosamond; and with you, my friend, as much as with myself. It was heedless to implicate you; yet I should repeat my visit to-morrow and to-morrow, if I saw that it would be either useful or consolatory. I disdain the spurious female modesty which can smile on the seducer while it treats his victim with horror or scorn; yet this is the modesty of all the women around me—of the really modest, the truly amiable, as well as of the pretenders."

"There can be no imaginable impropriety in my visits to this unhappy one," replied the Quakeress; "and I will alone fulfil to her a duty to which my heart urges me. To reason about your continued visits is unnecessary—they might be fancied improper; and, what you will more readily feel, they might be painful to their object. Really penitent sorrow seeks few witnesses."

"I fear, indeed, poor Rose may not like to see me; perhaps I was ungentle with her? How unlike to you I am, even when not wrong in the main! What is worse, my warmth in her cause may have irritated her sultan, and done her injury where good was earnestly meant. I fear a moral reformer like myself," she continued, laughingly, "cannot always enact the mild and gentle maiden, which, to say truth, is rather foreign to my—my haughty Delamere blood, shall I call it? I don't see why blood should not be chargeable with a few of the faults of us aristocrats, as well as the fountain of all our virtues and honours. Do you think it possible that, if more dexterously and delicately managed, Mr Devereux might not have been induced to marry Rosamond?"

"Ask rather if I should, in the present state of opinion in England, think such a union desirable for either party; but, waiving this, I do not imagine such an atonement in the least probable:—he will never marry her. An English aristocrat is sometimes seen to marry the mistress of another man, or the wife of a man of his own caste, but rarely his own mistress. I do not understand the distinction—I merely note the fact."

"By the laws of Scotland, our educated, highly moral sister, and next-door neighbour, Rosamond, would be held his wife, and their children legitimate. Well, never shake your quilled coif at me; but the marriage laws of that unpolished country are—I will not say more merciful to women and children—to the weak and defenceless—for I want not mercy—I stand for justice; and they are far more just than our own."

"Liable to sad abuse though."

"Which abuse, however, never or very rarely occurs. You are a terrible Conservative at heart, ma benne:—the old objection to every law, new and good—it is liable to sad abuse. But what can we do for Rosamond?—that is the urgent question." And it was soon decided. Long after midnight, on this eventful day, and long after as many of the inmates of the cottage near Streatham as could sleep were wrapped in repose, the fevered ear of Rosamond, or her heart's quick sense, listened once more to what had so often been the glad signal to welcome and joy—the clatter of horse-hoofs in the lane, which, in her frequent lonely watchings, she had learned to distinguish, long before the gate bell was touched. The agitating events of the morning, and the low nervous fever which had for months been consuming her, aggravated by the silent but ever-gnawing sorrow at her heart, had produced an exacerbation of disease; and now the approaching footsteps—the very breathing, painfully distinguished, brought a deadly pang of alarm, which seemed the messenger of dissolution. "He is come again—he brings my death-warrant!" was her agonizing thought. "He has learned the visit of Lady Blanche—he has borne the proud scorn of her he adores—he comes hither to wreak his anger and disappointment. Would that this hour were past!"

How it did pass, can never now be fully known on earth. At an inquest held two days afterwards upon the body of Rosamond Weston, alias Smith, spinster, &c. &c., held in spite of the interference, and almost direct interference of Lord Blande and other friends of Mr Devereux, the nurse-maid gave evidence that she had been awakened by her mistress, and directed to admit Mr Devereux, which she did. That her mistress had long been in delicate health, and was all that day particularly indisposed. She had dressed herself with some difficulty, and been assisted into the drawing-room, where Mr Devereux waited impatiently, calling more than once to learn if her mistress were not ready. That she herself retired to the nursery, and, being fatigued with her business during the day, fell fast asleep in her clothes, and knew no more till, wakened again by the furious ringing of Mr Devereux, she hastened back to the drawing-room, where she found her mistress a corpse, leaning in the easy chair, and Mr Devereux affectionately supporting her in his arms. There was nothing remarkable in her appearance. She looked then as placid as the corpse before the court; there was no perceptible difference, save that a few drops of blood were then oozing, or bubbling, from the lips. The witness stated, further, that Mr Devereux appeared exceedingly distressed and agitated; and it came out, on the examination of the old gardener, the father of the preceding witness, that Mr Devereux had dispatched him, on his own horse, to summon a medical gentleman from Epsom, much in his confidence, and who had sometimes attended Mrs Smith and her children; but with directions to send also the first surgeon he could find.

Mr Devereux was alleged to be too ill to attend the Coroner's Court; and delicacy, consideration for his feelings, was secretly pleaded against the delay, suggested by some sturdy John Bull sitting on the inquest, till the person so deeply implicated should be in a condition to be examined.

The evidence of two medical gentlemen, one of whom had examined the body of the unfortunate young woman not more than an hour after life was extinct, was consistent, clear, and satisfactory. The immediate cause of dissolution was the rupture of a blood-vessel in the heart. Agitation might have proved an exciting cause, but could not be the primary cause of the disease; and the verdict, given, after what was reported in the newspapers, as "a long and patient investigation," was—"Died by the visitation of God." The gentlemanly Coroner informed Lord Blande, who was present, that his honourable relative, the Member for —shire, remained without a speck on his character.

"Died, or was hurried and tortured to death, by the injustice of man!" exclaimed Blanche Delamere, throwing from her the newspaper in which, spite of the efforts of the Family Compact, a detailed account of the inquest appeared. "We want a term for destroyers of life of this worst description. I must not call Mr Devereux a murderer, an assassin. I do not believe that he has used violent means to remove the object in the path of his ambition, or of his desires. I can even imagine him grieved and compunctious. What matters it? Were Rosamond alive again, in all her beauty—nay, in her first innocence—would he act differently?"

Notwithstanding the shock, the scandal, the very unpleasant eclat of such an affair, Lady Blande secretly felt pleased, and scarcely concealed her opinion that Devereux's mistress had done, though rather inopportunist, the very best thing possible in the circumstances.

"If she possessed the sense of virtue, and the refined feelings you attribute to her, my dear Blanche, surely, for herself, this is the most desirable consummation. Good Mrs Thompson appears resigned to a dispensation, shocking, but scarcely to be lamented. Now I can, with perfect propriety, look after my brother's children."

"To the care of my friend, Rosamond Weston has bequeathed her children. She has, at least, done what I feel equivalent to myself—besought my protection and kindness for their friendless, parentless infancy, and given us all the rights she possessed. We will not deceive her confidence. Mrs Thompson has gone, even now, to remove the children from the care of the respectable and compassionate neighbour, who could not hold any intercourse with Mr Devereux's mistress, but who took home his worse than orphans. She is to place them with a friend at Stoke-Newington. Yes, Lady Blande, the love of life is still fresh and strong in me; yet I, too, though mournfully, acquiesce in the catastrophe which takes from me an early, and a once much-loved, and still loved friend. For her the best refuge was an early grave. She is gone to just judgment:—we wait our turn."

Lady Blande was silenced. The event of Rosamond's death had procured her a delay in the departure of Blanche, whom she was still resolved to accompany, if she could not divert away the resolution. Her brother was indisposed, and meant to go to Paris for a few weeks; and matters looked black enough; still she was inclined to hope that the worst was past, and that Rosamond, the one great obstacle, fairly removed, the proud heiress might be won. She should be indulged in the absurdity of protecting the children. Fondness for them might prove a tie with the father; and, to work on the feelings of Blanche, her Ladyship permitted herself to exaggerate, while she affected to rail at the excess of concern which Devereux exhibited at this "untoward business."

In the meanwhile, the fashionable physician who still occasionally took fees for Blanche, became, for a few mornings, of double importance, though he protested he could tell nothing.

"Oh, but you know the whole, though, of course, professional honour seals your lips," said the young matron mouthpiece of one fair bevy that baited the May-Fair Galen. "Mr Devereux had a most beautiful mistress—a Rosamond—a Rosa Munda!—of whom he was passionately fond. I know it. Lord Albert Seacote and Tom Jerningham often drove round by her cottage when at Epsom, to have a peep of her over the hedge. Well, this imperious heiress thought fit to fall in love with Devereux—too good a match for him to be slighted—and there was a violent flirtation—carried even to indecent lengths; for the young incognita was to be seen with him everywhere, without anything in the shape of a chaperon. But this was all very well—Lady Blande knows what she is about—until the little Tartaress heard of the beautiful mistress; when, down she goes by herself, storms the cottage, assails the poor woman like a jealous tigress; and, next morning, Devereux's beautiful mistress was found dead in the summer-house, with a vial beside her, labelled Hydrocyanic Acid! Since you will not tell us your edition of the story, doctor, you are welcome to ours—that which is circulating all over the town."

The doctor smiled his ambiguous smile of acquiescing incredulity, while he blandly whispered—

"The report of the Coroner's inquest in yesterday's Morning Post"——

"True; but what does it signify? Died, by the visitation of God—certainly—and not one word of the visitation of Queen Elinor. Nay, more, Lady Blande has this morning set off for the north, to convey the terrible creature to her grandmother's custody. I do not see, now, how Mr Devereux, or any man, could venture to marry her, with all her splendid advantages:—if not deranged, she must be worse."

This much of the tale was true: Blanche, attended by Lady Blande, had returned to Holy Cross.

With confusion, and a strong desire to disclaim the excess of filial tenderness ascribed to her, she heard Lady Blande dexterously, yet evasively, impute the real motive of the impromptu return, to fond fears and anxieties for "dearest grandmamma;" while, on the first absence of the heiress after their arrival, it was more than insinuated that the dignified delicacy of the heiress of Delamere required that, under the guardian and maternal eye of the Countess, in her proper home, was she to be wooed and to be won! The self-complacency of Lady Delamere was moved; her pride was gratified; her tenderness for her grandchild excited. "After what had transpired, Mr Horatio Devereux must be aware that his visits would be most welcome to the Lady of Holy Cross, and probably not disagreeable to its future mistress," the Dowager added, with gracious smiles.

"My dear Lady Blande, I am more than satisfied—I am proud of my grandchild's choice, which naturally waited on, and has followed my approval. The heiress of Delamere, in affairs of great moment to other young ladies though of the highest rank, can afford to waive certain considerations, and look alone to character, connexion, and inclination. Were Mr Devereux the first Duke in England, I could not more heartily approve the alliance."

Lady Blande was equally delighted. Dr Hayley, and every other kind, considerate friend, had kept from the knowledge of the aged Countess whatever might be supposed displeasing to her granddaughter or disagreeable to herself. The sister of Mr Devereux appeared, at this critical time, on the most intimate and friendly footing with Lady Blanche; and, whatever might intervene, there was little doubt of him being her accepted suitor and eventual husband. A word in his disparagement, though an honest one, would have been dreaded as high treason. Yet was Dr Hayley highly gratified to learn how the affair really stood, and that the misunderstanding—as Blanche, without much explanation, asserted—was interminable; for it rested on principle—on total dissimilarity of views and feelings, which time could not remove. She owned, in the saunter in the shrubberies to which she invited the ever-soothing, ever-indulgent ci-devant chaplain, that the art of Lady Blande in—without direct falsehood—lulling her grandmother in the belief that all was harmony between herself and Mr Devereux, did provoke her.

"But," she added, "I dislike annoying poor grandmamma. I was truly shocked to find her, though in great spirits, looking so changed on my return yesterday; and, for the time, was as much affected as Lady Blande alleged. Tell me all that has happened in our absence, to interest me? Is Phoebe's husband kinder than we dare hope? But you may guess how I long for home news. How do Squire Grimshaw's doings please you? How many poacher prosecutions had you at the Sessions? Above all, what think you of grandmamma's health—her mental health?—trust she has had no more faintings? Her appearance altogether, and her high, flighty spirit are not satisfactory to me."

Dr Hayley made light of those fears. The Countess was aged, no doubt of it. Time she slight respect to peeresses, though such in their own right. He did not indeed say this; he had permitted himself to imagine anything so levelling and audacious on the part of the old, irrevocably toothed inflexible. Lady Delamere, at all times excitable, had been of late, he said, worried applications, amounting to mysterious menaces from the next heirs to the estates and title of the Delameres; the family whose pretensions she had maintained against her grandchild, afterwards deserted in caprice, which amounted to positive dislike.

"'Tis the worrying she has had from this troublesome and importunate people has made Countess so very anxious for your speedy marriage," said the Doctor.

"Importunate! Is it not hard though, my good friend, that this poor lad, between whom and these large estates and coveted titles there only interposes my silly self, should be half-starved, waiting for their possession? I am sure I cannot comprehend how the rights of this unknown twenty-first cousin are not about as good as ours."

"As yours!—Let me beseech you to take heed what you say, my child. There may be persons quite of your opinion, if it seriously be yours. The Countess has been so exasperated as to withdraw the allowance of £300 per annum, generously made to this ungrateful youth and his mother, for his education; and since then he has been going among the Irish tenantry, fomenting all kinds of mischief. There is a very bad spirit among those people. You alone interpose, as you say, between him and them, and most flagitious hopes."

"You don't imagine he will have them ma-chacré me," said Blanche, laughing.

"God forbid!—though they are fit for any wickedness. All this last spring there have been nocturnal disturbances—carding and turning up ground in the barony; and one horrible murder has been committed. They are incorrigible wretches, whom indulgence only renders worse."

"Another murder!" said Blanche, shuddering. "This might have been foreseen—those cruel ejectments—no wonder grandmamma is distressed."

"When the petitions of their priest were very properly referred back to the local agent, some of the wretched creatures had the wicked hardihood to send the Countess threatening letters, one of which, of shocking import, was thrown into the carriage as she was driving to church, and was unfortunately read to her Ladyship by Mrs Martin. We had—Grimshaw and myself—studiously kept back all such incendiary writings from her, with the knowledge and full approbation of Lord Fanfaronade, aware of their alarming effects on her nerves."

"Or on her conscience," thought Blanche, sadly. Compassion for the notorious Donegal tenantry had made her much better acquainted with their wrongs and their condition than was the good Doctor.

"I trust the last days of grandmamma's life may be blessed and gladdened by some effort on her part to improve the condition of her Irish tenantry; by making some atonement for the neglect of generations, and the oppression of later times."

"I tell you, Lady Blanche, it will be at the peril of her life, if the subject is again brought before the Countess," said the Doctor, with unusual energy. "That abominable letter nearly upset her mind; besides, it is too late now; most of the peasantry—a pestilent, lazy, filthy, rebellious, priest-ridden crew they are—have gone to America!"

"Or to their graves."

"Oh, heaven knows where! But a few desperate characters continue to loiter about the outskirts of the estate, boiling with designs of pillage and murder. You surely would not encourage such demoralized, unnatural wretches? It was a frantic beldame, the grandmother of a notorious band of them, named O'Hanlon—no good of characters with big O's before their names. Lady Blanche—who lurked about the park, till, when refused an audience of the Countess, she threw that incendiary letter into the coach."

"The handsome O'Hanlons! Sure you have heard grandmamma speak of that family hundreds of times. How different the Donegal estates must have been fifty years since, when she went to go over among the people, and when the loyal and enthusiastic race worshipped the very footsteps of their young Ban Tierna! When grandmamma, in the exuberance of her loyalty to the Bourbons, or hatred of the Jacobins, raised that famous Delamere Brigade, on her Irish estates, Widow O'Hanlon's three gallant sons were the first that flocked to her banner. It has been whispered that the young O'Hanlons would rather have fought on the Republican side than either under the French Princes or in the British army, but that the volunteer condition with the poor farmers, was either to send out their sons or lose their little farms. Alas! both evils have been incurred—the young men were first sacrificed, the parents then driven forth."

"Pardon me, Lady Blanche; you know well, or might know—for you have often been told—the kind of rude, lazy, husbandry practised by those turbulent, half-savage, Papist people. The property was every year deteriorating, and substantial tenants were offering. The Countess at last determined to adopt a better system; of which the first step was getting clear of those wretches. And how generously the Countess provided, or would have provided for them, in mountain farms or fishing villages! What sums, at all events, were lavished in attempting to settle them! But that wretched country, not alone to my patroness, but to Great Britain, is Magormiasibid—evil and a curse to herself, and to all around her!"

The usually calm, downy doctor was actually excited; and Blanche, though unconvinced, gave way so far as to keep silence. She could not, however, think, that the way to restore her grandmother to healthful quiet and equanimity of mind, was to conceal facts which might lead to some healing measure—to some degree of atonement; and she ruminated upon how she might introduce a subject always hateful to the Countess, unless she herself led to it, in discoursing complacently of her bright young days—the days of her patriotism and glory, when she had unfurled the banner of Delamere, and seen her peasantry rally around it with those proud feelings which exalted vassalage, and gave to serfdom a colour of sentiment. Her ruminations were ended by her grandmother inviting her to drive her tête-à-tête next day in the garden chaise, to inspect a lodge, or gamekeeper's cottage, which she was erecting in a part of the Chase lately taken into the park. Lady Blande was to spend that day with her mother, and pass the next again at Holy Cross, previous to her return to town.

It was now near the end of June, and a day of resplendent, out-gushing, and steady sunshine; and Blanche and her grandmother, conversing affectionately, slowly drove on through the sweeping glades, and adown the stately and solemn avenues, until they gained the opener and more lightly timbered parts of the park, and more rapidly crossed those spreading lawns and pastures, where the fallow-deer were seen in groups, standing a moment at gaze, and then scudding off to the frequent copes and thickets, and hillocks of gorse and fern. No sight in that world of beauty was so delightful to the Countess, as the numerous young broods of pheasants, which, tame as domestic fowl, were seen at feed in the fallows, and among the newly turned up soil. The heart of the aged lady swelled with the proud feeling of property, not unmingled with nobler sentiments, as her grandchild's rapturous, broken exclamations—the almost incoherent expression of her exquisite sense of the beautiful with which earth and sky were bursting around her—fell on the ear of the yet sole proprietress. She began proudly to expatiate upon what she had done to embellish the demesne—on the thriving growth of the woods of her planting, and the flourishing state of the gardens, conservatories, and aviaries she had created or extended. Even the fine breeds of domestic animals on her estates—the horses, the cattle, the very poultry—had been improved by her vigilant intelligence and her public spirit.

"When I first remember Holy Cross, now more than sixty years since," said she, "there were in this part of the country much fewer pheasants than there are—thanks to the factories!—now poachers."

"That is no improvement," said Blanche. "But the yeomen, the labourers, grandmamma—have they improved like the breeds of cattle?"

"Improved!—degenerated they have; but, thank heaven, I have bought them nearly all out on my own borders; or those smoky, seditious towns have absorbed them; and the country, save for the poachers, is really much more orderly than I can remember. My tenantry are a very different kind of people from my father's; but then I have not one for twenty boers which, with their families, then ate up the estate. Could my dear father now see our improved husbandry—the farm buildings—the enclosures—the excellent breeds of cattle—the modern implements"—

"And the rent-roll," said Blanche, somewhat archly.

"Ay, child," returned the Countess, laughing graciously; "the rent-roll, indeed—quadrupled since my own time; while the value of the property has been so much increased, in timber, buildings, roads, and a variety of substantial and permanent improvements, I have been no unprofitable steward of the family inheritance child, as you will find."

"But the Irish tenantry, grandmamma?" whispered Blanche, in tones scarce audible.

"The Irish tenantry!—the plague and curse of my existence for thirty years! Yet even on these estates, which I have sometimes wished sunk in the Atlantic, good plans, with resolution and firmness in executing them, have made their way. I have no hesitation in saying that the Irish estates are in a much better condition than I found them:—we have got rid of three hundred and seventy of the wretches this season—and the property is in rapid course of improvement. But what smoke is that near Dinglebrook? 'Tis late in the season for burning waste, and the new lodge smokes should not be in that direction."

Blanche was engaged with the reins. The steady, old, favourite north-country pony, Beardie, which the Countess often drove about the ground herself, had pricked up his ears, and showed symptoms of uneasiness, as they wound down the steep and narrow picturesque path which led to the little bridge over Dinglebrook. This brook, diminished, by the summer heats, to a mere runlet, windled among steep and very high banks, which, immediately on crossing the bridge, presented a natural pass, through which the road had been made by blasting the solid rock. The pass was bridged overhead, where there were walks, on a higher level, leading to other parts of the demesne; and, in the centre of the arch, was an iron gate, very rarely shut, but which might have blocked up the pass. Having gained the bottom of the dingle, and crossed the bridge, they were about to drive under the arch, while Blanche pointed out to her grandmother the luxuriant growth of ivy and saxifrage, and the many creepers and flowers which love the shade, which mantled the rocks and the arches overhead, and descended in long streamers and garlands, which she playfully caught with her whip.

"How deliciously cool and fresh!—and how lovely!"

"I have long resolved to have another ice-house here. It is rather distant from the house, to be sure; but, though I choose to-day to drive out with you, like a market-woman going to Chester to sell butter and eggs, I have horses and menials which mock at distance—I will have an improved ice-house here immediately."

"To cool your tongue, is it!" was yelled in her ear; and the gate under the arch swung close with a crash which awakened all the echoes of the glade, as a tall female, concealed in the dark cloak and hood of the Irish peasant women, jerked the reins from the hand of Blanche with violence, which made the pony start.

"Is it ice ye want, my Lady?—ye'll need it," continued the stranger; while her hood fell back, discovering the sharp, haggard features, and wild, scintillating eyes of partial insanity.

"It is she—the woman O'Hanlon—that terrible woman come again!" said the Countess, in a voice, and with a look, which doubly alarmed

Blanche. But, rallying her spirits, she said, firmly—"Let go the rein—who are you that dare thus interrupt us, and alarm the Countess of Delamere?" And she attempted to snatch the rein, which the other held the more firmly.

"Ye would like to hear, young madam, would ye, who I am?—ay, ye shall, too, whether ye like or no. . . . Let her who sits by ye tell who I am, and who I was when her cruel eyes fell on me first in my little cabin. Pat O'Hanlon's wife—the mother of three handsome and blessed boys. Where are they now? Murdered and crippled in the bloody wars, to please the pride of her who drove the heart-broken father and the orphan childer on the black world to beg their bread through it; and sould the truss of straw from beneath them, and burned the roof over the grey heads, and slacked the ashes on the hearth—her, I tell ye!—the widow's and orphan's curse upon her!"

"Let us pass, for mercy's sake!" cried Blanche, struggling to regain the reins with one hand, and with the other to support her sinking grandmother, who, violent as opposition usually made her, was now overpowered—acutely sensible to all that was said, but too feeble to offer resistance.

"Let us pass now," Blanche continued, soothingly and persuasively; "and, on my honour, your story shall be listened to—your wrongs shall be righted, so far as atonement is now possible. You cannot be inhuman! See how pale and ill the lady is."

"Is she pale and ill—the proud Lady-Countess of Delamere?—who came among us with the banner, and robbed us of our children, and then of our little farms. Perhaps it is could her ladyship is?—or hungry?—or naked?—and the Widow O'Hanlon did it on her—the desolate widow—whom they drove mad!"

The frantic laugh of the woman rang through the arches overhead in frightful reverberation—heightening, if that were possible, the nervous terror of the Countess, and the alarm of Blanche, who knew not whether to think the Irishwoman more mad or malicious. Their eyes met steadily for a moment—

"You cannot mean mischief to my aged grandmother," she said. "If you have had sorrows, she, alas! has not been passed by untouched. Do, pray, good, kind woman, let us go our way."

"Yes, go—go, Countess—to where your brother Dives waits to welcome ye. In this life, ye know, he had his good things, and our brother Lazarus his evil. But where, my haughty Lady-Countess—where, ye cruel and sinful woman, did he lift up his eyes? Will it be my Patrick will bring ye the cup of cold water, think ye?—or my Dermott, who died by your banner, when they feel how ye misused and oppressed the decent old couple they called father and mother."

"The Countess is innocent of much of this," said Blanche. "The agents—the exigencies of the time"—

"Tell not me of the agent's doings, lest I throttle her outright!" shrieked the woman, in a wilder paroxysm than ever, while the Countess clung closer to her grandchild.

"Have you, who thus resent wrong yourself, no mercy?" replied Blanche—her spirit rising. "Have you no fears of the consequences of this violence?"

"Fear!" exclaimed the mad woman, laughing wildly, and throwing up her bare, bony arms. "What have I to fear? Can she and her agents do more than crush this miserable carcass?" And she tore open her handkerchief. "This was the bosom that suckled them—dry and withered now. Give me back my boys!—give me my children, woman, and keep your lands; and, och! that every stone and clod on them laid another pound to the load will sink ye to burning punishment!"

"This is too horrible!" exclaimed Blanche, relinquishing her grandmother, and springing to the ground. "Wretched woman! unless you would see Lady Delamere expire before your eyes, begone!"

The dark eyes of the maniac—for such she seemed, strange as was the method of her madness—scintillated and sparkled with gratified revenge; and then, after a moment, turning calmly to Lady Delamere, she slowly and emphatically repeated—

"Fear not him who can kill the body; but fear Him who can cast both soul and body into hell! Proud and hard-hearted woman, I summon you to meet me and mine at His judgment-seat—ay, or over that midsummer moon be at the full!"

And, raising her eyes to the pale crescent high in the sky, she threw down the reins, and disappeared behind the gate.

"She will not return—shall I go to seek help? Dearest grandmamma, have you courage to be left for a moment, till I can call a woodman, or one of the keepers?"

"Oh, no! I shall die, I shall perish, if you leave me here!" Blanche was able to bring a little water from the runlet; and she tried to comfort and sooth the frightened lady, while she bathed her temples and her hands. "I am better—yes, dear child, better. Hasten home!"

She spoke no more; and it was a full half-hour before Blanche was so fortunate as to see a forester croesing a distant path, whom she called, and dispatched, by the nearest way, for a carriage. "The Countess," she merely said, "had been taken suddenly ill;" and the man, who ran at full speed, told the butler—"My Lady was lying two-fold in the little chay, quite dead-like." Dr Hayley, and carriages, and all appliances, were in instant readiness; yet it seemed an age to Blanche—now driving on a few paces—now halting to look at and fondly address her speechless grandmother before they came up.

All the medical aid in the county was in speedy requisition. Her own physician suspected a return in a worse form of those apopleptic attacks, politely named fainting fits, to which the Countess was liable; but the medical friend of the Lady Blanche's watchful and zealous Cousin Yates, spoke decidedly of serious concussion of the brain.

Days passed, and the real state of the Countess was known and revealed. There was no longer any violent sorrow displayed in the household; no keen anxiety; no deep regret. Even Mrs Thompson and Doctor Hayley took all calmly and tranquilly; and Blanche hid her own grief in her heart. Strange it seemed, even to herself, that she should thus feel for the Countess; and she sought no sympathy in her suffering, and struggled to suppress every outward symptom of sorrow, which to others, and even to those who loved her best, might seem far greater than the event justified. "Is it that mysterious force of kindred blood?" was her secret thought.

The night of the full moon found her a silent watcher by her grandmother's deathbed. The Countess had never freely spoken—never, save when violently roused by the medical men, given any token of consciousness since the adventure at Dinglebrook; but all this day, her high and painful breathing had been gradually becoming lower and more feeble, and, by midnight, it had ceased! The Quakeress, her regards fixed on Blanche, whose eyes were riveted on the dying Countess, perceived her colour change, and hurried her out to the same balcony where she had, in old times, paid graceful adoration to the beautiful luminary of night.

"The moon is at the full to-night," said her friend, following her upward eyes.

"I could be superstitious," thought Blanche, half shuddering as she gazed and remembered the solemn citation of the terrific maniac.

"A poor wretch—a half-mad creature—who has wandered hither from Donegal, to petition the Countess, has been found dead by Dinglebrook bridge to-day," said the Quakeress. And Blanche started violently. "The body was snuffed out by one of the keeper's terriers. It is thought she had clambered within the park, at that lonely spot, in despite of orders; and, too feeble to get out again, has perished without help."

They passed into the chamber, and silently contemplated the face of the dying—

"'Tis all over," whispered the physician, who still tried the pulse; and, shortly afterwards, Lord Fanfaronade, as of right, entered the chamber to condole with, and lead forth "Blanche, Countess of Delamere."

Next morning a letter lay on her table, of mingled condolence and congratulation, from Sir Jervis Yates, with offers of every possible or impossible service to the "Countess of Delamere."

"So my plebeian cousin has got his nickname too," said Blanche, bitterly.

"Dear child, what means this? Dost fancy thy own proud title a nickname?"

"I know not well what I mean. But you—you are a very, very calm person—do you fancy me insane—of unsound mind—unfit to manage my own affairs?"

"Dearest Blanche—Countess, what is wrong? speak to me—to thy friend."

"If I be not yet mad, the Irish family, and the Grimshaws, are in a scheme to make me lunatic."

The Quakeress looked aghast. "Who has dared to say—who has imagined this wickedness? They abuse thy credulity."

"I have known it now for three days. Frederick Leighton has told me—warned me. Read his letter for yourself. Methinks they might have let me be nearer of age ere they had taken the trouble to make me out mad. But I go to give orders for the poor Irishwoman's funeral; will you be so kind as to attend it? She need not tarry the plumes and scutcheons of a Countess:—will she sleep less soundly?"

Lord Brougham's Dissertations on Scientific Subjects connected with Natural Theology.

PROPERLY speaking, there is no subject of science that may not be connected with Natural Theology, though the topics for dissertation which Lord Brougham has selected as the sequel to his work on this subject, bear more closely and strongly upon it than any others in the range of science. The principal subjects treated in the first volume, with immediate reference to Natural Theology, are Instinct and Animal Intelligence. These are discussed in a dialogue presumed to be carried on by the author and his friend, Lord Althorpe—a form which, without reference to its classical attraction, he considers peculiarly fitted for thorough investigation, and the unfolding and sifting of the subject under discussion. These dialogues, which bear a classic character, though without pedantry or stiffness, are relieved and enlivened by pertinent and sometimes playful allusions to public affairs, and to scenes in which the philosophical interlocutors have recently figured; and this is done with good dramatic effect, in the keeping of the individual character of each party; Lord A. ever and anon calling "patience," and Lord B. rushing on to conclusions so clear to himself, if doubtful to the understanding of his slower-paced friend. These dialogues, together with a long and very curious and learned paper of Observations, Demonstrations, and Experiments on the structure of the Cells of Bees, fill the first volume. The second opens with a dissertation on the Origin of Evil, in which Lord Brougham, in spite of his boldness and acuteness, is condemned to walk in the same circle to which the greatest and brightest of human intellects have been limited, when discussing this most perplexing and tantalizing question. One merit of the Treatise is the clearness and precision with which the question is stated. This clearness of statement is, indeed, one of the distinguishing faculties of a mind ever secure of itself, from the consciousness of possessing a thorough knowledge of the subject handled. Whatever has been said on the cause of evil in the ancient philosophies, or suggested by modern hypotheses, is succinctly and clearly brought out; while, in detecting and pointing out the fallacies and incongruities of every hypothesis, Lord Brougham displays his characteristic subtlety and acuteness.

He modestly sets out by predicating that no very satisfactory conclusion will ever be reached by the human faculties in our present state, either about the origin or the sufferance of what is universally admitted to be evil; and the result of his speculations and ingenious arguments, and of his illustrations, borrowed from the increasing lights of science, only serves to confirm this opinion. On this dark subject the philosophers have never got beyond the poets—

"One part, one little part we dimly scan,
Through the dark medium of life's feverish dream;
Yet dare to arraign the whole stupendous plan,
If but that little part incongruous seem," &c.

Lord Brougham speculates in a pious and cheerful spirit, dwelling on the happiest side of the argument; and where he cannot dispel the cloud, wisely descants on the probable brightness beyond it.

What is likely, if not to last the longest in these volumes, yet to be the most immediately useful, is a masterly analytical view of the researches of Cuvier and his successors, on Fossil Osteology, and the application of the extraordinary facts brought to light by them to Natural Theology; and a popular compendium, so to speak, of the most important portion of the "Principia" of Newton. The "Principia," which Lord Brougham, reverentially, and again and again, pronounces the greatest work of human genius—the greatest work ever produced by the human understanding—is, to the bulk of even educated men, a sealed book; and it is not the least worthy of his constant labours for mankind, to have thus brought Newton's sublime discoveries within the scope of the general understanding. The reception of the great work which Lord Brougham has laid open to every one desirous of examining for himself the evidence on which the Newtonian discoveries rest, who can read English, and possesses the pre-requisite of a moderate knowledge of the first principles of mathematics, was, notwithstanding the previous fame of the discoverer, cold and discouraging. Twenty-seven years elapsed before a second edition of the "Principia" was required, and thirteen years more before the third appeared, which, moreover, has sufficed to the learned ever since, or for about a century. It was, therefore, high time that Newton found a popular expositor.

Among the causes of the indifference shewn to the study of the great Newtonian discoveries, embraced almost universally by faith, though rarely comprehended by the understanding, Lord Brougham notices the difficulty which ordinary students must have experienced in following Newton's demonstrations, from his extreme conciseness, and also from his often leaving out steps in the demonstrations, assuming all his readers to be expert geometricians. But he has not adverted to what must have formed another very formidable obstruction to the mass of readers, and to thinkers who might not be classical scholars, from the "Principia" being printed in a learned language. Had it originally appeared, not in Latin, but in the mother tongue of the Franklins, and Ferrases, and Watts, its reception would, we apprehend, have been different, even in Newton's age. These subjects, with notes and brief fragmentary arguments upon topics all more or less connected with the main subject of discussion, constitute Lord Brougham's new work—a work which will make no inconsiderable addition to the literary and scientific fame of its eminent author—proving the first statesman and orator of our age to be also one of the small number of our originally-minded philosophical inquirers. It is the more grateful to Lord Brougham's intelligent admirers—and, not only in this country, but wherever the English language is spoken and understood, they are numerous—to reflect that an accession of honour and fame, springing from the noblest source, is gained after his indefatigable enemies, and his not less indefatigable good-natured friends, had hinted, whispered, or boldly asserted, that his great intellect was shattered and prostrate; and that, if not absolutely imbecile, he was then certainly crack-brained!—but, at all events—and this was coming to the true point—that he was totally, and for ever, unfitted for public duty! Within this same remarkable period of his alleged mental eclipse, have been accomplished many of Lord Brougham's proudest feats as an orator and a statesman; and his power of giving effect to public opinion, and even of swaying senates, has never been more forcibly displayed. Gaining votes, however, in the British legislature, as at present constituted, is a very opposite affair to persuading understandings. This is somewhat irrelevant, though, as we happen to be enrolled by some of our friendly contemporaries among the blind worshippers of Lord Brougham, we must naturally be gratified by any opportunity of finding that there is some reason for the hope that is in us.

The volumes are to be followed by an Analysis of the Mécanique Céleste of La Place, and of the remaining books of the "Principia." The facts illustrative of the nature of instinct, and of the intelligence of the lower animals, and the ingenious and lively reasoning on these facts, will probably form the most popular portion of the work; and they certainly afford the most inviting specimens for extract; but, as our space is limited, we propose to draw upon what bears more immediately upon contemporary affairs.

About the close of the general election of the first Parliament of Queen Victoria, Lord A., on his way to the north, to shoot, visited his friend, Lord B., in Westmoreland; and there those discussions were renewed which had engaged them while Lord B. had been at Wiseton, and which had subsequently formed the topic of a correspondence—in which, probably, most of the letters issued from the north. He says,

The weather being fine, we ranged somewhat among the lake scenery, and by the rivers and through the woods which variegated our northern country. There was not much to tempt us in the aspect of public affairs, which, if not gloomy for the country at large, was yet not very flattering for the liberal party, among whom the single object seemed now to be the retention of office, and who might say, with the Roman patriot, in the decline of liberty, "Nostris enim vitilis, non casualiquo, rempublicam verbo, retinemus, reapse vero jam pridem amisimus." Nor, indeed, on these matters, was there a perfect agreement between us two; for, while we augured as little favourably the one as the other of our prospects, we ascribed to different causes the condition of affairs which gave rise to these forebodings—he tracing it to the great natural weight and influence of the Tories throughout the country, both in church and state; I relying more on the energies of an improved and active people, provided the Government had acted so as to merit their support, but lamenting that no pains had been taken by them to shew any superiority of popular principles, or make the country feel itself better off under their rule than they would have been under the adverse faction, while I perceived sufficiently plain indications that the accession of Court-favour in this new reign, would have the effect of lessening rather than promoting any popular tendencies which might still exist. Altogether, therefore, the state of the Commonwealth was a subject less suited to engage our conversation; and we naturally dwelt little upon passing and unpleasant topics, as unsatisfactory, transitory, and fleeting—"Ista quæ nec percontari nec audire sine molestia possumus."

So they sat them down, like a couple of ancient philosophers, in the cool shade, in an island of the river, and held profound colloquy—classic in form, but lively, familiar, racy—upon, in the first place, the nature of instinct. A. interrupted B. in an attempt to define this singular faculty, or power, or gift—or what shall we call it?—and the check produces this sally, and lively snatch of not irrelevant talk:—

B. Patience, good man!—patience! What is this to what you have gone through? Fancy yourself once more in the House of Commons, on the Treasury Bench, listening to ———.

A. God forbid!

B. Or suppose yourself again in Downing Street, with Drummond announcing a succession of seven deputations, or of seventeen suitors?

A. The bare possibility of it drives me wild! Why, to convert you to the most absurd doctrine I could fancy—to make you swallow all the zoonomia whole, and believe that men derive their love of waving lines and admiration of finely-moulded forms from the habit of the infant in handling his mother's bosom; or even to drive you into a belief that the world was made by chance—would be an easy task compared to the persuading any one suitor, at any one of the offices, that you had any difficulty in giving him all he asks, or convincing any one of those seven deputations that there exists in the world another body but itself.

B. Or to convince any one man who ever asked any one job to be done for him that he had any one motive in his mind but the public good, to which he was sacrificing his private interests. I remember M. once drolly observing, when I said no man could tell how base men are till he came into office—"On the contrary, I never before had such an opinion of human virtue; for I now find that no man ever drops the least hint of any motive but disinterestedness and self-denial; and all idea of gain or advantage is the only thing that none seem ever to dream of." But, now, compose yourself to patience and discussion, take an extra pinch of snuff, walk about, for five minutes, a distance of five yards and back, with your hands in your breeches' pockets, and then return to the question with the same calmness with which you have listened to a man abusing you by the hour, in Parliament, or with which you looked an hour ago, in the castle-farm, at the beast you had bred, and which, by your complacent aspect, I saw you had sold pretty well."

A reference to the modern Freethinkers or Encyclopedists of France, and an allusion to the hypothesis of Helvetius, that human superiority is solely owing to the form of the hand, introduce Monboddó, and this ingenious and hopeful, if not conclusive nor quite orthodox apology for his nonsensical theory:—

Professor Robinson, [Robison?] in his attacks on the French school, is nowhere more severe upon them than where he impeaches them of endeavouring to lower the dignity of human nature; and, undoubtedly, such attempts may be made in a manner to hurt the interests both of religion and of morals.

A. Has not Lord Monboddó given great offence of the same kind, and in the same quarters?

B. Possibly he has; although, from his station as a judge, and a man of most loyal political opinions, and also from his being an orthodox believer—at least as far as professions go—he has been less blamed than the rest. He was an admirable Grecian, such as modern Scotland has very rarely produced. There is an infinite deal of ingenuity and subtlety, as well as learning, in his writings, with a constant display of most correct taste, in judging of the ancient controversies. But his theory has subjected him to great ridicule—not so much from holding that there is a gradation in the whole scale of beings, and that the mental faculties of men are found in the minds of brutes, as from his denying any specific difference, even in body, and holding that originally men were fashioned like monkeys, and lived, like them, wild and savage.

A. I could much more easily understand this doctrine giving offence and scandal as heterodox, than the other; for it seems not reconcilable either to our religion, or, indeed, to almost any other received amongst civilized nations.

B. I consider it a thing just as little supported by the facts as it is repugnant to all known systems of theology.

But my objection to it is really not founded upon its tendency to lower human nature. On the contrary, I doubt if it does not rather exalt our faculties beyond all the ordinary doctrines, and draw a broader line of distinction between us and the lower animals, than that which it was intended to efface; for, surely, if we have not only, by our intelligence, made the great progress from a rude to a refined state, from the New Zealander to La Place, and Newton, and Lagrange, but have also, by the help of the same faculties, made the progress from the state of monkeys and baboons, while all other animals are the same from one generation to another, and have made not a single step for sixty centuries, and never have attempted, in a single instance, to store up for after times the experience of a former age, our faculties must needs be immeasurably superior to theirs. In short, the only question is as to the nature of the difference.

Some of the facts given in the discussion of instinct are, we think, of questionable authority; though the observation of living persons could furnish many more instances, equally striking, especially of animal intelligence. The singular fact gravely stated about the instinct of newly-farrowed pigs, when the litter is so numerous that each suckling cannot appropriate a teat to its sole use, must, we presume, be a type or political allegory; the farrowing sow signifying the present Whig party, which, not being able, all at once, to provide sustenance for its numerous brood, leaves a part to amuse themselves by sucking their cunninger neighbours' tails, till they die of inanition; unless their political fathers, like human nursing mothers, contrive a few supplementary teats, named Commissions, &c., to which the sustaining fluid may be copiously supplied by that good and useful milch cow, the Commonwealth.

We have said that Lord Brougham, in the Discourse on the Origin of Evil, sets out by asserting that mere human faculties can never resolve the problem—in other words, that no second Newton can arise to explain and reconcile what appear mortal inconsistencies, by shewing them to depend on general and immutable laws; and that, failing to perform completely what appears impossibility, Lord Brougham philosophizes on the mysterious subject in a pious and cheerful spirit. In support of this opinion we select our concluding extract:—

The mere act of creation, in a Being of wisdom so admirable and power so vast, seems to make it extremely probable that perfect Goodness accompanies the exertion of his perfect Skill. There is something so repugnant to all our feelings, and also to all the conceptions of our reason, in the supposition of such a Being desiring the misery, for its own sake, of the beings whom he voluntarily called into existence, and endowed with a sentient nature, that the mind naturally and irresistibly recoils from such a thought. But this is not all. If the nature of that Great Being were evil, his power being unbounded, there would be some proportion between the amount of ills and the monuments of that power. Yet we are struck dumb with the immensity of His works, to which no imperfection can be ascribed, and in which no evil can be traced; while the amount of mischief which we see, might sink into a most insignificant space, and is such as a being of most inconsiderable power and very limited skill, could easily have accomplished. This is not the same consideration with the balance of good against evil, and inquires do not seem to have sufficiently attended to it. The argument, however, deserves much attention, for it is purely and strictly inductive. The divine nature is shewn to be clothed with prodigious power and incomparable wisdom and skill,—power and skill so vast, and so exceeding our comprehension, that we ordinarily term them infinite, and are only induced to conceive the possibility of limiting, by the course of the argument upon Evil, one alternative of which is assumed to raise an exception. But admitting, on account of the question under discussion, that we have only a right to say the power and skill are prodigiously great, though possibly not boundless, they are plainly shewn, in the phenomena of the universe, to be the attributes of a Being who, if evil-disposed, could have made the Monuments of Ill upon a scale resembling those of Power and Skill; so that, if those things which seem to us evil be really the result of a mischievous design in such a Being, we cannot comprehend why they are upon so entirely different a scale. This is a strong presumption, from the facts, that we are wrong in imputing those appearances to such a disposition. If so, what seems evil must needs be capable of some other explanation consistent with divine goodness—that is to say, would not prove to be evil at all, if one knew the whole of the facts. But it is necessary to proceed a step further, especially with a view to the fundamental position now contended for—the extending to the question of Benevolence the same principles which we apply to that of Intelligence.

The evil which exists, or that which we suppose to be evil, not only is of a kind and a magnitude requiring inconceivably less power and less skill than the admitted good of the creation; it also bears a very small proportion in amount, quite as small as the cases of unknown or undiscoverable design bear to those of acknowledged and proved contrivance. Generally speaking, the preservation and the happiness of sensitive creatures, appears to be the great object of creative exertion and conservative providence. The expanding of our faculties, both bodily and mental, is accompanied with pleasure; the exercise of those powers is almost always attended with gratification; all labour so acts as to make rest peculiarly delicious; much of labour is enjoyment; the gratification of those appetites by which both the individual is preserved and the race is continued, is highly pleasurable to all animals; and, it must be observed, that, instead of being attracted by grateful sensations to do anything requisite for our good, or even our existence, we might have been just as certainly urged by the feeling of pain, or the dread of it, which is a kind of suffering in itself. Nature then resembles the lawgiver, who, to make his subjects obey, should prefer holding out rewards for compliance with his commands, rather than denounce punishments for disobedience. But Nature is yet more kind—she is gratuitously kind; she not only prefers inducement to threat or compulsion, but she adds more gratification than was necessary to make us obey her calls. How well might all creation have existed, and been continued, though the air had not been balmy in spring, or the shade and the stream refreshing in summer! How needless for the propagation of plants was it that the seed should be enveloped in fruits the most savoury to our palate; and if those fruits were some other purpose, how foreign to that purpose was the formation of our nerves, so framed as to be soothed & excited by their flavour! We here perceive design, because we trace adaptation; but we, at the same time, perceive benevolent design, because we perceive gratuitous and supererogatory enjoyment bestowed. Thus, too, see the care with which animals of all kinds are tended from their birth. The mother's instinct is not more certainly the means of providing for her young, than her gratification in the act of maternal care is great, and is also needless for making her perform that duty. The grove is not made vocal during pairing and incubation in order to secure the laying and hatching of eggs; for if it were as still as the grave, or were filled with the most discordant shrieking, the process would be as well performed.

The same train of reasoning is pursued with equal felicity of illustration and beauty of style; but we must stop short, having already exceeded our bounds, and under the entire persuasion that Lord Brougham's greatest and most enduring work—for such we consider these volumes—will be duly appreciated, without any elaborate introduction from the periodical press.

The Religions of Profane Antiquity, their Mythology, Fables, Hieroglyphics, and Doctrines, &c., &c., founded on Astronomical Principles.
By Jonathan Duncan, B.A. London: Rickerby.
Pp. 367.

A work of great value to the classical student, the philosopher, and the theologian, is here presented in a form so unpretending, and in a manner so unobtrusive, that it stands a chance of being for a time overlooked. In a very modest preface, the author states that one object of his work is to furnish young students with a key to the scattered fragments of oriental mythologies, and systems wield in the pages of Hesiod, Homer, Ovid, and Virgil, of which he rightly believes few lads studying Greek or Latin have any perception. A higher object of the work is religious. The author imagines that a knowledge of the Cosmogonies and Theogonies of Paganism might be rendered useful to the Missionary cause, particularly in Eastern countries. He thinks that Missionaries visiting those countries ought to be acquainted with the general principles on which the prevailing heathenism is founded, and that more progress might have been made had they been aware of the nature of the prejudices and superstitions which militate against the introduction of Christianity. But this work itself shews how every system has been corrupted and distorted—what was originally pure and exalted philosophy degenerating into gross and depraving superstition; so that Christianity has not suffered more from priestcraft, than the systems invented by ancient philosophy from the corruptions engrafted on them by the sacerdotal order. One of the best achievements of the work is to present the original doctrines and opinions of Pagan philosophers free of the distortions, encrustations, and defilements which have grown upon them. Much curious learning and speculation is employed in the task of laying open the original Purgatory and the Elysium of Plato—the first ideas of the soul of the universe, and the soul of man—its fall and recovery—the origin of evil, and those other lofty topics which have in all ages exercised the highest intellects. The exposition of the Astro-theological machinery of the ancients, and the astronomical solution of their fables connected with the zodiacal signs, the constellations, the metempsychosis, idol worship, mysteries, and initiations, display a vast fund of curious learning, and open fields of speculation which are rarely traversed in this country. A more popular portion of the work will be that where the author shews Paganism imperceptibly gliding into a corrupted form of Christianity; the Janus of Ovid, or rather of Heathen mythology, assuming the form, attributes, privileges, and functions of the Pope. The coincidence, if it be no more, is remarkable. We shall cite but one sentence—"The outward symbols of authority attributed by Ovid to Janus exactly correspond with those of the Pope; for Janus is represented holding the cross in the right hand, and the key in the left. Ovid also calls him the key-bearing god—Clavigerum Deum." The successor of St Peter holds the keys of Heaven and Hell; and Janus possessed equal power, being propitiated with frankincense to permit homage being paid to the gods by the worshippers. The history of purgatory given by our author shews, in a striking light, the manner in which doctrines may become corrupted. It is traced to the Phœnicians, a commercial people, who, by an indelible law, denied funeral-rites to fraudulent debtors. Greece was colonized by Phœnician navigators, who introduced Sabeism, their own religion; and Greece in turn transmitted the faith of Sabeism, but exceedingly perverted, to the Romans. Among other perversions, the original moral purpose of refusing funeral-rites was forgotten—and in the "Æneid," Palinurus is described as being in the intermediate state of punishment, or purgatory, for no fault of his own, but simply because his body had not received the sacred rites of sepulture, which his shade implores Æneas to bestow upon his remains. The Romans had thus lost sight of the original use of the doctrine, and merely held it as a tradition or religious truth communicated by their ancestors. Now we cite the author:—

But if the pagan Romans merit censure for having perverted the original idea of purgatory, the modern Catholic Church deserves severer reprobation. It is well known that all comedians are excluded from the rites of burial in consecrated ground by the Romanists. The reason was this:—In the early ages of the church, sacred dramas were performed, called Moralities and Mysteries, by actors employed by the clergy, who appropriated to themselves all the profits over and above the salaries of the performers. . . . This impious mummery was a rich source of profit to the Church. . . . In progress of time, however, the spirit of the age was altered, and some bold speculators ventured to dramatize profane subjects. A competition thus arose between the old and new theatres, by which the receipts of the ecclesiastical monopoly were largely curtailed. To extinguish their rivals, the Catholic Church decreed that all comedians who performed in profane dramas should be denied burial in consecrated ground; and thus alarmed their opponents by the horrors of purgatory. In this manner a doctrine useful on the banks of the Nile, became absurd and cruel on the banks of the Tiber.

The Moralities and Mysteries of the Church, if less original and interesting than the author's solution of pagan fables and superstitions, will afford us a more popular specimen of his work; which, by the way, is more commendable for matter than arrangement, as if he were still more of a scholar and student than a literary artist.

So late as 1327, these exhibitions took place at Chester. The fall of Lucifer was represented by the tanners; the Deluge, by the dyers; Abraham, Melchizedek, and Lot, by the barbers; the Massacre of the Innocents, by the silversmiths; the Purification, by the blacksmiths; the Temptation, by the butchers; the Holy Supper, by the bakers; the Last Judgment, by the weavers; and many other Scripture subjects were dramatized at the expense of different corporations and trades. When the mystery of the Deluge was acted at Chester, the animals contained in the ark were painted on pieces of paper, and brought forward as the prompter called their names. To represent the Holy Ghost, a white pigeon was attached to a rope, and gradually drawn down upon the person who represented the Virgin Mary. . . . Mysteries were performed in the churches as a part of religious worship. In 1449, a canon of the Council of Cologne, prohibited these pious representations in nunneries, because the actors, by their profane and secular gesticulations, excited the voluptuous passions of the nuns. Performers were sent from the cities to the provinces; and the remission of sins was promised to all who frequented the mysteries. In all those pieces the principal part was allotted to the Devil. His horns, his enormous mouth, his fiery eyes, his clubbed feet, together with his tail and pitch-fork, produced a powerful impression on the ignorant and timid audience. The Devil was always accompanied by Vice, who was the gracioso of the piece. Vice pursued the Devil with a wooden sword, beat him, and made him blush, to the great edification of the devout spectators.

Numerous interesting extracts, present themselves in the course of the exposition of Pagan creeds; but, instead of any of them, we shall borrow our author's assertion of the universality of the religious sentiment as an ingredient in humanity. At that epoch in the progress of civilization when astronomy began to be cultivated, Sabeism, or the astro-theology of the ancients, took form, and was established. The institution of the sacerdotal order followed the imperfect development of the religious sentiment, and at once assumed its proper character, of kindling the passions, and working upon the hopes and fears of the vulgar, for its own advantage, and the maintenance of its authority; those hopes and fears growing out of the universal conviction which man has always felt, of his need of being upheld and protected by some superior, invisible power. Our author rebuts the opinion of the philosophers, "that fear first created the gods;" and he proceeds—

It is here contended that man is not religious because he is timid, but because he is man; in other words, that the religious sentiment is part and parcel of humanity, inseparable from its very nature, and essential to its existence. It is an indestructible principle; and so long as the nature of man remains unchanged, he must necessarily be a religious animal. The experience of history proves the position. Various systems of belief have existed and have perished, but man has never been divested of the religious sentiment in its essence; he has merely changed the outward form. He has never felt himself wholly independent of the external and invisible world; he has never fancied his own unaided powers sufficient to secure happiness; but, on the contrary, he has always been conscious of his own insufficiency, and has never ceased to entertain a feeling, however vague, crude, or indistinct that feeling may have been, of his entire dependence on some unknown and superior intelligence. . . .

Man, then, must be considered as an essentially religious animal, among the first and eternal laws of whose nature may be perceived a desire after happiness, and a dread of misery, accompanied by a lively and restless sense of hope and fear. These feelings have influenced every condition of society from primitive barbarism to final civilization; they lie at the root of all systems of heathenism, and form, as it were, a common centre towards which they all radiate. That the modifications of heathenism are various and dissimilar in their development, is true; but these relate to the superstructure, and not to the base of the edifice. Sacerdotal corporations never created the religious sentiment; but, on the contrary, the religious sentiment created sacerdotal corporations. The cosmogonies and theogonies of heathenism, the sacred fables, the doctrines, mysteries, and ceremonies, were certainly the inventions of the priesthood; but these must not be confounded with the religious sentiment in the abstract, which, in its essence, is an independent principle, co-existent with our very being. . . .

The priesthood could no more have originated the religious sentiment than created the circulation of the blood which circulates through our veins; their power was limited to the control and direction of it in its development. To accomplish their object, they rendered the religious sentiment subservient to those first laws of our nature which prompt us to seek happiness and avoid misery, while, at the same time, they kept alive the principles of hope and fear. In order to derive the greatest and most permanent advantage from this policy, they laid it down as a fundamental rule, that no direct communication could ever take place between man and the gods. The intercession and intermediate agency of the priesthood was declared to be indispensable, without which no blessing could be obtained, and no curse be averted. . . . The desire of escaping out of the boundaries of finity and limited duration, and attaining to the knowledge of infinity and eternity, and thus solving the grand problem of life and death, obtained for the priesthood the exclusive privilege of mediating between the creature and the Creator. The germ of this feeling may be detected even in that early stage of society when the juggler and magician pretended to control the occult powers of nature, by sacrifices and incantations. Man was easily persuaded that what he could not obtain for himself, another could secure for him. He anxiously desired a mediator between himself and the invisible powers, and that very desire created a priesthood.

The origin of this order our author assumes to be coeval with the first notions of astronomy. Sabeism, or astro-theology, which he has taken so much pains to expound, he considers the most grateful and elevated of the endless varieties of heathenism—as natural to man, unaided by the light of revelation, must necessarily have based his belief on some system of materialism; and there is nothing in nature so calculated to excite wonder, admiration, and reverential awe, as the starry heavens producing, on the one hand, the most exalted idea of the Governor of the universe, and, on the other, the most humiliating conviction of human insignificance. "Hence astronomy became a sacred science, and formed the chief study of the ancient priesthood. . . . In the progress of time, astrology became blended with astronomy. Then it was taught, that the destinies of individuals, and the fate of nations, depended on the stars. The three kingdoms of nature were subjected to their influence; cosmogonies were invented; theogonies were framed; sacred fables were composed; rites and ceremonies were instituted; and the whole of them were intended to illustrate the varied phenomena of nature."

These views open up the subject, and prelude a work, which, though sufficiently popular in style, may yet be one rather for the few than the many. The author acknowledges his obligation to several eminent continental theologians and scholars, and modestly intimates that, if there be any personal merit in his volume, it is "in the arrangement and simplification of so complicated a subject, and not in invention." Even the secondary merits of the volume, as a treatise on classic mythology, must secure it a favourable reception among scholars.

Bunyan's new biographer has not only brought the highest veneration and the warmest love to his task, but enthusiasm for his hero which borders on idolatry. The tinker of Bedford he appears to regard as the greatest among uninspired men. And Bunyan's is indeed a character and genius to beget enthusiasm, especially where there are many congenial feelings and sympathies. Here there are so many as sometimes to run fairly away with the sober judgment of the author. It may be concluded that, at this time of day, very few new facts could be gathered respecting Bunyan; the materials for whose biography would be exceeding meagre, save for the rich ore imbedded in his writings. Even in this secondary respect, the industry and research of the biographer have effected wonders; for he has gone to work in somewhat of the spirit which leads a Catholic devotee to the Holy Sepulchre, or a follower of the Prophet to Mecca; and the Bunyaniana which he has succeeded in collecting—the anecdotes, traditions, relics, and wit, make at length no inconsiderable figure, in addition to the information of former biographers. This, however, is but a subordinate feature in this new Life. Its main charm is a fervid, lively, and imaginative style, and the congenial feeling with which the complete portrait of Bunyan is worked out from his own materials—from his experiences, his confessions, and narrations.

The author has raised many conjectures, sometimes more plausible than well-supported—such as that Bunyan must have been a thief or pilferer in his heathen state; and woven most ingenious hypotheses, apparently sometimes for the mere pleasure of pulling them to pieces again. But the hypothetical and conjectural history, and these presumed powers of mind and influences from a variety of external circumstances and spiritual agencies, which often supply Mr Philip with a key-note or a text for speculation, are not the least racy and original of his incubations. Such speculations abound everywhere. Indeed the volume is half-filled with them. To make our meaning plain, we would refer the reader to the presumed influence of Bunyan's first wife in awakening her husband to serious thought, and winning him to a holier life; and we shall cite as a specimen, though a meagre one, our author's theory of those moods and aberrations of mind, which Southey calls "the hot and cold fits of Bunyan's spiritual ague."

The dreamer seems to have been, especially in early life, "of imagination all compact," swayed by every the slightest impression. Under the happy influence of his wife, Bunyan had become a much more respectable character in a few years after his marriage. Some said he was become "an honest man," others that he was "godly." A "famous" alteration was visible in him; and to hear of these things pleased him well; and he talked "bravely" about religion.—But we must go deeper into a story, in which Bunyan's historian becomes quite as personal to the reader as Bunyan himself, and displays idiosyncrasies which establish his aptitude to explain certain peculiarities in his hero's mental constitution, where more sedate biographers have failed. While the reformed Bunyan was living in the state of a Pharisee—though an unconscious Pharisee—he began to question the lawfulness of his favourite amusements of bell-ringing and dancing; and from an active ringer, he would now only look on. One day, he was lingering, looking at the ringers, when he began to think, "What if one of the bells should fall!" Then he placed himself in safety; but, again, he thought "If the bell fall with a swing, and then rebound on me, it may kill me." So he retired to the door of the belfry; for the delight of witnessing the ringing, in which he durst not perform, was not to be easily surrendered. But next came the thought—"If the steeple should fall?" and he was forced to abandon his sinful enjoyment altogether by this fourth and final alarm. In this anecdote, Mr Philip imagines he has found the key to Bunyan's hot and cold fits—his spiritual ague. He was sure to examine and scrutinize everything that interested him, and almost as sure to look longest at the darkest side, so far as it concerned himself; and now for the author's full explanation:—

Bunyan was not, indeed, a slothful man, to invent lions in the way, nor a nervous man to suspect lions; but he was a mighty and moody magician, to conjure them up, at all times, and in terrific forms. For let it ever be remembered, that it was the same powers of mind, all unknown to himself as talents, and all unbalanced by knowledge or example, that played the fool and the madman alternately with scraps of Scripture in early life, which afterwards invented "The Pilgrim's Progress," with the tact of Shakspeare, the wisdom of Plato, and the precision of Locke. The powers which created that work were sure to run wild while they knew not their own strength, and had no guide, and nothing delightful enough to satisfy their cravings when they concentrated their exercise."

This may not be very clearly laid down; but one knows which way the writer is groping, and fancies it may be in the right direction. Under the section, "Bunyan's Conflicts," we find a characteristic passage, which, moreover, explains what is a mystery to two-thirds of mankind, in a very rational manner:—

Every Christian has his childhood, during which he both thinks and says childish things, and gives way to childish hopes and fears. He is no philosopher who can laugh at this weakness. . . . It is a case of spiritual infancy in general, and often aggravated in its weakness by ill health and low spirits. It is not, however, a bad thing for any man to go through some process and degree of mental anxiety at his outset in religion. He would not be a better nor a wiser man without it. Personal religion is more than a new line of moral conduct. It is that; but it is also a new train of ideas, desires, and motives. It is a new line of conduct chosen for new reasons, and pursued for eternal results. The mind cannot, therefore, adjust itself at once to such that is new, noble, and solemn. It is thrown at first inevitably into some confusion, as well as ferment, by the vastness and variety of eternal things. To wonder at this is worse than foolish. Why, any great change of temporal circumstances, or even the transition from a small trade to a great one, will throw the mind into both ferment and confusion. . . . I have seen more men at their wit's end by worldly embarrassments than I ever saw by spiritual; and few have been brought into wider contact than myself with the inmates of the cells and wards of Doubting Castle. Who has not seen men on 'Change, and at their desks, as much confused, and agitated, and panic-struck by the vicissitudes of trade, as Bunyan was by the vicissitudes of religious hope and fear? I do not plead for and apologize for all his hot and cold fits in religion; but while both hot and could fit as so common in trade, I will not silently hear him called fool or fanatic. . . . It will be quite time enough for the world to fling gibes at the anguish of timid and tempted Christians, when her own bankers, brokers, shipowners, and merchants take panics and reports coolly. In like manner, it ought not to be a very amazing thing in a world where returned bills and bad debts make men sleepless for a time, if unanswered prayers or unsuccessful struggles to "keep the heart right with God," create some wearisome nights and days to recent converts.

Proofs are brought of this, not in the best taste, perhaps, although the cases were as well authenticated as they are apocryphal.

As we turn up the book, this pregnant sentence catches the eye :—

It is somewhat curious, as well as lamentable, that neither Wesley nor Whitefield saw, when they revived the doctrine of regeneration, that a child-like spirit is what the Saviour chiefly means by the New Birth. . . . How can preachers on regeneration answer to God for quoting this maxim so seldom?

There is some very curious speculation about Satanic agency in the chapters entitled "Bunyan's Relapses," and "Bunyan's Temptations;" and we could fancy ourselves reading a black-letter volume, composed some centuries since, in falling upon such passages as—

It will be allowed by every thinking man, that, if there be a Devil, John Bunyan was just the man he was likely "to sift as wheat." It was worth his while to keep him out of the Church of Christ, if he could. It required no great sagacity [in the Devil] to foresee that such a man would be a host in himself, whatever side he might espouse in the contest between Truth and Error. Bunyan could be nothing by halves. Besides, whatever he was or wished to be, he could not conceal it. Out it came by day or by night! He both thought and dreamt aloud. He talked to himself whenever he was alone; and had dreamt of Satan and his angels from his youth up. Satan had thus no great difficulty to find out the talents and taste of Bunyan. . . . He saw his weak side at a glance, and poured "fiery darts" into it without delay. Satan was more afraid of the Trinker than the Poet. He let Milton alone, but came in like a flood upon Bunyan; well knowing that a real Allegorist was more dangerous to the kingdom of darkness than even the Prince of Epic Poetry: and that the Apollyon of the Pilgrim would awe more than the Lucifer of the "Paradise Lost." I do not mean, of course, that Satan anticipated either picture of himself, but that he could easily guess how the two artists would paint him, and thus complete their comparative influence upon his own power in the world. It may be unusual to speak in this straight-forward way of Satan, but thus he should be spoken of if we would think of him or resist him as the Scriptures teach.

We own that it is very unusual. A chapter is devoted to "Satan and his Angels"—a singular one, whatever sober judgment may be formed of it. In speaking of the fall of man, and the first Satanic Temptation, he remarks—"No one can prove that even our first parents would not have sinned and fallen, if they had not been tempted;" and that Adam was actually not so tempted—the woman being the agent in his temptation. A train of hypothetical reasoning about the fall, not tending greatly to edification we think, is thus boldly wound up:—"It is worse than puerile, it is inexpressibly contemptible, to speak or think of Eden being lost by eating an apple. There is an awful though guilty sublimity in the ambition which ruined Adam and Eve. They fell from human perfection, by attempting to reach divine wisdom. They were angel-like in knowledge; they wished to be god-like in it too. Thus, it was for no trifle they periled soul or body."

A sturdy defence is made for Bunyan not ceasing to preach at the command of the authorities—the powers that were—and persisting in attending conventicles; nor is Dr Southey spared for his sophistical vindication of a tyrannical government, which would be quite as justifiable in hauling Mr Philip out of his pulpit next Sunday, and thrusting him into prison, as in persecuting and imprisoning Bunyan then. The time was different; but the principle of the acts is the same. Bunyan would not yield either from favour or fear.—"If I fly," he said, "the world will take occasion at my cowardliness to blaspheme the gospel." "Although still but a tinker, he had more influence as a minister," his biographer remarks, "than the Bishop of the diocese. His hammer had more moral weight than the crozier, and his bit than the mitre." He vindicates Bunyan's assertion of the right of conscience, Bunyan's disobedience to tyrannical laws, and his seditious contumacy, to the utmost. Bunyan's prejudices against the Liturgy.—Mr Philip uses the term prejudices—"will not prove him to have been," he continues, "a high-minded or hot-minded man, in the sense Dr Southey has called him so. He was too high-minded to submit to dictation as to how he should pray, or where he should preach; and too hot-minded to heed the ban of a bench, or the opinion of the squirearchy in matters of conscience and duty." Our author waxes warm on this subject; but his is an honest zeal. Of the acuteness and power of reasoning shown by Bunyan in his defence before the magistrates, we must give one instance. He was reminded of what is never forgotten on such occasions—the obedience to magistrates enjoined by the Scriptures. He confessed that Paul did own the powers that were in his day to be of God; and yet he was often in prison under them for all that:—"I hope you will not say that either Paul or Christ were such as did deny magistracy, and so sinned against God in slighting the ordinance. Sir, the law hath provided two ways of obeying; the one to do that which I in my conscience do believe I am bound to do actively; and, where I cannot obey actively, there I am willing to lie down, and to suffer what they shall do unto me." He was, as is well known, kept twelve years in prison. We should have liked to gather a few of "Bunyan's shame-devils"—his graphic denunciations of oppressive and persecuting landlords, unscrupulous dealers, and forestallers, and cheating hucksters. "Bunyan's Anecdotes," or many of them, are less to our taste. His prison amusements form an interesting chapter; and, spite of his oppressors, his long confinement must have been a season of tranquillity, and often of positive enjoyment. He had his Bible and Concordance, and the "Book of Martyrs;" he had a sand-glass and a rose-bush; his jailor was kind; and his cell commanded a view of the river and the road; and, while he tagged the laces which his wife and his blind child worked and sold for the support of the family of five children, he spiritualised, and allegorized, and typified, in prose and verse, and gradually and unconsciously prepared himself for his noblest performances. The fate of this blind daughter was the sharpest trial of his faith, the heaviest and bitterest of Bunyan's prison-thoughts. "My poor blind child lay nearer my heart," he writes, "than all besides. Oh! the thoughts of the hardship I thought my poor blind one might go under would break my heart to pieces! Poor child, thought I, what sorrow art thou like to have for thy portion in this world! Thou must be beaten, must beg, suffer hunger, cold, nakedness, and a thousand calamities, though I cannot now endure the wind should blow on thee." The examples of Bunyan's power of sarcasm, are happier than those of his humour. He did not spare the regular clergy of his age—the "trencher-chaplains" and "benefice hunters."

Would the people learn to be covetous, (he says,) they need but look to their ministers, and they shall have a foety, or rather a deadly resemblance set before them, in their riding and running after great benefices and parsonages, by night and by day: nay, they amongst themselves will scramble for the same. I have seen, that so soon as a man is departed from his benefice, (as he calls it,) either by death or out of covetousness for a bigger, we have had one priest from this town, and another from that—so run after these tithe-cocks and hand-fuls of barley, as if it were their proper trade to hunt after the same.

No small part of the value of this volume, is the embodying, in this way, the spirit of Bunyan's miscellaneous writings, and especially such passages and traits as reflect light upon his individual character, and the bent and peculiarities of his genius. The homely and quaint manner in which this is sometimes accomplished, is more in harmony, in truer keeping with the subject, than a more chaste and elevated style might have been; and, altogether, this rough but vigorous and animated biography of the most popular of religious writers, is one we should like ill to part with. Where other biographers have dug and neatly raked, Mr Philip has deeply trenched the soil, and brought out all its richness and vitality.

Statistics of the Colonies of the British Empire
By Robert Montgomery Martin, Esq.

These Statistics have been drawn up with great pains and care, and from the best and indeed the only authentic and trustworthy sources. The "Statistics of the Colonies" bear immediately upon Mr Martin's previous studies and researches; so that he must have possessed a mass of valuable systematized information before the papers of the Colonial Office and the India House were, by the liberality of Lord Glenelg and the Directors, made accessible to him. For a series of years the Colonial Office has received from each Colony what is technically termed a Blue Book, in manuscript, containing a variety of information, statistical and general, for the use of the Home Government. From these blue books, Mr M. Martin and his assistants have drawn the information which Government decline to metho-dize and publish, on account of the heavy expense of examining, condensing, and printing the information scattered through such a mass of documents. A work is thus produced by individual talent and enterprise, much fuller and better than any abridgment of official papers could have been, from combining their essence with the knowledge derived from more extensive sources;—a work, moreover, which will be found invaluable and indispensable to the statist and legislator, and whoever desires to become accurately acquainted with the state and prospects of the Colonies. The work, of course, contains numerous tabular statements connected with each Colony, and also a variety of historical and miscellaneous information. This book should be consulted by persons intending to emigrate.

Nature Displayed; being an Easy Introduction to Natural Theology, &c., &c.—By M. Pinnoek, Author of the Catechisms, &c., &c.

Mr Pinnoek seems to hold the opinion advanced by Lord Brougham in his new work, "That the form of dialogue appears eminently suited to the thorough sifting of a subject confessedly extremely difficult." This is accordingly the method adopted by Lord Brougham, and followed by Mr Pinnoek in his very meritorious little work. The dialogue is carried on by the Reverend Mr Beauchamp, and his pupil, Lionel; and seventeen Conversations give room for a rich variety of scientific illustrations of the important theme handled,

The Year-Book of Facts in Science and Art.

A useful and careful selection of such facts, in the different departments of Science and Art, as have appeared in the newspapers and periodical publications at home and abroad, principally during the last year. The design of "The Year-Book" is worthy of commendation. It is embellished, among other engravings, with a portrait of the late Dr Bowditch of Boston; and, if we may trust physiognomy, a most venerable, intellectual, and benevolent philosopher he seems to have been. The head and the expression of the countenance will bear comparison with those of any sage of antiquity. The facts in "The Year-Book" are well-arranged. As a specimen of the contents of a really useful volume, we shall copy a cheap and simple invention, of which the inhabitants of Edinburgh, at least, never stood more in need than this year :—

SIMPLE WATER FILTER.

The charcoal must be perfectly well burnt, and kept from exposure to the atmosphere. A test of good charcoal is, that, when pulverized, it sinks rapidly in water. The charcoal must be supported on an indestructible material, as a plate of burnt clay, perforated with holes. The filter may consist of a common garden-pot, or similar vessel, with holes at the bottom. The lower part may be filled with round pebbles, then smaller pebbles, then some coarse sand, and finally a stratum of pounded charcoal of about three or four inches in thickness. It is a great mistake to place any material, as sand, above the charcoal, with the view of arresting the grosser particles of impurity, as the sand will quickly stop up and be impervious to water.* A filter, prepared as above directed, will render water perfectly clear and sweet for many years.—M. J. T. HAWKINS.—Proceedings of the British Association.

Such is the homely, but useful matter which fills a considerable space in "The Year-Book."

Turnbull's Sketches from Real Life.

The Rev. Mr James Turnbull, a respectable Dissenting clergyman of Edinburgh, has produced a volume of life-like, and, indeed, we have no doubt, true stories, for the moral and religious instruction and improvement of his readers. They have numerous merits, and only one blemish; which it is, however, probable the writer may consider their highest merit. They are not merely serious, they are cheerless—more for warning than encouragement. However grave and earnest the preacher may be, the successful story-teller must condescend to amuse; and to study, as far as may be compatible with the higher aim, to "accommodate the shows of things to the desires of the mind." But, although the stories, being from real life, are generally of a gloomy character, some of them are eminently entertaining in their details. There is, for example, Crabbe-like truth in the story of "The Imprudent Marriage," and a good deal of quiet humour; and also in the opening scenes of "The Fortunate Old Soldier." In the name of humanity, we would offer thanks to any author, but especially to an orthodox Calvinistic minister, who composed a tale in the spirit which pervades "The Suicide." "Scenes in the Woods," a story of Scottish settlers in Canada, is another of our favourites. It is full of truth and trial; but it is, at the same time, healing and refreshing. We should imagine that the Scottish Dissenters, in the first place, will not be slow to appreciate the worth of this volume.

* To the above, we suggest a large piece of sponge laid over the charcoal, so as to fill the aperture through which the filter is supplied with water; which sponge, if washed now and then, will keep the implement in better order, and make it last for many more years.—E. T. M.

Letter to the Earl of Durham on Paying Members of Parliament, &c.

MARVEL REDIVIVUS, the writer of this letter, has, we presume, placed Lord Durham's name on his pamphlet, to ensure it some degree of attention. He is a Radical Reformer, going much farther than his Lordship, even on the one point which he discusses—namely, the propriety of paying Members of Parliament, which is, moreover, the fifth demand of the Chartists. Paying Members will not be conceded by the legislature one jot sooner than any of the other demands. But what forbids independent constituencies taking the matter into their own hands, and reviving a custom which, though fallen, like many other good, old, and constitutional practices, into desuetude, has never, we imagine, been disallowed by act of Parliament? We should rejoice to see Southwark, for example, revive the good old custom, and pay its able, independent, and indefatigable representative, so far as it is possible to requite services such as Mr Harvey's. Though far from approving of much of the course Mr O'Connell has steered for the last few sessions, we belong to the very small minority who approve the principle of the O'Connell Rent—unable to perceive how the means of life can be more honourably earned, either in the military or civil service of the Government, than in the more immediate and direct service of those for whom alone Government exists, and for whose interests only all its functionaries are supposed to be employed and paid. Of course, we limit this to periods like the present, when such services are eminently required, from the legitimate functionaries either failing in their duty, or acting in direct opposition to the interests of the people.

We carry this idea so far as to believe that the People have quite as good a right to indulge in the luxury of keeping a pensioner or two, as the Crown; and we imagine that the People's pensioner will, in every case, be chosen for reasons as fitting and as honourable to the individual. If Mr O'Connell discharged his duty to his country as he professes to do, how could the poorest peasant in Ireland more wisely contribute his mite to public purposes than in maintaining—nay, in enriching Ireland's friend and advocate, who refuses to accept of any other office, that he may be free to hold this, which, in these times, is the highest post of all?

The Gift for all Seasons. Edited by Wm. Anderson.

The Editor disclaims the name of Annual for his neat and pretty volume, as the design of it is higher than the amusement of the mere passing hour. But, if not an Annual, it is the likeliest thing possible to those favourite productions. It consists, like them, of tale, essay, and poem, and is embellished by pretty plates. Among the plates is yet another portrait of the Queen. The binding, too, is in the gay style of other gift books. In the literary and poetical departments we find contributions from Lady Emmeline Stuart, Campbell, J. Walker Ord, the Rev. Dr Morehead, Miss Pardoe, and others; and the editor, already known as the author of "Landscape Lyrics," and several volumes of fugitive poetry, has contributed his full share of prose and verse. Our brief specimen of this Easter gift-book shall be the song by J. Sheridan Knowles.

THE LOVER'S WISH.

"I send thee a wish, love! a wish send I thee,
Of love too true the token:
'A joy for each pang thou hast given to me,
A whole heart for the one thou hast broken.'

Wherever thy footstep lead thee by day,
May the cherub of peace hie before thee!
Wherever, at night, thy soft cheek thou shalt lay,
May the angel of sleep hover o'er thee!

"I'll tell thee what love is—thou taught'st it to me!
'Tis to love when thou'rt forsaken,
When the throb of the heart that's existence to thee,
For thee no more shall awaken.
Strong, strong was the light of thy smile; but, oh!
I'll tell thee, sweet, what's stronger—
The love which more bright than at first can glow,
Though 'tis fed by that smile no longer."

The Bouquet, or Ladies' Flower Garden.

This little volume is devoted to a description of the most common of those hardy or green-house plants which flower in rooms; and it contains a few remarks upon the best manner of treating plants in large towns, with their sunless and smoky balconies, and ill-aired sitting-rooms. The plants are taken in the order of their flowering, from January to December. Ladies will receive many useful hints for the in-door management of their favourites. Camellias, it seems, fail so frequently from too high a temperature, but above all from an unequal one. But how is it possible to preserve an equal temperature in English apartments, with open fires? The author recommends that camellias be kept in rather cold rooms, while the buds are swelling, and notices that over-watering at this period is the frequent cause of the flower-buds falling off.

The only Security against Popery.

This is a discourse lately delivered in this city, by the Rev. Andrew Marshall, one of the great guns of the Secession, and published by the Edinburgh Association for Promoting Voluntary Church Principles. Mr Marshall states that his discourse is the exposé of the principles of the Dissenters, regarding the Roman Catholics, and that from it Churchmen may learn how the Dissenters "wish to deal with the Papists, and how with themselves." "The truth is," he says, "we view Churchmen and Papists, and have all along viewed them, in nearly the same light. We have much cause to dislike both, and some cause to fear both, as long as they are Compulsories; and, for our own safety, and the public good, perhaps we might also say, we would at least divest both of their compulsory power." This is, at all events, plain speaking. The learned preacher sees security against the spread of Popery, in the Voluntary System only. Were all creeds placed on a level, he has no fear that the puissant will prevail. "The Establishment alone makes Popery formidable. Let that Establishment continue to exist, and it will probably pass, and at no distant day, into the hands of the Catholics." Had Mr Marshall limited his alarming prediction, or induction, to Ireland, we should be cautious of gainsaying him. He tells the Establishment they have cause to fear Popery; it has beaten them, and will beat them again—that is, unless they abandon the compulsory system. To this vigorous discourse are appended several important notes on the great controversy which shakes our land in its length and breadth, and on that new form of Popery which is openly rearing its front in the head-quarters of Church-of-Englandism—Oxford.

The Rev. R. Montgomery's Poems.

The first volume of a new and small, but very neat edition of these poems has appeared in Glasgow. "Satan," the first, and, we presume, still the most popular of Mr Montgomery's poems, occupies the volume. It has been carefully revised by the author, and is improved accordingly. We are glad to see Scotland once more sending forth such reprints.

California. By Alexander Forbes, Esq.

California, or, at least, its extensive northern division, (Upper California,) is destined one day to become a populous, productive, and highly-civilised country. The author of the volume before us, imagines that the dawn of that day has arrived, and that, if a canal, not much deeper than the Caledonian Canal, but sufficient to receive large merchant ships, were cut across the Isthmus of Panama, steam navigation, in all its power and magnitude, would commence in the Pacific, and that the colonization of California by the British might at once take place, and under highly favourable auspices. Even without this great desideratum, he considers colonization practicable.

The province is in a state of revolt against the Mexican republic, of which it is a nominal part; and our author thinks it probable that that government might be induced to cede this troublesome and anarchical portion of its nominal dominions to its English creditors, and that the latter ought to accept the ceded territory in lieu of the fifty millions of dollars, which there is but a slight prospect of obtaining in a hurry from any more feasible source. For the speedy occupation of California by the British, Mr Forbes offers many reasons. The Americans may advance from one quarter, and the Russians have already effected a settlement within the limits claimed by Mexico as the boundary of the territory of the republic. By far the greater part of the volume consists of a history of California, compiled from former writers, and from Beechey and recent navigators. As a piece of book-carpentry or joinery, it is well enough, and the account of the natives and of the Catholic missions, interesting reading upon the whole; but all that is of pith or moment in the work—the probable consequences of steam navigation on the Pacific, and on the practicable colonization of California—might have been put into a small pamphlet, and would then have better answered the desired purpose, if that be to awaken attention to the capabilities of another promising emigration field, the repayment of the Mexican debt, and the checking of Russian ambition. Would, however, that Russian enterprise never took a worse direction! Out of their own country, it is not without some truth that the Russians receive the compliment of being the Americans of the Old World—an active, restless, but intelligent people.

These gentlemen—we cannot at present call them fortunate gentlemen—who have speculated too deeply in Mexican securities, will lend a greedy ear to the suggestions of Mr Forbes, even while their hearts despond. He is of opinion that, if California be ceded for the English debt, the company of creditors ought to exercise rights of sovereignty, somewhat in the manner of the East India Company. Mr Forbes, like many other summary amalgamators and disposers of nations and tribes, never appears to doubt the right of Mexico to make such a transfer, nor to consider that there are, or ought to be, two parties to a bargain, though here there would be three; and the most important of all, the Californians, whether Indians or Spaniards, are to have no voice. The new emigration field—the slight, though, we fear, fatal objection, surmounted, of whether the people would admit British settlers—does look inviting.

For the comfort of Mexican bondholders, and as a specimen of the book, we cite the following eulogy:—

Taking every circumstance into account, perhaps no country whatever can excel, or hardly vie with California, in natural advantages. Its geographical situation is such as one would point out if he was desired to select the most favoured situation in the world. Its topographical relations are also most favourable. It stretches along the shores of the Pacific Ocean, and it enjoys all the manifold advantages of a maritime country. By its great extension from north to south, settlers have the option of selecting a climate suited to their health and views.

After a small side-thrust at other emigration fields, Mr Forbes continues:—

Some countries, although they are placed in the same geographical relation, are sandy deserts or inundated marshes; others are uninhabitable mountains or impervious forests; some are destitute of ports and rivers; while others are surrounded or possessed by savages, or bordered by shoals and unapproachable shores."

Having thus disposed of the Canadas, the Western States of America, and of Australia and New Zealand, for the above summary comprehends them all, our author proceeds with his own projected paradisiacal place of settlement.

"California, on the contrary, enjoys natural and local advantages equal to its geographical situation. Its soil is of the most fertile description, capable of producing the choicest fruits and grains in the greatest perfection and abundance. Its coasts are bold and free of danger, washed by the placid Pacific Ocean, and possessed of ports of the first order. It is also watered by abundant rivers; and there is nothing in the configuration of the surface of the country to forbid the eternal spring which its situation promises. There is found a temperature equally removed from heat or cold; and the range of hills which bound the maritime part of California to the north-west, shelter it from the only winds which might be apprehended seriously to injure the fruits of the soil, or to incommode the inhabitants. The situation of California for intercourse with other countries, and its capacity for commerce—should it ever be possessed by a numerous and industrious population—is most favourable. Its western shores on the Pacific, possess capacious ports. The port of San Francisco, for size and safety, is hardly surpassed by any in the world; and it is so situated as to be made the centre of the commercial relations which may take place between Asia and the western coasts of America. . . . It appears as if California was designed by nature to be the medium of connecting, commercially, Asia with America, and as the depot of the trade between those two vast continents, which possess the elements of unbounded commercial interchange—the one overflowing with all the rich and luxurious commodities always characteristic of the East—the other possessing a superabundance of the precious metals, and other valuable productions, to give in exchange. California is also admirably adapted for carrying on a trade with all the new republics bordering on the Pacific; and as its productions are of a different description from those of the countries chiefly situated within the tropics, it is capable of furnishing them with articles of indispensable necessity, which hitherto they have been obliged to procure from Europe, at an enormous expense, and often, from the length of the voyage, rendered useless, by the damaged state in which they arrived. California could furnish abundantly all those countries with flour, potatoes, salted provisions, hides, tallow, butter, cheese, wine, brandy, oil, olives, raisins, apples, and other fruits; as also with hemp or cordage, flax, wood, pitch, tar, &c. . . . Another commercial field appears to be gradually opened in the numerous islands scattered in the Pacific Ocean, with some of which, particularly with the Sandwich Islands, considerable dealings are already carried on by foreign vessels, and also by those under the Sandwich Island flag.

Even without a great canal cutting across the isthmus, or a railroad, our author imagines, that if a liberal and enlightened government were properly to encourage the attempt, California might be reached with little more difficulty than New Holland. "Tis a far cry to Loch-awe," as the Campbells say.

Letters of an Egyptian Kafir, on a Visit to England in Search of a Religion.

These letters, discussing the duty of theological inquiry, and the morality of human interference with religious opinion, and purporting to be written by a heretic or apostate from the faith of the Prophet, can hardly be considered genuine, though a preface, by an alleged English editor, asserts as much. They enjoin toleration, religious charity, and unbounded freedom of inquiry. If the writer, who directly attacks only the Koran, in which he proclaims his disbelief, had another though covert object, it will not, we think, be forwarded by the round-about scheme he has devised.

England and its People.

A popular history for young persons and children at school; professing the praiseworthy object of telling less about the mere kings and nobles, and more about the People, and their domestic customs and social usages, than histories of greater pretension. It stretches from Alfred the Great to Victoria the Young, and is decorated with wooden cuts, representing costumes of the periods, &c. &c. Tales of a Jewess; illustrating the Domestic Manners of the Jews. By Madame Brindlah. First Series.

If this be a genuine work, it is not worth much;—if fictitious, it is worth nothing at all. It is interspersed with what are called original anecdotes of Napoleon, and a variety of coarse or equivocal stories (even those of his own amours) related by a father to his young daughter Judith. Perhaps it is needless to mention ephemeral works of this sort at all, when it cannot be done without censure; but in this instance the title may mislead—and the book is in every respect an indifferent one.

SERIAL WORKS.

Among others, we may notice SHELLEY'S POEMS, vol. ii., containing the "Prometheus Unbound," "Hellas," and "The Cenci;" and, we regret to say, fewer autobiographical notes than we long for, though they are very interesting so far as they go.

Ure's Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures, Part VII.,

Announces the welcome tidings of 200 more pages and 240 more engravings than were originally contemplated, and no additional charge! Now, a thrifty public will say this is handsome. The author has been led into this enlargement of his work, in consequence of Mr William Newton, Patent Agent, and the proprietor of the London Journal of Arts and Sciences, permitting him to incorporate in the Dictionary many interesting details and illustrative figures of modern patent inventions, which must give great additional value to Dr Ure's excellent work.

Part V. of the Pictorial Shakspeare,

Presents the public with Richard II. This play gives room for much national, antiquarian, and historical lore, and for illustrative engravings of costumes and English scenery and antique decoration. Among other plates, are the portrait of Richard II. in the Jerusalem chamber—a view of the Savoy and of Bristol—a view of Langley—of Edward III.'s Tomb, and the exterior of Westminster. In brief, this Part is elegantly and profusely embellished.

Yarrell's History of British Birds,

One of the most elegant and beautiful of the Serials, has reached Part XI. and the end of the first volume. The cuts of the warblers, and the nests and faithful vignettes, are exquisite of their kind. We can imagine no improvement on this series, unless the author chose to bestow on the lovers of the feathered tribes a few more of those traits of bird-character which Lord Brougham would select as illustrative of Bird Intelligence. Those which are given throw a high moral charm over the book; bringing it delightfully home to human sympathies.

Pictorial History of Napoleon.

A History of Napoleon, lavishly embellished by wood engravings, from the designs of French artists, is appearing in parts. It professes to give an impartial digest of the best of the numerous publications concerning Bonaparte, which is to be comprised in a single volume; and that, we may say, a very handsome, though, perhaps, an over-dressed one. Part I. shews a redundancy of clever plates. The work is edited by R. H. Horne, Esq., who is well-known to the literary world of London, as the author of the "Exposition of the False Medium," and some dramas of merit. Part I., in sixty-five pages, carries us from the birth of Napoleon to his splendid campaign in Italy. The work is executed with spirit and rapidity of touch, which does not, however, mar the precision of its details, nor efface the memorable points in Napoleon's life. We augur very favourably of this condensed and spirited history.

Christian Library Edition.

A selection of popular religious works are in course of being reprinted in an edition under the above name, neatly and cheaply, in the style for which we claim some merit, having first set the example in Tait's Magazine. There is one such edition published by Ward, and another by Warren, and there is room for both. Before us is Cecil's Memoirs of Newton, published by the latter for Ninepence, and in good form; and Krummacher's "Elisha," also very cheap, considering that it is given unabridged.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE appointment of Lord Ebrington to the Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland—a useless and expensive office—has given great offence to the Tories, because he had, on one occasion, expressed the same opinion as every man of honesty and sense entertains regarding the Church of Ireland. The state of the navy has given rise to much discussion connected with the bugbear of Russian invasion. We hope the Russians will send a large fleet into the Channel next year; for it will have the good effect of bringing our Ministry and legislature to their senses, and teach them that the middle and working classes are not always to be despised. How would they like the experiment of calling out the militia, and arming two or three hundred thousand volunteers at present, as was done in 1803? They have not forgot what took place in Ireland in 1781, we imagine. The militia is to be called out, we are told; but on a new footing. It is advisable to make some change.

SERGEANT TALFOURD'S COPYRIGHT BILL.—The interested opposition made to the Copyright Bill by the great publishers of London, last year, has been withdrawn, in consequence of an obnoxious clause, bearing upon their interests, being omitted. As it now stands, the bill will prove advantageous to those publishers who at present hold copyrights, or are likely to acquire them. In-

And, the extension of the monopoly from twenty-eight to sixty years, will prove far more beneficial to publishers than to authors. Authors will gain little by the measure, publishers a good deal; but the gain to publishers and authors will not counterbalance the hundredth part of the loss to the public. We retain the opinion we expressed last year—that the cases of Copyright and Patents are precisely similar; that an author has no more natural right to restrain others from copying or printing his book, than an inventor has to prevent others from adopting his discovery. In perfecting a mechanical invention, there may have been as great expenditure of labour and ingenuity as in writing a book. The inventor is allowed a monopoly, called a patent, for a moderate number of years; which is renewed if cause for an extension of the monopoly be shown. We cannot see how an author can be entitled to more. If Serjeant Talfourd succeed in carrying his bill, he will have accomplished an amount of public mischief of which his benevolent mind can have no conception.

SCOTLAND.

DR BOWRING.—Some of the Scottish newspapers have recommended Dr Bowring for the expected vacancy in the representation of Leith. The recommendation is, perhaps, premature; but, if a vacancy should soon occur in Leith, or any other mercantile town, a more zealous and efficient representative than Dr Bowring could not be wished for. That constituency will do itself honour, which chooses so worthy and accomplished a public man.

COURT OF SESSION.—We have received the annual return of the number of cases instituted and decided in this Court last year, and we think it forms a most convincing argument against increasing the judges' salaries, and for diminishing their number. The total number of final judgments, in litigated cases, pronounced by the five Lords Ordinary, is 507; 312 of which were carried into the Inner-House. The Inner-House of the First Division pronounced 162 final judgments, in litigated cases; the Inner-House of the Second Division 135; and there were 37 causes tried by jury; so that the real judicial business of the Court consisted in deciding 829 causes; for the causes carried from the Lords Ordinary into the Inner-House, cannot be counted. The decision of these 829 causes costs the country about £70,000 a-year for judges, clerks, &c., besides the expense of counsel and agents, paid by the litigants themselves, or £132 each, which, we shrewdly suspect, is more than the average sum at stake. If we look, however, to mere matters of form, which are, in reality, done by the clerks, without the judges once looking at the applications, we find a considerable appearance of business; for we have 501 decrees in absence, pronounced by the Lords Ordinary, 659 mere formal applications, presented to the First Division, and 386 of such applications to the Second. Small, however, as the business is, all the judges contrive to be in arrear. Lord Moncrieff had, at the date of the return, no less than 57 causes ready for debate, but not heard, some of which had stood on his roll very nearly a twelve-month. Lord Jeffrey had sixty-three, some of which had been on the roll since the beginning of March last year; and the other three Ordinaries were all, more or less, in arrear. Both of the Inner-Houses, also, were two or three months in arrear, though, as every one who attended the Court must have observed, they often did not sit more than an hour or two a-day. Why, with such a state of matters, the sittings of the Court were not extended, under the provisions of the statute 1. Gul. IV. c. 69. sec. 10, is a question which we hope some of the Members of Parliament will ask the Lord Advocate; for, if we remember rightly, there was a similar arrear at the beginning of last year. We are, therefore, glad to observe that Mr Wallace is to move, in the Committee on the Court of Session Bill, that the sittings of the Court be extended to eight months; for it is plain, from what has occurred, that no discretionary power in this matter can be entrusted either to the officers of the Crown or to the Court itself. Mr Wallace is also to move for an inquiry into the nature and extent of the duties of the Judges, and whether one of the Inner-Houses, and four judges, clerks, &c. may not be dispensed with, and a saving of £14,000 a-year thereby effected. Such a reduction would amply enable the Fee-Fund, so long felt as most oppressive, to be entirely removed. Another excellent proposal of Mr Wallace is, that, in future, all witnesses should be examined orally in Court, instead of the absurd, tedious, and expensive form of taking written proofs by commission; but, of course, all these valuable suggestions will be rejected by the combined Whig and Tory majority, who consider it a much better thing that the Minister of the day should have plenty of patronage, and their partisans plenty of places, than that justice should be expeditiously, cheaply, and efficiently administered.

Why, when business is so rapidly declining, the judges' salaries are to be increased, we have seen no explanation; but that the business is declining fearfully no one now disputes. An appearance of business is no doubt kept up by employing the judges in making up records, and other matters not at all of a judicial nature, but which ought to be done by the parties themselves or by the clerks of court. One half of the time of the Outer House judges is occupied in motions for an order to lodge papers, and other mere formal business; most of these motions are so much a matter of course, that no opposition, or even appearance, is made by the other party. We have, on former occasions, given returns of the number of cases brought into the Outer House annually since 1794, shewing a regular decrease of business. The last return we gave was for 1831, when the number was 1956; last year, the number was only 1486—so that the prediction in our last Register, that, in a few years, the Court of Session's "occupation would be gone," is amply confirmed. The sooner its primary jurisdiction is abolished, and it is rendered a mere Court of Review of the decisions of the sheriff and other inferior courts, the better. Four judges would be quite enough for that purpose, and a saving of £50,000 a-year would be effected.

NORTH AMERICA.

We never doubted that, sooner or later, our misgovernment of Canada would lead us into collision with the United States; and the event seems at hand, arising out of the North-East Boundary Question, the settlement of which has been so shamefully neglected by our different Cabinets during the last twenty years.—The judicial murders proceed in Canada without the smallest appearance of any attempt in Parliament, or elsewhere, to put a stop to them. Five victims have been massacred for the shooting of Mr Walker, as if the law could not be satisfied with less than five lives for one. It is amusing to hear the unhappy men who were implicated in the late outbreaks, stigmatized in journals conducted by military men, as robbers and murderers. Would any soldier hesitate, on a moment's notice, to proceed to the coast of France, and burn the first village he came to, and slay their inhabitants as they attempted to make their escape from the burning ruins? Soldiers talking of robbery and murder, forsooth! Do they think the expedition to Copenhagen in 1801, in time of profound peace between Britain and Denmark, the bombardment of the city, the massacre of the inhabitants, and the plunder of the Danish navy and arsenals, are forgotten!

AGRICULTURE.

LEGALITY OF IMPORTING FOOD FROM IRELAND. The flars have now been struck in the Scottish counties, and they are higher than they have been since the war. The highest flar price of wheat for East-Lothian is 78s.—double that of 1835 (39s. 2d.)—so much for the anticipated effect of the present Corn-Law in keeping prices steady. We suspect that in that county, as well as in other districts in Scotland where rents are paid in grain, however prosperous the landlords may this year be, it will be, in reality, a year of distress to the tenantry, before their rents are paid. But the high price will do them much good, by giving them a practical lesson on the operation of the Corn-Laws, regarding which the tenantry, as appears from the hundreds of petitions they have been pouring into parliament, are still woefully in the dark. We are glad to observe that Mr Bannerman is to call the attention of Parliament to the prohibition against the importation of foreign animal food. The following is the terms of his motion:—"Mr Bennerman to call the attention of the House to the 3d William IV., cap. 52, sec. 58, which prohibits the importation of beef, cattle, fish, of foreign tacking or curing, lamb, mutton, pork, sheep, swine; and to move that so much of the said act, as absolutely prohibits the importation of articles of food, be repealed."

We have, for years, been attempting to direct the attention of the public to this subject, for we believe it to be one of equal importance with the Corn-Laws themselves. The price of beef and mutton is, at present, 7d. per pound. We are convinced that, were the importation of foreign animals and animal food free, it would never be above 3d.; for it may be purchased at from 2d. to 2½d. in the continental markets, and one farthing per pound would pay every expense of importation. The Irish have already taken the alarm, being anxious to preserve the monopoly they now enjoy, in supplying Britain with cattle, &c. We beg, however, to inform them that by the treaty of Union between England and Scotland, Act VI., "the prohibitions, as now in force by the law of Scotland against importation of victual from Ireland into Scotland, does, after the Union, remain in the same force as it now is, until more proper and effectual laws be provided by the Parliament of Great Britain for discouraging the import of said victual." Whether such more effectual laws were passed by the British Parliament, we do not know, nor whether Scotch acts, thus ratified by the Parliament of England, (for the Treaty of Union is a statute of the English Parliament as well as of the Scotch,) can fall into disuse; but the Scotch acts, if still in force, will be found tolerably effectual. By statute 1703, cap. 9, Irish victual is prohibited to be imported under pain of confiscation of the vessel, the transportation of the sailors, resellers, buyers, and sellers, to serve abroad as recruits, and several heavy fines; and the same act prohibits the importation of Irish horses, cows, cattle, or beef; and, by 1705, chap. 1, Irish butter and cheese are prohibited to be imported, under pain of confiscation and heavy fines.

LETTER OF MR WHEELER, THE MANAGER OF THE SOUTH AUSTRALIAN COMPANY.

WE intend this time to let Mr Wheeler have the whole say. We have done our duty to the public—we have in no way changed our opinion of the rashness and delusion under which emigrants were rushing to South Australia; and, for the present, we give up the subject.

We declined publishing what Mr Wheeler calls proofs of the superiority of the soil, as these proofs were merely the letters of Mr Hack and other interested parties, which have been hawked through newspapers and pamphlets for above a year, and as we have not questioned the quality of the soil. We may also congratulate Mr Wheeler on £5760 having been obtained last season, by the sale of 5760 acres. This sum will not, we fear, add much to the labour-fund; but it may clear above one half year's interest of a debt bearing 10 per cent., which is already bearing down the energies of the infant colony. According to the statements of Mr Hutt, made in Parliament in June last, this debt was £60,000. It cannot now be less than £100,000.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN COMPANY, 19, Bishopsgate Street, Within.

London, 5th March 1839.

SIR,—I am induced to address you, in consequence of the article upon "Australian Emigration," in your last Magazine, containing some quotations from Mr James's work on South Australia, wherein false and injurious statements are made against this Company.

The "optional notes" stated to be issued by the Company's Bank, were invariably exchanged for specie, without any charge whatever. The "optional clause" was inserted in the first notes sent out, when a large stock of specie was considered dangerous in the infancy of the colony; but the Company's manager found, on his arrival, that fear groundless, and forthwith announced that "the option" would never be enforced. It never has been. New notes, stipulating to pay cash on demand, were sent out sixteen months ago; and the old were immediately withdrawn, to remove all apprehension that the notes would not be immediately cashed. As silver coin (either British silver, or dollars) is the general circulating medium (with notes) in all the Australian settlements, the charge described in James's account-sales, if made at all, would arise from the holder demanding gold, (not specie,) which would, of course, only be issued at its current premium in the market, as gold generally bears a premium in all parts of New Holland. This Mr James knows well; and he also knew that the Company's Bank exchanged their notes in the current coin of the colony, free of charge. No charge was made for "these pieces of paper" as mere notes; but if loans by the Bank were taken in notes, representing specie, (which specie might have been obtained in their stead,) it could not be supposed that loans were to bear no interest. Upon Mr James's principle, the Bank of England now charges 3½ per cent. for the use of its "pieces of paper!"

The "Steam Flour Mill and Patent Slip, lying fathoms deep in the sands in May 1838," (penetrating eyes are Mr James's!) "rusting and rotting where it had been landed years ago," did not reach the colony until October 1837; and it is in a far better condition than Mr James insinuates.

It is not my intention to trespass on your pages. Still recommending the course urged in my unpublished letter—viz., searching inquiry—I shall only observe, concerning Mr James's work, upon which your article is based, that your readers should ascertain the truth of its contents, and the character of the writer. I thank you for the comments in your February Magazine. Your article of December wished for other proofs of the superiority of the soil of South Australia than the statements of the officials: my letter supplied those proofs. You state I should reply to Mr Gouger's work; but the paragraphs of which I complained were not published by you as quotations, but as original matter.

Cautioned by the fate of my last letter, I shall not expend time in further comments on "Australian Emigration." One fact I may give, which rather opposes Mr James's statements, and your ideas; and it rests not upon my "unsupported assertion," but is provable from official papers—viz., that, during the first five weeks after the opening of the land office in Adelaide, (from 25th July to 22d August 1838,) the colonists alone purchased 5760 acres of land at a cost of £5760; and town acres in Adelaide were selling at £190, £225, and £300, and upwards, each. Strange, infatuated people, with open eyes, thus to spend their money on "this new Utopia!!!"

Perhaps your sense of justice will procure the insertion of this letter. As Mr James's book contains its own cure, when wholly read by an intelligent inquirer, I should have left his statements to find credit where they could; but to judge fairly of his accuracy, the entire work must be examined. Your space would only allow of extracts; and, as some of these extracts reflect upon this Company, and, by their appearance in your columns, obtain a larger circulation than they would otherwise procure, I think I may claim the insertion of an antidote to unfounded calumnies, which you have inadvertently aided in promulgating against this Company.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,
EDMUND J. WHEELER, Manager.

THE WHIG RESPITE.

It is now above two years since, being ourselves easily consolable, we endeavoured to administer to the more timid Reformers certain prospective "Consolations under the Whig downfall." That great national calamity seemed then imminent. The death of King William intervened, and for the Whigs most opportunely; and the carpet-knight talents of the Premier, the favour of the Crown, and what seemed a firmer seat in office than ever, gave imagined impunity to those Finality fancies of which comparatively nothing had been heard till then. We have, however, no intention of expatiating upon the past misconduct of Ministers. Such attachments were never less required than now, when every eye, capable of clear vision, is wide awake, if not sealed by gold or hope. Here they are, "still in Downing Street!" according to the old exulting boast; and, although there have been frequent occasions within the last two years, when the Reformers of our school would have seen them turned out with unmingled satisfaction, this last "crisis" was not one of those. It would, upon the whole, have been a pity to see the Government obtain their rich deservings for what has been the least blameworthy part of their conduct.

In Ireland, the Whig policy, if neither sound nor comprehensive, has been studiously conciliatory and soothing to the great body of the nation. Under Lord Mulgrave's sway, the Irish, or a great proportion of them, have considered themselves, for the first time, well treated, even if their permanent interests should not have been considered; and this goes a far way with a people whom injustice and oppression have reduced to that unsafe social condition when men value sympathy and small marks of favour, or haply the gratification of their revenge on their implacable enemies, far more than the substantial justice which alone can permanently benefit them. That the Irish people have been reduced to this unhealthy state, is, after all, not the fault of the Whigs.—Let us not be misunderstood. Although their government of Ireland had been as liberal, equable, sagacious, and far-seeing, as it has been gracious and conciliatory to one great section of the people, that could give the Whigs no claim whatever to be maintained in office, neglecting or mismanaging every other great interest of the empire, and placing a bar in the way of reform and of practical improvement, more effectually obstructive than any which the Tories could interpose. Yet it is not on Irish ground that the Radicals would wish to see them finally demolished. When their day comes—and they are merely respited, not pardoned—their blood be on their own heads! the Reformers are guiltless of it; and, since Ireland demands the temporary remission of their sentence, the British Radicals have done well and wisely to grant it. The People of both countries must be aware that this one more narrow, neck-or-nothing escape from the very foot of the gallows, the Ministry owe solely to Radical forbearance and wisdom, and to that generous sympathy with Ireland which the Whig Government knows how to sport with and abuse. It is the Radicals that have once more cut the Tory noose, and afforded farther days of grace, to be again, we have little or no doubt, abused in the self-same way with every former season given the Whigs for repentance and amendment. "Save a thief from the gallows, and he'll cut your throat," runs the ugly but true adage which forces itself upon memory. Confidence in these men cannot be easily restored, even if their actions seemed to justify returning confidence.—But, independently of Irish feelings, their temporary respite at this time may be justified upon broader grounds. In the first place who, at this most deadening period, were to succeed them? The most sanguine dreamer cannot imagine whence a really Liberal government was to come, or where exist the elements for it in a fashion that has as yet any chance of sufferance from the Crown or the aristocracy, though they abound in the country, may perhaps be found in the House of Commons, and must eventually come into play. We have already had an Earl Grey, generations behind his age, frittering away those glorious majorities, omnipotent for good, which the People intrusted to him, often upon objects small, worthless, or at best secondary; and trifling with the fairest occasion ever presented to a reforming statesman. The Melbourne Administration is not worth wasting words upon. It is a blot upon English history, as much to be despised as a national disgrace as condemned for its deadening and obstructive influence;—and in its worst faults, have not those men, in whom we are now called upon to confide, fully shared? Earl Grey's son-in-law, so far as he had power, did his best to chill the enthusiasm of the people at the opening of this "most auspicious" reign; and, at least, succeeded in shaking their confidence in reforming Ministers of his character and calibre. "The hour had come;" but the man, instead of being ready, was retrograde, a drag, a damper, a dead-weight upon the Movement, even at its slowest, most measured pace. For this, let his adherents, whoever they are, praise him. We shall not. From Tory vituperation, it would seem to be imagined, in certain quarters, that, under a different set of circumstances, Lord Durham might enact a different part. Those of his admirers who go so far as to deny that he has ever shewn a hair's-breadth of the cloven foot, are still silly pointing out Lord Durham as the Shiloh—the great Deliverer—the glorious Man! ready to enter upon his glorious mission! Where such absurdity is sincere, one may safely smile at it. For ourselves, the past—the great test of experiment—justifies doubt. But, if the Radicals be justified in withholding credulous confidence, they will never lack candour. Let Lord Durham give earnest Reformers new cause to praise him—reason for renewed reliance—and he will not find them either cold or backward in their support, or unreasonable in their demands. Our immediate hope remains what it has been again and again declared, during two years back—an honest, strenuous Opposition. All things duly considered, Reformers ought, we think, at this crisis, deliberately to prefer an Opposition, organized and matured by time and adversity, to another blind and sudden transference of the support of the Liberal representatives to any new Government which is at present possible—to any Government which, with whatever specious professions it sets out, must, from the nature of things, become much more like the old Tory image than that beautiful and beatific ideal, which a few enthusiastic persons are ready to worship, and in which many more affect to have faith.

Another cause of patient acquiescence in protraction of Whig power, is the inauspicious period at which an election would have occurred. The Tories must have dissolved Parliament. They would have been gulls had they not; and there is not the least chance that they would have let so propitious a season slip by unimproved. The Church and the Orange faction are more active than ever; the Corn-Law agitation has excited panic in the landowners and their dependents; the Court has lost all credit and moral weight; and, worse than all, the ill-advised proceedings of the English Chartists, and contempt for the Government, have placed Conservatism more in the ascendant among the middle classes in the towns, than at any time within the last dozen years. In a new Parliament, the Whigs, already worn to a thread, without moral influence, and without numerical strength, must be nearly exterminated; but neither would the result be any great accession to the strength of the Radicals. Besides, our conviction is, that, though no assault be made from without, the Cabinet must soon fall to pieces—from its inherent corruption, worthlessness, and intestine jealousies—and no Radicals have to answer for it. With all his sins—and we have never slurred them—it is impossible to imagine a man like Lord John Russell submitting much longer to the leadership of the chief of the palace. If the honour of his Sovereign and the prosperity of his country be small in his esteem, which they cannot be, he must have some sensibility for his own reputation. But, looking to the certain, and, not improbably, the speedy dissolution of the Government from its own weakness—knowing that the Radicals have the power to swamp it as soon as the favourable moment arrives, and that no period could be worse chosen than the present, when a general election would give rather the expression of the selfish fears, the just indignation, and the angry disappointment of the country, than its calm sense—we see safety in the delay of Whig extermination. It is ever true wisdom to make the best of the bad; and the Reformers enjoy, besides, the left-handed consolation, that of the Whigs they know the very worst. They are opposed to everything in the shape of good; but they have rendered themselves powerless for further mischief. Did there exist any thing really approaching that mutual good understanding, consistency of views, and cordial union among the Liberal representatives, of which some faint signs are becoming visible, the sooner the Whigs got their mittimus the better. "Now is the time," cry some of the trimming Ministerial prints, on whose columns has flashed an efflux of golden new-light—"Now is the time for Liberal Members to come to an understanding upon certain main points, upon which they are at present notoriously divided"—such points, we presume, as the extension of the Suffrage, the Ballot, and a fair distribution of the electoral districts. Now, "the notorious" differences among the English and Scotch Liberal Members, are not on those points, and not so much about principles as men. One is of Paul, and another of Apollon; but few of the true religion. Lord Normanby has his section, Lord Durham his two or three adherents, Melbourne his minions, and Russell his supporters; and these fractional parts never can be properly united, until fused together by the common sympathies of an independent Opposition, acting upon consistent and intelligible principles, having no immediate hope for themselves, and being thus above the temptation of sacrificing their principles to interests bound up with those of their party heads. We, however, set little store by the arguments of those who would keep in the Whigs merely because the Tories would be no better, and would have greater power to be worse. The Ministers, to borrow O'Connell's figure, are as useful as the old hat stuffed into the cabin-window, to keep out the cutting wind—and this make-shift may do in Ireland; but a sensible Englishman would pitch out the unseemly stop-gap, and rather endure the cold wind, which would stimulate him instantly to find proper materials to glaze his window, thus securing to his family both light and heat. We hear, too, of a "spontaneous" Liberal government, which is to arise in a night, a blessed exhalation from the dissolving elements of the present Cabinet. We want faith here again.—It cannot come all at once; but true Reformers long for, and desire to hasten, by every means, the period when men shall be less, and principles more than they have ever been—when we shall see the beginning of a system of improved institutions, that will work of itself, independently of the great popularity of Lord This, and the vast talents of Earl That. In brief, it is clear that the cause of Radicalism has to undergo further sharp probation and trial before its final triumph. Its deepest injuries have hitherto not come from the Tories, but from the spininess, trickery, and obtuseness of its Whig allies. It is they who have quenched the growing spirit of freedom. It is they who have alienated and disgusted the people. It is they, from Earl Grey to Lord Melbourne inclusive, and whether as leaders or as functionaries, who have rendered Conservative principles, if not absolute Toryism, powerful and almost predominant among those enjoying the franchise; and who have sown division and bitterness between the middle and the operative classes, where, most of all, union and cordiality were desirable. Next to these evils, is the social condition of the working classes, which are not things of to-day, arising from temporary scarcity, or failure of employment, but which are of long continuance, and of which every new investigation affords fresh proofs.* Is this lamentable growing alienation and discord the fruit of the Whig Reform Bill, of the Whig Poor-Law, of the Whig-defended Corn-Law, and the Whig Finality policy? It was fondly believed, by some lingering admirers of Whiggery in the abstract, that Lord John Russell would, as he half intimated, explain his Finality declarations, and modify or qualify them, in noticing Mr Duncombe's amendment. So he probably, at one time, intended; but the Ministerial escape was certain, and Lord John held his peace. Even this was not so barefaced as the open desertion of O'Connell, with all that part of the tail which he can whisk round at pleasure—as his desertion of the men who had just suppressed their own feelings, and gone every fair length in defending Ministers, for the sake of Ireland alone. Their hopes, like those of all true Radicals, are now placed in an Opposition.

They saw the scattered elements of a more formidable Opposition in the present Parliament, bad as it is, than in any body of representatives that could be returned at this time, and hoped these elements might be collected. Yet some, and they the best of the old members, would reappear, in any event; and there would happily be no government-patronage, to neutralize or corrupt, to diminish or cripple, that small but purified body, which patriotism and reform objects should combine. Yet, for the sake of Ireland, they forbore hastening the trial; and Lord John Russell, once again safe, deigned no explanations, while O'Connell drew off his forces from his self-sacrificing generous allies. These things need no commentary.

But, if the Whigs have gained no honour, neither have the Tories mended their case by this last manœuvre. The Hibernian vivacity of Lord Roden, always annoying to his wary English friends, seems fairly to have precipitated the party into a serious scrape, and made it clear that it is not the Whigs that frighten Sir Robert Peel, but the high-flying Tories, and those impracticable Radicals, who, on great emergencies, choose to listen to the voice of duty and patriotism, and to forget the many provocations and indignities they may have received. It is not a little flattering to find Sir Robert so backward. What does he fear?—The Crown? Alas! in moral influence, and in intellectual strength, it never was lower. The Whigs—What are they? The Radicals, the Corn-Law agitators, the clamorous

* We refer, on this head, to a valuable and well-timed volume, entitled, "Arts and Artisans at Home and Abroad," which has fallen into our hands. It is written by Mr J. C. Symons, and exhibits, with the state of Manufactures, the moral and economical condition of the working classes, both at home and on the Continent. The present Corn-Law agitation, and the gloomy prospects of our most important manufactures, give immense present value to a work of which the statistical reports and facts, relating to the new foreign establishments visited by the author, too fully confirm the worst forebodings which have of late arisen. Mr Symons' duties as a Commissioner appointed to investigate the state of the hand-loom weavers, appear to have inspired him with the desire of pursuing his inquiries in a wider field; and he accordingly, with many facilities for acquiring information, visited the different manufactories, foundries, and machine-making establishments in Belgium, Prussia, France, and Switzerland, paying particular attention in his reports to those which are springing up in consequence of our unwise restrictions, and which are often carried on with British capital, and almost always set in motion by British skill. The result is a body of facts and information, regarding the progress of foreign manufactures, not too late to be available, if warning is not to be forever thrown away upon those infatuated, blinded, and selfish men whose ultimate ruin were of small consequence to any one, if it did not first involve that of better men—that of the whole industrious classes of England, the capitalists and working-men alike. How can the former class peruse the tabular statements, the statistical reports and pithy remarks in this single volume, without feeling the strongest apprehensions of the speedy consequences of the mischievous system of taxed food and restricted trade which they deprecate; or the latter class, without bitterly contrasting their enforced state of ignorance, suffering, and misery, with the happy condition of the labourers of Switzerland, Belgium, Prussia, and even with those of Austria and France, as depicted by Mr Symons? We can do no more at present than recommend the book to all who wish to see how the peace of the country is to be re-established upon the only sure basis—the prosperity of our home manufactures, and the well-being of the working men. It is demonstrable that neither of these are longer compatible with landlord-taxed food and fettered commerce.

Chartists, the hungry multitudes, the Canadian rebels, the Irish Catholics, the Russians, the Yankees? Truly, the catalogue is appalling! There is no end to such causes of apprehension; and Sir Robert, if not a bold, is a thrice prudent man in not yet venturing to turn his roasting chestnuts without a Whig paw to save his own fingers. While the crazy Melbourne Cabinet holds together, he will never want one. Humble and needy partisans may grumble; but Sir Robert Peel is a wise man. He gains his objects without price, and without responsibility. He has now little to fear for obtaining a respectable working majority, double to what the Whigs can command in Parliament I. of Victoria; but he works as conveniently with the Whigs while his own is gathering. It is, however, for the Reformers to consider the wisdom of permitting Sir Robert Peel to hang off and on, and take his own time. Though it be his policy to remain as he is, lest greater haste should make less good speed, we must have in the Tories.

Long have we preached up the manifold advantages of an organized Parliamentary Opposition—long prayed for one, united, honest, and vigorous; acting, by intelligible means, to a fixed end. It is in the ranks of such a body that our future Ministers must learn their tactics, and prove their armour. Reforming Ministers will never, or we are greatly mistaken, prove the spontaneous growth of either the Melbourne Cabinet or of Dublin Castle.

A UNIFORM PENNY POSTAGE.

THE THIRD REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON POSTAGE.

Nothing but the apathetic folly of the people can prevent the accomplishment of a Uniform Penny Postage, and that speedily. Since we drew attention to Mr Rowland Hill's plan of reform, eleven months ago, so many additional facts have been discovered and brought to light, so many fallacies have been detected, so many objections answered, so many difficulties solved, so many cavils silenced, the whole strengthening the case we then exhibited, that it is impossible for any man to dispassionately examine the subject, without coming to the conclusion, that the existing Post-Office system operates most injuriously against society; cruelly pressing upon the poor and the working classes, crippling trade, and hindering the labourers in behalf of useful knowledge, science, morality, and religion; while it is rather a drawback than an advantage to the public exchequer.

But those know little of the natural history of that most incomprehensible of all animals, the man in office, who suppose that, therefore, we shall obtain Post Office Reform. Pharaoh was the great prototype of official obstinacy. Nothing can bend it but a stormy demonstration on the part of the people. It willingly concedes nothing.

The Committee commence their Report by calling attention to the vast importance of the question to the country. "Since," they add, "on the management of the Post-Office, and the regulation of the Postage-rates, depends in a great measure the entire correspondence of the country; and in that correspondence is involved whatever affects, interests, or agitates mankind—private interests, public interests; family, kindred, friends; commercial business, professional business; literature, science, art, law, politics, education, morals, religion—every rank and class has an interest, more or less immediate, in the safe, speedy, and economical transmission of Post-Office communications." The first point of inquiry that engages their attention, is the receipts and costs of the management of the Post-Office. The discrepancies, however, which they find between the accounts of the Post-Office in the returns made by that department to the Committee, and those to be found in the Finance Accounts, oblige them to state, that they cannot place implicit reliance on the statements they exhibit. On the authority of the Finance Accounts, the following is for the year ending January 1838:—

THE GROSS RECEIPT FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM.

General Post, including
Country Penny-Posts,	£2,328,205 3 6
(The Country Penny-Posts are estimated at £47,307.)
London, Edinburgh, and Dublin 1d. 2d. and 3d. Posts, 134,064 9 5
	£2,462,269 12 11
Deduct repayments,	122,531 14 8
	£2,239,737 18 3

The expense of management during the same year was, according to the Finance Accounts, £698,632 : 2 : 2; the remainder, after deducting this charge, forms a tax—being about 236 per cent! The glaring discrepancy in the accounts of the same year is sufficient to prove the necessity of reform in this department. Something must be wrong somewhere. An explanation of the circumstance would afford the public a curious insight into the mode of doing things in our public offices, and appears to be demanded by the nature of the case. Mr Rowland Hill proposes many changes in the Post-Office management which would tend to simplify and improve it. But we must follow the Committee in their Report.

The principle upon which the rating of letters is at present carried on is, to charge according to distance. But this principle is most unfair; for, according to Lord Lichfield, while it only costs a quarter of a farthing to convey a letter by mail from London to Edinburgh—a distance of 400 miles—it costs nearly a halfpenny to carry a letter from the metropolis to Louth, only 148 miles; and the postage to the former is 1s. 1½d. to the latter 10d. Those who oppose a uniform rate of postage must charge letters according to the actual cost of transit, or fall into the absurdity of charging the highest price for the cheapest business. The Committee estimate the average general postage charged on each letter, including foreign letters, and reckoning double and triple letters as single, at 9½d. On General Post letters, (exclusive of foreign) about 8½d. Average postage on all letters, foreign as well as inland, including 1d., 2d., and 3d. post letters, 7d. On all letters exclusive of foreign, 6½d.

Having considered the scale of taxation, the revenue derived therefrom, and the cost of management, we are next carried to examination of the objects for which the Post-Office was originally formed, and the effect this tax of 236 per cent. has upon the revenue and the public. And what does the reader suppose was the primary object proposed in the establishment of a Post-Office? To swell the budget of the Spring Rice of the day? No such thing. The object stated in the 12th of Charles II. is "the advantage of trade and commerce." A cheap, swift, and sure post would, indeed, be a powerful auxiliary to both; but the present system is a millstone round their neck. It is curious to see the rates of postage in the reign of Charles:—

Letter not exceeding one sheet, to or from any place not exceeding 80 miles	2d.
- 2 sheets, 80 -	4d.
- 1 sheet, above 80 -	3d.
- 2 - - 80 -	6d.
- 1 sheet from London to Berwick,	3d.
- From London to Dublin,	6d.

Even in the reign of Anne, the postage from Edinburgh to London was only sixpence, or less than half as much as it costs in the days of Mac-Adam, railroads, and steam, with the schoolmaster abroad!

But what is the result of this upon the revenue of the country? It is reasonable to suppose, that the revenue has flourished in proportion as the rates of postage have advanced; but let us hear what the Committee of whose report we are speaking, have to say upon the subject. Since the year 1815, the Post-Office Revenue has nearly stood still; taking the average of the last five years, there is an increase of no more than £3,578 comparing it with the revenue in 1815. Whoever considers the immense increase in population, the diffusion of knowledge, the extension of trade, and the increased wealth of the kingdom, must see in this fact the certain result of over-taxation. But let us look abroad. The French Post-Office revenue has increased more than half since 1821. The United States Post-Office revenue has more than tripled during the last twenty years. From the report of Amos Kendall, the American Post-Master-General, to the President, it appears that, in 1837, the increase of the revenue was twenty and one-half per cent. over the revenue of the preceding year. Now, how have the French and Americans accomplished these results? Rowland Hill has discovered the secret. It is simply this. They are content with a tax somewhat short of 236 per cent. on the cost of conveyance, &c. Instead of attempting to screw a larger revenue from the people, their rulers enlarged the revenue by diminishing the rates of postage. They knew that many would write with a small postage, who could not or would not pay a larger one. The extinction of smuggling would tend to improve the revenue; and the best way to extinguish smuggling, was to compete with the smuggler. People will not violate the laws of their country, and run the risk of punishment, by sending letters through a channel that is neither safe nor responsible, without some strong inducement.

The Committee having left the state of the revenue, proceed to report upon the effects of the over-taxation. 1. The evasion of the tax by contraband and other means. 2. The suppression or diminished use of correspondence. On the first point, we need add little to what we have on a former occasion said. All the witnesses agreed in stating, that smuggling is now carried on to an immense extent. We mean all, excepting officers of the Post-Office, for Colonel Maberly said he did not believe it; and gave as his reason for doubting the testimony of the various witnesses, that when he was in Parliament, he always found that merchants over-stated their cases! This, he admits, is the only ground on which he disbelieves the oaths of many of the principal merchants and tradesmen of the country. But who can doubt the fact, that two-thirds of the correspondence of the country is at present smuggled? Mr Thomas Davidson, an extensive manufacturer in Glasgow, in his examination before the Committee, stated that he was acquainted with five manufacturers in that city, whose correspondence illegally transmitted, was to that transmitted by post, in the following proportions: First, three to one; second, eighteen to one; third, sixty-seven to one; fourth, eight to one; fifth, fifteen to one. Every mercantile man will believe Mr Davidson's testimony, in preference to Colonel Maberly's belief.

On the oppressive character of the present system, in suppressing correspondence among all classes, and more particularly social correspondence between the less wealthy classes, the Committee have collected a great mass of evidence, and express very decided opinions. "The evidence," says the report, "clearly establishes the fact, that the high rates of postage deter the public, to a vast extent, from writing letters and sending communications, which otherwise they would write or send." In spite of the multifarious modes in which the postage is evaded by men engaged in commerce or professional business, even those who have the means of evasion within their reach reduce their correspondence greatly below the standard, which, under other circumstances, they would think expedient. Indirect modes of transmission in most parts of the country are less accessible, less frequent, and less certain than the post. In very many affairs of business, unless the announcement be immediate, the occasion for writing has gone by. Unless parties, therefore, find it profitable to use the post, they forbear writing at all. Suppression of correspondence on matters of business takes place of evasion in proportion as the transactions to be announced or performed are moderate in amount, and the condition of the parties in life is humble."

"The multitude of transactions which, owing to the high rates of postage, are prevented from being done, or which, if done, are not announced, or are delayed to be announced, is quite astonishing. Bills for moderate amounts are not drawn; small orders for goods are not given or received; remittances of money are not acknowledged; the expediting of goods by land or sea, the sailing or arrival of ships are not announced, and insurances thereon are thereby prevented from being effected; printers do not send their proofs; the town-dealer does not inform his country customers when to expect the arrival of his traveller; the country attorney delays writing to his London agent, the commercial traveller to his principal, the town-banker to his banker in the country; branch banks delay remitting to their central bank; in all which, and many other cases, instead of communications taking place from day to day, as matters arise, REGULARITY, which is the soul of business, is dispensed with. In the greater number of instances, moreover, in which private individuals, companies or associations, or public institutions and societies, can only accomplish their objects by a wide distribution of circulars, or a very extensive correspondence, the usual case is to forego the distribution or correspondence, and with it the objects that were in contemplation."

The reader will bear in mind that this is a description of the working of a system professedly established for the "advantage of trade and commerce." The Report continues:—

"Thus the distribution of circulars from land-agents, announcing properties for sale; from wine-agents, stating the prospects of the vintage; and from corn-salesmen, of the harvest; from brokers of every description, advising the momentary fluctuations in the market; from traders, recommending their goods; from printers, publishers, and booksellers, forwarding their prospectuses, and announcing new publications; from fire and life assurance companies, stating the terms of their insurances; from manufacturers, enclosing new patterns; and from dealers, enclosing samples—are suppressed or greatly restricted."

Various other instances are cited, exhibiting the pernicious effects of the post tax on trade, &c. We pass to its pressure upon the poor. The Report quotes the evidence of Mr Emery, deputy-lieutenant for Somersetshire, who appears to have made extensive inquiry upon this subject. We select from his statement the following case:—

"The postmaster of Bamvell said—'My father kept the post-office many years; he is lately dead; he used to trust poor people very often with letters; they generally could not pay the whole charge. He told me—indeed, I know he did lose many pounds by letting the poor have their letters. We sometimes return them to London in consequence of the inability of the persons to whom they are addressed, raising the postage. We frequently keep them for weeks; and where we know the parties, let them have them, taking the chance of getting our money. One poor woman once offered my sister a silver spoon to keep until she could raise the money; my sister did not take the spoon, and the woman came with the amount in a day or two, and took the letter. It came from her husband, who was confined for debt in prison; she had six children, and was very badly off.'" He concluded by saying, "I am quite sure, if the postage of letters were reduced to 1d., ten times the number would be written by all classes of the people."

Now, here is sufficient to demonstrate the great importance of a uniform penny-postage to the country, and the absurdities and vices of the present arrangement. The primary object of a post-office has been lost sight of. Trade is severely injured; and a people remarkable for their religious respect for the laws of the land, are forced to violate them daily. Family ties are snapped asunder, and social intercourse prevented.

Without dwelling on the Report at any greater length, we may, in brief, state, that the Committee, finding that the chief expenses of letters—viz., the receiving and delivering—are common to all letters, whether going to a short distance or to a great distance, recommend a uniform postage. They recommend the abolition of franking by Members of Parliament and officers of Government—petitions, as usual, going free; and, as soon as the state of the public revenue will admit of the risking a larger temporary reduction, they think it will be expedient to subject all inland letters to a uniform rate of one penny per half ounce, increasing at the rate of one penny. When this time is to arrive, we know not. The recommendation looks like one of the to-morrow-come-never promises which nurses make to children—especially when we find the second resolution is in favour of a twopenny rate immediately. It is the opinion of the best informed persons, that nothing but a penny rate can effectually suppress smuggling; so that, if the twopenny rate be tried, it is possible that the system may not answer, and then we shall be thrown back upon Lord Lichfield and Colonel Maberly. The failure of Mr Hill's plan would perhaps gratify the vanity of those personages; but it would be a deep mortification to those who value the best interests of the country. We are opposed to the proposed half measure, and cordially recommend UNIFORM PENNY POSTAGE.

THE POPULAR SONGS OF IRELAND.*

THIS book will cause some disappointment. The reputation of the compiler, and especially the boundless scope afforded by the subject—the Popular Songs of the most joyous and jovial, song-singing, loving, marrying, drinking, hunting, racing, revelling, rebelling, tearing, swearing, reckless, and rollocking people under the sun, and one of the liveliest and wittiest withal—promised too much not to entail disappointment, for which the editor is hardly to be held blameable.

The greatest fault of the collection is of a character resembling what the lawyers call error in rebutantialibus. The book is, in fact, lamentably deficient in songs. Sixty-four songs, with frequent illustrative snatches of song, and a few variorum readings of favourite lyrics, however skilfully selected, can constitute but a specimen of the Popular Songs of Ireland. Specimens had, perhaps, been the truer title, while that adopted led us to look for an Irish compeer to Dr Percy or Joseph Ritson. Mr C. Croker has taken chiefly songs in vogue, and often those in merely temporary vogue; while his predecessors have filled stronger and higher ground, entrenching themselves among the enduring national lyrics of their country. There are in Mr Crofton Croker's selection songs which will not be considered popular at the end of another twenty years—if they deserve the name now, which we question. From the general character of the collection, we are led to conclude that the editor has preferred those lyrics which gave him the best opportunity of introducing the curious, if not very profound or recondite, information he has collected as to the birth and parentage of these fugitive lyrics. Another blemish is the predominance of what we are compelled to regard as mere slang songs—slang in idea, if not in phrase—and the introduction of the namby-pamby, and the clap-trap. For this error there may be reason, if the book is merely made to sell; nor has it been carried to any unpardonable length, though, in so limited a list as sixty-four songs, every lyric ought to have been a gem or a unique. Among what we consider purely slang songs, we may point at—"O Blarney Castle, my darling;" of the namby-pamby, that melancholic, caterwauling and superannuated ditty—"Shannon's Flowery Banks;" while we have a fair specimen of the clap-trap—a hit at the gods, and a sentimental side-aim at the two-shilling gallery—in "An Irishman's heart is as stout as Shillelah," an idea which the editor considers eminently original and felicitous, as if "Hearts of Oak" had not been Great Britain's ships and her men for above a century. These may be the popular Irish songs of theatres, Mason and Orange Lodges, and convivial parties of the middle class; but they cannot be the songs of the Irish people. They are not those sung round the farmer's fire-side, on a winter's night, by the girls spinning or knitting, or the boy clouting his brogues; or such as were warbled in the cabin before misery had quenched the light of song around the peasant's hearth.—Turn we to pleasanter topics. In 1789, or exactly fifty years since, Ritson visited Dublin, to "pick up songs, the native production of the country, either single or collected. But I met," he adds, "with little or nothing save disappointment. And yet I have good reason to think that some such compositions must either exist or have existed." There cannot be a doubt of this. But the schoolmaster had not been abroad in Ireland; and the humble minstrel, having no secretary or amanuensis, died unrecorded. Mr C. Croker gives his readers reason to believe that he has been more successful than Ritson, though this volume bears but slender evidence of the results of either antiquarian or popular research. The collection is, indeed, chiefly of modern date. Among the best songs, are the admirable and unique "Groves of Blarney," the parent, we may add, of a vile spurious brood; and two by Dr Maginn—spirited and truly Irish lyrics. The lays of older date which are given, are not novelties, though unexceptionable of their kind; such as the "Kilruddery Hunt," which Ritson published, together with a few more omitted here, as "Lille-bullero," and "Bumper Squire Jones."

Mr Crofton Croker finally explains the whole affair. He had made a very large collection, and was prepared to submit a series of historical songs to the English reader, from the Battle of the Boyne downwards, (probably to the slaughter of Rathcormac?) but his publisher demurred; and, we apprehend, wisely. The collection might have assumed a complexion too decidedly Orange for the taste of either the Irish or British public.

The songs adopted in the limited selection are classified. First, we have those in honour of the patron saint of the kingdom, which, as is well-known, are more remarkable for humour than reverence. The national emblem, "the green immortal Shamrock," is next celebrated. POTATOES, the Irishman's food, then shines in the light of song; and his beloved liquor, WHISKY, is the subject of no fewer than fourteen most laudatory songs. Nor is his favourite toy, "The Sprig of Shillelah," forgotten. Besides these, we have local songs, in honour of the "Beautiful City of Cork," of Limerick, and a number of other places. Among the flowers of the collection, are the serious-burlesque, Anglo-Irish songs, if we may use the term serious, to distinguish them from the purely idiotic burlesque. At the very head of these, is the classic "Groves of Blarney," of whose author, "honest Dick Milikin," we have this very interesting notice:—

Richard Alfred Milikin was born, in 1767, at Gwill

* The Popular Songs of Ireland, collected and edited, with introductions and notes, by T. Crofton Croker, Esq. Pp. 348. Colburn.

Martyr, a small town in the county of Cork, and was placed in the office of a country attorney, where he had the reputation of devoting more attention to painting, poetry, and music, than to the niceties of law. Having completed his apprenticeship, when he claimed to be admitted as a member of the legal profession, the gentleman by whom he was to be examined "thought proper to declare his having received information by letter that Mr Millikin, then present in Court, and claiming a right to be sworn a member of it, so far from being regularly initiated in the profession of an attorney, was bred a painter, and consequently was wholly unqualified for admission. This statement, so grossly false," says Millikin's biographer, "was promptly corroborated by a Cork attorney, who asserted that he could himself point out a person in Cork, for whom the young man in question had actually painted a sign. Such an attack, in such a place, was in itself sufficient to abash an inexperienced young man; but, when a recollection flashed on his mind of having really painted a board, at the request of a poor widow, (she was that attorney's nurse,) to place over the window of her son's shop, his embarrassment became so great that he was unable to utter a word; and, had not his limbs refused their office, he would have quitted the Court never to return. But, just at that distressing moment, an acquaintance of happier times, the good-natured, kind-hearted Counsellor Fitzgerald (as remarkable for his urbanity of disposition as complacency of person) happening to be present, and taking fire at the malicious falsehood, rose, and, in a very eloquent address to the Court, fully disproved the illiberal and unmanly charge; asserting, in his turn, that Mr Millikin—his school-fellow and early friend, who was designed for a higher walk in life than that he was now about to enter on—had not only received the education of a gentleman, but was possessed of those accomplishments generally attached to the character, one of which was drawing, in which he excelled, and which, till now, he had never heard attributed to any man as a fault, or considered as a barrier to professional pursuits.

"The consequence of this kind and reasonable explanation was his being admitted and sworn an attorney, and a member of the King's Inns; after which he returned to Cork to commence business. Young and unpatronised, however, he had little employment."

As professional employment, for which there are many candidates, must be courted rather than shunned as irksome, Mr Millikin was left with ample leisure to indulge his taste for literature and the fine arts; and, in 1795, several poetical contributions from his pen were printed in The Monthly Miscellany, a Cork magazine. In April 1797, he published, jointly with his sister—a lady who had distinguished herself by some historical novels—The Casket, or Hesperian Magazine, which appeared monthly until February 1798, when the political circumstances of Ireland terminated its existence.

On the breaking out of the rebellion, Mr Millikin zealously joined the Royal Cork Volunteers, and soon became a conspicuous member of that corps. He was subsequently, by the exertions of his pen and pencil, an active promoter of various benevolent objects in Cork. Mr Millikin's death was caused by water on the chest, and occurred, after a short illness, on the 16th December 1815. He was buried with a public funeral at Douglas, near Cork, and his loss deplored as a general calamity.

Millikin's papers are now in the hands of Mr Crofton Croker. The origin of "The Groves of Blarney" is thus traced in the Memoir of Millikin, published, with his poems, after his decease:—

An itinerant poet, with the view of being paid for his trouble, composed a song in praise (as he doubtless intended it) of Castle Hyde, the beautiful seat of the Hyde family, on the river Blackwater; but, instead of the expected remuneration, the poor poet was driven from the gate by the order of the then proprietor, who, from the absurdity of the thing, conceived that it could only be meant as mockery; and, in fact, a more nonsensical composition could scarcely escape the pen of a maniac. The author, however, well satisfied of its merits, and stung with indignation and disappointment, vented his rage in an additional verse against the owner, and sung it wherever he had an opportunity of raising his angry voice. As satire, however gross, is but too generally well received, the song first became a favourite with the lower orders, then found its way into ballads, and at length into the convivial meetings of gentlemen. It was in one of those that Mr Millikin undertook, in the gaiety of the moment, to produce a song that, if not superior, should be at least equal in absurdity to 'Castle Hyde;' and accordingly, adopting the tune, and taking Blarney for his subject, he soon made good his promise.

"'The Groves of Blarney,' which was received by the company with a burst of applause, soon rivalled its predecessor 'Castle Hyde,' and continued long the favourite of every laughter-loving party."

Millikin's intention was to ridicule the songs which ignorant Irish village bards—with a vast fondness for rhyme, an imperfect knowledge of the English language, and a pedantic ambition to display the full extent of their classical knowledge—were, and still are, in the habit of composing; and in Ireland, rhyme, or even the approach to it, is often far more effective than reason.

We shall henceforth adopt Mr Crofton Croker's reading of this National Song as the true one. It is taken from the author's manuscript. The fifth stanza is not Millikin's. It was an impromptu added at an electioneering dinner, and meant as a hit at the then Lord Donoughmore, who was present. This was the son of the Peer, we believe, of whom George III. is reported to have said, that, "If he gave him Great Britain and Ireland in a present, he would next ask the Isle of Man for a little cabbage garden." The wit is less characteristic of the King than of the rapacity of an ever-craving, needy Irish Peer. The Peer next in succession must have been as ready and adroit as this one was encroaching. When the new verse of "Groves of Blarney" was sung, he applauded the loudest.

In a very humorous speech, he acknowledged the relationship, thanked the author for his mention of it, and requested leave to toast the Murphys, Clearys, and Healy, with all others who, in the recent political contest, had ventured life and limb in support of the Hutchinson cause, and had thus made their blood relationship with him unquestionable.

MILLIKIN'S ORIGINAL GROVES OF BLARNEY.

"The groves of Blarney they are so charming,
All by the purling of sweet silent streams;
Being banked with posies that spontaneous grow there,
Planted in order by the sweet reek close.
'Tis there's the daisy, and the sweet carnation,
The blooming pink, and the rose so fair;
The daffodowndilly, besides the lily—
Flowers that scent the sweet fragrant air.
Oh, ullagoane, &c.

"'Tis Lady Jeffreys that owns this station,
Like Alexander, or Queen Helen fair;
There's no commander throughout the nation
For emulation can with her compare.
She has castles round her, that no nine-pounder
Could dare to plunder her place of strength;
But Oliver Cromwell he did her pummel,
And made a breach in her battlement.
Oh, ullagoane, &c.

"There's gravel walks there for speculation,
And conversation in sweet solitude;
'Tis there the lover may hear the dove, or
The gentle plover, in the afternoon.
And if a young lady should be so engaging
As to walk alone in those shady bowers,
'Tis there her courtier he may transport her
In some dark fort, or under ground.
Oh, ullagoane, &c.

"For 'tis there's the cave where no daylight enters,
But bats and badgers are for ever bred;
Being moss'd by natur', that makes it sweeter
Than a coach or six, or a feather-bed.
"Tis there's the lake that is stored with perches,
And comely eels in the verdant mud;
Besides the leeches, and the groves of beeches,
All standing in order for to guard the flood.
Oh, ullagoane, &c.

"'Tis there's the kitchen hangs many a stitch in,
With the maids a stitching upon the stair;
The bread and biskie', the beer and whisky,
Would make you frisky if you were there.
Tis there you'd see Peg Murphy's daughter
A washing praties forewent the door,
With Roger Cleary and Father Healy,
All blood relations to my Lord Donoughmore.
Oh, ullagoane, &c.

"There's statues gracing this noble place in,
All heathen goddesses so fair—
Boid Neptune, Plutarch, and Nicodemus,
All standing naked in the open air.
So now to finish this brave narration,
Which my poor geni' could not entwine;
But were I Homer or Nebuchadnezzar,
'Tis in every feature I would make it shine.
Oh, ullagoane, &c."

It is remarkable that among so loving and marrying a race as the Irish, there should be so few popular songs of love and courtship; and that, among so witty a people, we should find no strains of sly and good-humoured sarcasm, and unbiting satire—such, for example, as the Scotch "My Jo, Janet," or "Tak yer Auld Cloak about ye." Their popular songs of pathos and tenderness were, as we learn from poor Goldsmith, the Scottish "Johnny Armstrong's Last Good-night," and "The Cruelty of Barbara Allen." In the "As down by Banna's Banks," we have one Irish love song not of the boudoir class—one song which the criticism of Burns has stamped with fame. We are disappointed to learn that the sickening "Banks of Banna," of which, with Mr Hay, we heartily agree "that we have heard enough," was a vernal composition of the author of the finer song. He was Mr Ogle of Bellevue in the county of Wexford, and a member of parliament for Dublin, before the Union, against which he voted. His namby-pamby "Banks of Banna" was universally sung, and much admired in its day; its celebrity, probably, arising from the music. It was the subject of a ludicrous parody, with one verse of which we shall present Mr Crofton Croker, in requital for his overstrained admiration:—

"Shepherds, I have lost my wig—
Have you seen my jeezy?
Pride of every barber's shop,
It was so sleek and greasy!"

But Mr Ogle's more mature lyric, the favourite of Burns, is truly an exquisite song. Burns points out the touching line—

"How can she break the honest heart that wears her in its core?"

Ah, gra-ma-chree, ma colleen oge, ma Molly Ashore!"

Mr Ogle had the felicity of afterwards marrying this wayward, "darling Molly," who was a Miss Moore. "The Hermit of Killarney," another song in this collection, is attributed to Mr Ogle. It is the supposed effusion of a contemplative sage who has not outlived the sensibilities of youth, and who is melancholy without being misanthropic. The burden of each stanza is very fine—

"Adieu, adieu, thou faithless world!
Thou wast not made for me."

Mr Crofton Croker attributes the authorship of the famous "Boys of Kilkenny" to Moore; and, though the presumed author will not confess this pleasant sin of his youth, the circumstantial evidence adduced bears strongly against him.

1. Moore was a prominent member of the Kilkenny private theatricals, about the years 1802, 3, and 4.

2. The melody called "the old head of Dennis," was an especial favourite with Moore; to it he wrote his well-known song in the first Number of the "Irish Melodies," on the Meeting of the Waters in the county of Wicklow, commencing, "There is not in this wide world."

3. The internal evidence of the song itself. The luscious picture conveyed to the fancy in the concluding lines of the second, and the beautiful local imagery of the third verses, as well as the humour which pervades the entire song, partake more of the tone of Moore's mind than of the national character.

It was no doubt originally written for, and sung on the Kilkenny stage, and the last verse was probably an adjunct by the author when he sung "the Boys of Kilkenny" in England, where he became a permanent resident about 1807.

The Kilkenny theatre has been already noticed as a speculation of Owenson's. Mr Banim, in some gossiping letters on Ireland, published in a London periodical, says, "Until within the last few years, a private theatre was annually opened in Kilkenny under the management of Mr Richard Power, an accomplished and amiable gentleman, at which, with other characters of consideration, Mr Corry (Secretary to the Linen Hall) exhibited his very rare talents. . . . It was at these Kilkenny theatricals that Miss O'Neil lost her heart to Mr Becher; while the world consequently lost its first-rate actress. Mr B. was the Coriolanus of the amateur company, and became captivated with his present celebrated lady during the very last Kilkenny season, while Miss O'Neil was gratuitously lending her mighty talents in behalf of the widow and the orphan. It is said, too, that here, at a very early period of her life, and when retained as an accessory, Miss O'Neil met with a cordial and decisive encouragement, which materially influenced her after success in the metropolis. I have more to say to you about Kilkenny pic-nics. Tom Moore was for some years the Spado, Mungo, and Peeping Tom of the boards; and, by all accounts, a glorious little actor he made. I am informed that his Spado was a treat. Indeed, the character seems made for him. How I should like to have seen the Irish ladies eyeing him as he sung—

"Oh, lassies, of love can you fail,
With such a compact little lovey?
Though no one can taste the big whale,
Sure all love the little anchovy!"

And again—

"'Though wanting two feet in my body,
In soul I am thirty feet high.'

Here he recited his own melologue; and, as the final bit of tattle, be it added, here Tommy also met, wooed, and won his present good lady."

AIR—"The old head of Dennis."

Oh, the boys of Kilkenny are stout roving blades,
And if ever they meet with the nice little maids,
They kiss them and coax them, they spend their money free.

Oh! of all towns in Ireland, Kilkenny for me.

Oh! of all towns in Ireland, Kilkenny for me!

Through the town of Kilkenny there runs a clear stream,
In the town of Kilkenny there lives a pretty dame,
Her cheeks are like roses, her lips much the same,
Like a dish of ripe strawberries smothered in cream.
Like a dish of ripe strawberries smothered in cream.

Z

Her eyes are as black as Kilkenny's famed coal,
 And 'tis they through my bosom that have burned a big hole;
 Her mind, like its waters, is as deep, clear, and pure,
 But her heart is more hard than its marble, I'm sure.
 But her heart is more hard than its marble, I'm sure.
 "Oh! Kilkenny's a famous town, that shines where it stands,
 And the more I think on it, the more my heart warms;
 For if I was in Kilkenny, I'd think myself at home,
 For it's there I'd get sweathearts, but here I get none,
 For it's there I'd get sweathearts, but here I get none."

The two first lines of the last stanza of this song are taken literally from a sweet old Scoto-Irish song which we have never met with in print, and which goes thus—

"Oh, bonny Portmore! thou shines where thou stands,
 And the more I look to thee the more my heart warms;
 But when I look from thee my heart is aye sore,
 To think on the lassie I left at Portmore."

A hunter after the finer order of the popular songs of Ireland should "Try Glasgow," and Ayrshire, and Renfrewshire. Motherwell's Collection, we believe, includes some good specimens of the Scoto-Irish style. The song "One night when I got frisky," with the burden, "Oh, I'll never get drunk any more," is palpably formed upon the Scottish ditty—

"I'll never get drunk any more,
 I'll never get drunk any more;
 But aye when I smell good liquor,
 I'll just look in at the door."

The very popular song, "St Patrick was a gentleman," so often shockingly mangled and vulgarized in the singing of the English and Scotch, is, it seems, the joint production, or rather, we suspect, was only jointly sung at a masquerade in Cork in 1814, by Mr Bennett and Mr Toleken, in the character of ballad-singers.
 The third, fourth, and sixth stanzas of the common edition have since been added, the last by Mr Toleken. Though first in point of time, it does not, in wit, and brilliancy, and droll Irish humour, approach Maginn's "St Patrick of Ireland, my dear!" The Doctor calls this last a "theological song, containing the principal acts of the national Saint—his coming to Ireland on a stone; his blessed, never-emptying can, commonly called St Patrick's pot; his changing a leg of mutton into a salmon during Lent;" and other genial miracles. We should not imagine that even the most bigoted Catholic could carp at this inimitable lyric, the Irish "St George he was for England!"

AIR—The Night before Lary was stretched.

"A fig for St Denis of France—
 He's a trumpery fellow to brag on;
 A fig for St George and his lance,
 Which spitted a heathenish dragon;
 And the Saints of the Welshman or Scot
 Are a couple of pitiful pipers;
 Both of whom may just travel to pot
 Compared with that patron of swipers,
 St Patrick of Ireland, my dear!"

"He came to the Emerald Isle
 On the lump of a paving-stone mounted;
 The steam-boat he beat by a mile,
 Which mighty good sailing was counted.
 Says he, 'The salt water, I think,
 Has made me most bloodily thirsty;
 So bring me a flagon of drink—

To keep down the mulligrubs, burst ya—
 Of drink that is fit for a saint!"

"He preached, then, with wonderful force,
 The ignorant natives a-teaching;
 With a pint he washed down his discourse,
 'For,' says he, 'I detest your dry preaching.'
 The people, with wonderment struck,
 At a pastor so pious and civil,
 Exclaimed—'We're for you, my old buck!
 And we pitch our blind gods to the devil,
 Who dwells in hot water below!"

"This ended, our worshipful spoon
 Went to visit an elegant fellow,
 Whose practice, each cool afternoon,
 Was to get most delightfully mellow.
 That day, with a black-jack of beer
 It chanced he was treating a party;
 Says the Saint—'This good day, do you hear,
 I drank nothing to speak of, my hearty!
 So give me a pull at the pot!"

"The pewter he lifted in sport,
 (Believe me, I tell you no fable),
 A gallon he drank from the quart,
 And then placed it full on the table.
 'A miracle!' every one said,
 And they all took a haul at the stingo;
 They were capital hands at the trade,
 And drank till they fell; yet, by jingo,
 The pot still frothed over the brim!"

"Next day, quoth his host, 'Tis a fast,
 And I've naught in my larder but mutton;
 And, on Fridays, who'd make such repeat,
 Except an unchristian-like glutton?"
 Says Pat, 'Cease your nonsense, I beg,
 What you tell me is nothing but gammon;
 Take my compliments down to the leg,
 And bid it come hither a salmon!"
 And the leg most politely complied!"

"Oh! he was an elegant blade
 As you'd meet from Fairhead to Kilcrumper;"
 And though under the sod he is laid,
 Yet here goes his health in a bumper!
 I wish he was here, that my glass
 He might by art magic replenish;
 But since he is not—why, alas!
 My ditty must come to a finish,
 Because all the liquor is out!"

Mr Crofton Croker enters into the learned controversy concerning the genuine Shamrock, but throws no new light upon the question. On the whole he inclines to the authenticity of the common white trefoil clover, of which many inhabitants of Edinburgh may still remember pet-patches being carefully cultivated, that the Irish students, then thronging to our university, might have shamrocks wherewith to garnish their beavers on St Patrick's Day, or the 17th of March. An anonymous Dublin writer attacks
 Mr Bichen's theory, which assumes the woodsorrel to be the true shamrock. The Dublin writer evidently does not know what that beautiful plant is, and confounds it with common sorrel or sourocks. The wood-sorrel is of the most brilliant and delicate green colour, but of a warmer and lighter hue than the trefoil, which its exquisitely pencilled leaf considerably resembles.
 The trefoil is, however, the shamrock by proscription, and, like the Whigs, it would be a pity

* Fairhead is the north-east cape of Ireland; Kil-crumper is a ruined church, and ancient burial-ground, between Fermoy and Kilworth, in the county of Cork, the southern county of Ireland.

to disturb it in possession. The search for a four-leaved plant of trefoil is common to Scotland with Ireland, and probably to many other countries, and is held as the harbinger of good luck to the finder.

Of the songs in praise of the Potato, that addressed to Cobbett is the best. Colman's broad parody on Scott's "Boat Song" in "The Lady of the Lake," does no more deserve to be classed among the popular songs of Ireland, than a thousand other slang songs about Irish bulls and blunders. "The Land of Potatoes," is ascribed to Mr Owenson, the father of Lady Morgan. This gentleman was a comic actor of some merit; and in his own country and day was particularly admired in the personation of off-hand, half-gentlemanly Irish characters. Of Owenson, now best known through the literary reputation of his daughter, Sir Jonah Barrington says:—

He was highly celebrated in the line of Irish characters; and never did an actor exist so perfectly calculated, in my opinion, to personify that singular class of people. Considerably above six feet in height, remarkably handsome and brave-looking, vigorous, and well-shaped, he was not vulgar enough to disgust, nor was he genteel enough to be out of character. Never did I see an actor so entirely identify himself with the peculiarities of those parts he assumed. In the higher class of Irish characters (old officers, &c.) he looked well, but did not exhibit sufficient dignity; and, in the lowest, his humour was scarcely quaint and original enough; but in what might be termed the middle class of Paddies, no man ever combined the look and the manner with such felicity as Owenson. Scientific singing is not an Irish quality; and he sang well enough. I have heard Jack Johnstone warble so very skilfully, and act some parts so very like a man of first-rate education, that I almost forgot the nation he was mimicking. That was not the case with Owenson: he acted as if he had not received too much schooling, and sang like a man whom nobody instructed. He was, like most of his profession, careless of his concerns, and grew old without growing rich. His last friend was old Fontaine, a very celebrated Irish dancing-master, many years domiciliated and highly esteemed in Dublin. He aided Owenson and his family whilst he had the means to do so; and they both died nearly at the same time, instances of talent and improvidence.

Mr Owenson's song displays no distinguishing humour or elegance. The burden is the best of it.

"Hosp ality,
No formality,
All reality, there you ever see;
The free and the easy
Would so amaze ye,
You'd think us all crazy,
For dull we never be!
In the land of potatoes, O!"

To the imperial praises of Whisky made by Peter the Great, who, of all wine, said Irish wine was the best, and who drank accordingly, Mr Crofton Croker adds those of George IV., who, on his visit to Dublin in 1821, while he maddened all Irish brains with the intoxicating fumes of loyalty, had his own excited by the genuine poteen. Our author should have told that his Majesty had the good taste to forbid the appearance of excised or "Parliament whisky," at the royal table. His punch was made only of that "Which came from a still,

Brewed under a hill,
Where eye of gauger saw it not."

With the full fourteen Whisky Songs here put on record, Ireland must we fear yield the palm to Scotland in praising usquebae, whatever be their respective merits in the immense consumption of the beverage sacred to both nations.* The most remarkable new fact relating to this potent inspirer of the Irish muse is, that Big Jack Joyce of Connemara, has joined the Teetotal Society! Were this portentous joining anything more than an equivalent to the three months' vow to a priest, we should fancy the end of the Irish world at hand.

"On the poteen," says Barrow, "being produced, I hoped he (the aforesaid 'Big Jack Joyce,') would not oblige me to drink alone; but it was not without much entreaty I could prevail upon him to take a single glass, which he did only, he said, to welcome my arrival. 'Tempora mutantur,' thought I, and some of us are changed with them; for it was scarcely a twelvemonth since Inglis visited him, when 'room was found on the table for a double-sized flagon of whisky, and water appeared to be a beverage not much in repute.' The mystery was soon unriddled by his telling me that he—Joyce, of all men in the world—had become a member of a Temperance Society! and had taken a vow (on three months' trial) not to drink spirits, save and except on such an occasion as the present, and when necessary to do so medicinally. He, however, gave me to understand that he had taken his fair share of poteen in his day, and was nothing the worse of it.

"It is to be hoped," adds Barrow, "that this honest fellow will not endeavour to prevail on his poor neighbours to forego entirely this necessary beverage; absolutely necessary, as I am assured by a medical gentleman of great eminence, to prevent scorbutic habits in those whose chief or sole food is the potato, which Cobbett not improperly calls 'the root of poverty.' Rice has not much more nutrition in it than potatoes, and yet the millions of India and China feed upon little else; but they never eat it alone; it is either dressed in the shape of curries, or highly seasoned with pepper and other hot spices, which answers the purpose of whisky."

Before the progress of whisky, leper-houses, which, as Dr Ledwich observes, "were everywhere to be found" in Ireland, rapidly disappeared; and hence this healing spirit was termed the water of life, or aqua vite, which words, rendered into Irish, are usquebagh, emphatically called uisge; or, to use the expression of Sir Walter Scott, "by way of eminence termed the water," and from uisge is our common word whisky derived.

By the old physicians this charming cordial was recommended as a means of prolonging life; and it was, consequently, eagerly and universally sought after. Fennel-seeds, saffron, and other pungent matters were mingled with it; but these were soon found to be only whimsical adulterations of the sublime purity of an inestimable extract. Fynes Moryson, although little inclined to admit the excellence of anything Irish, says, "The Irish aqua vite, vulgarly called usquebagh, is held the best in the world of that kind; which is also made in England, but nothing so good as that which is brought out of Ireland."

Among the Local Songs, the best is the following by Dr Brennan of Dublin, the editor of the defunct Milesian Monthly Magazine, whose characteristic Monthly period was sometimes three months, and sometimes three years, as best suited the convenience of its eccentric editor.

* Can any of our readers furnish us, for our collection, with a copy of a droll effusion, composed in the character of a Highlander, in praise of usquebae, which contains this stanza:—

"When Shanet pe sick, and pe makin te palm,
Te wee drapple trink it pecherrish her pain,
It make her to sing, and te bowdle to pray—
Och! lang life to Donald and his Usquebae."

"A Connaught man
Gets all that he can,
His impudence never has mist-all;
He'll seldom flatter,
But bully and batter;
And his talk's of his kin and his pistol.

"A Munster man
Is civil by plan;
Again and again he'll entreat you;
Though you ten times refuse,
He his object pursues,
Which is, nine out of ten times, to cheat you.

"An Ulster man
Ever means to trepan,
He watches your eye and opinion;
He'll ne'er disagree
Till his interest it be,
And insolence marks his dominion.

"A Leinster man
Is with all cup and can;
He calls t'other provinces knaves;
Yet each of them see,
When he starts with the three,
That his distance he frequently saves."

The Irish Muses have many unfortunate or outcast step-sons, muchlike those of other lands. One or two smooth, sweet effusions, by a person of this description named Callanan, find a place here. In a young man they are promising and nothing more. The author was intended for a priest, and studied for some time at Maynooth. He left that seminary, offended his relations, and became a schoolmaster. At one period, in a fit of despair, he enlisted as a private soldier. Subsequently, he was patronized by Dr Maginn, and became an assistant in the Doctor's school. Callanan was also a private tutor. He was a thorough-paced victim to the Muses, or rather to his own indiscretion; and his little story repeats a warning often given, and too often in vain. He was indolent and procrastinating, and yet bit with that mania for instant publication, which is one of the worst symptoms of a poor poet. He fell into a decline, and died in Portugal at the age of thirty-four. Thither his generous friends—for he never wanted friends—had sent him, to be tutor in a family, and for the recovery of his health. His lyric "Sweet Avondu," is smooth and flowing, with a smack of the melody of Smollet's "Leven's banks," but destitute of the vigour and concentration of that beautiful poem. In the high department of genuine lyrical poetry, the Popular Songs of Ireland seem sadly deficient. Moore, where he has succeeded, is but one happy accident, and there is no other remarkable Irish song-writer. The flow of song, in the nobler sense, would indeed seem to have ceased of late over both the Islands.

Of slang songs, or what he designates as such, though many more of the songs are slangish enough, Mr Crofton Croker gives but one example, "De Groves of de Pool," written by honest Dick Millikin upon "the gallant Cork City Militia" returning after the glorious wars of the '98; or rather of "their advance back again," as he terms it Hibernically. One stanza is as good for our purpose as the whole—

"Now de war, dearest Nancy, is ended,
And de peace is come over from France;

So our gallant Cork city militia
Back again to headquarters advance.
No longer a brating dose rebels,
We'll now be beating de bull,
And taste dose genteel recreation
Dat are found in de groves of de Pool.
Ri fol didder rol bidder rol, &c"

Among the political and slang songs of that memorable period we can remember one which, from its sprightliness, deserves that Mr Crofton Croker, or some one else, should rescue it from oblivion. It appeared on a broadside, of which the figure-head was a French republican soldier mounted upon an ass, with the motto—a parody of the inspiring rallying word of that mad epoch—of ERIN GO BRAY!

"From Rochforte, in de Bay of Biscay,
Me come fer de very fine visky
To make de Jacobin frisky,
And Erin may go bray!

"Me get de meally potato
From de Irish democrat
To make de Jacobin fat, O!
And Erin may go bray!

"Me put into requisition
De girl of every condition,

And Erin may go bray!

"Erin may bray and kick, O!
But de Jacobin will stick, O!
As long as there's any thing to pick, O!
And Erin may go bray!"

Among the local songs, "The County of Limerick Buck-Hunt," written to celebrate a famous hunt which took place in the year 1735, is more classic in tone than most of those temporary local effusions. Among the ladies, toasted in bumpers at the dinner after the hunt, was the veritable Miss Alicia, or "Alley Croker," the true-love, as we are led to suppose, of the man "Who lived in Ballinacrazy." She was afterwards married to Charles Langley, Esq., of Lisnarnock, county of Kilkenny. A sampler, worked by the fair Alley, is preserved as a relic by a family named Baker, in Tipperary county. The author of "Alley Croker"—and why is it not included among "The Popular Songs of Ireland?"—was Larry Grogan, a celebrated amateur piper of the family of Grogan of Johnstown, County of Wexford.

One good song, "Dear Mallow, adieu," was written by Samuel White, the Master of the English Grammar School, Dublin, and the teacher of Moore (who has addressed a sonnet to his memory) and also of other distinguished men. He was a spouter, a rhymester, and fond of theatricals. He taught his pupils to declaim in the style of Mossop, Barry, and the elder Sheridan, who had been the associates of his youth; and Mr Moore believes that his taste has had a powerful influence upon the tone of Irish rhetoric, as most of the prominent members of the bar, and the pulpit orators, had passed under his tuition. This gay, happy, and unworldly old schoolmaster died at the age of fourscore.

"The Rakes of Mallow"—the bloods and bucks of that once fashionable water-drinking town, before steam whisked the fashionables of the south of Ireland over to Bristol, Bath, and Cheltenham—are celebrated in a song more truly descriptive than commendatory of the morals and manners of those gay youths. A few lines may suffice to depicture the daily life of an Irish back not very long since.

“ When at home with dadda dying,
Still for Mallow water crying;
But where there's good claret plying
Live the rakes of Mallow.

“ Living short but merry lives;
Going where the devil drives;
Having sweethearts, but no wives,
Live the rakes of Mallow.

“ Racking tenants, stewards teasing,
Swiftly spending, slowly raising,
Wishing to spend all their days in Raking as at Mallow.

“ Then, to end this raking life,
They get sober, take a wife;
Ever after live in strife,
And wish again for Mallow.”

One old historical ballad has now a double interest belonging to it. “The Entrenchment of New Ross” is supposed to have been composed in 1265, when the walls were in progress of being raised. It was written in Norman French by a friar named Michael Kildare, and was translated from the Harleian MSS., in the British Museum, by the lamented L. E. L. It is printed here for the first time. It is, however, rather to be regarded as a curiosity than as appropriate to a collection of Irish popular songs; yet it gives a singular glimpse of ancient manners. All the inhabitants of the menaced town took their turn of labour at erecting the defensive walls, towers, and bridges; every trade or guild working by itself under its separate banners and leaders. Even the women and ladies laboured in carrying stones; and, in honour of them, one tower was named “The Maiden's Tower.”

And thus we close Mr Crofton Croker's contribution to the Minstrelsy of his native country, commending what he has done, and hoping that, with the materials which he has collected, he may yet rear a broader-based, nobler, and more lasting monument to the honour of Ireland.

STEAM TO INDIA.

THERE are few subjects of more vital importance to this country than the promotion of steam navigation, since it is evident that the dominion of the sea will henceforth rest with that nation which is able to command the most powerful and efficient steam navy. Hitherto, however, Great Britain has not displayed that superiority which might have been expected of her as the first maritime power in the world, though possessing pre-eminently all the elements for creating a steam navy, and incited thereto by her widely-spread colonial possessions, which render the application of this power of infinitely greater value to her than to other nations. Wonderful as the power of steam is in every aspect, its adaptation to maritime affairs is its greatest triumph—a mode of operation almost miraculous, and which will ere long displace the ancient order of things, and change the face of the globe. Though the benefits of this new power are open to all the world, it belongs to Great Britain to secure the fullest measure of them; it is a power expressly suited to the circumstances in which she is placed—suited alike to her capabilities of exercising, and to the supply of her most urgent wants. The discovery of steam navigation was made for England, and it may almost be said that England was made for steam navigation. If the profoundest and most acute statesmen had combined for ages to advance the power and renown of England to its highest point, they never could have devised a project for applying the distinguishing natural resources of this country, its unrivalled mines of coal and iron, to strengthen that peculiar arm of its power, the navy, and to connect together and approximate all the various parts of this extensive and scattered empire; yet this has been rendered practicable without design; and experience has proved the possibility of effecting what it could never have entered into the mind of man to conceive. Henceforth, steam is the arm of Britain's power; and as this arm is strong or weak, must she take her rank among the nations. Should it so happen that, at this period of her history, some other nation, under less favourable circumstances, but more alive to the advantages of steam navigation, should suddenly avail itself of this new power, and supplant England on her ancient domain, with what shame and remorse shall we not look back on our past indifference to this subject, and with what scorn, the more bitter because well merited, shall we not be assailed by surrounding nations and by posterity! To be content with a mere equality with other nations, or with so trifling an advance as to encourage their pursuit, is to be in momentary danger of being outstripped; for steam navigation is yet in its infancy, and the improvement of a day on the part of any one of our competitors may throw us behind in the race, and destroy that prestige in our favour which is one of the elements of success. Having also more at stake than others, and greater capabilities for prosecuting steam navigation, we ought to be far in advance of all, to set rivalry at defiance, and pre-occupy the ground that may otherwise be taken from us. It is, undoubtedly, a great honour to have established steam communication with America; but there is another work to be achieved which has been too long delayed; and although it is on a far grander scale, the practicability of accomplishing it has been placed beyond a doubt—a comprehensive and well-organized system of steam communication with India, which would inevitably give rise to a regular steam communication with the Eastern Archipelago and China, with Australia, the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, and probably with many other parts. "Nothing so splendid in speculation was ever conceived. The country which adopts it is at once stamped as the most remarkable in the universe. For Great Britain, as a commercial nation, it is the most perfect realization of a scheme to protect, promote, and aggrandize her interests, that the brain of a statesman could originate. Boundless in its issues, it is bold, grand, unrivalled in its intentions. It opens to the vision England in the vastness of her empire, the plenitude of her power, at the climax of wealth and greatness. Approximating the several portions of a widely-spreading scattered dominion, by a power utterly miraculous, it gives the idea of Great Britain in a new point of view, as a novel phenomenon, as a nation of which the world had only to-day learned its stupendous and amazing features and resources." The work* from which the above extract is taken, has been written chiefly to advocate the route for steamers to India via the Red Sea, in opposition to that proposed by Sir John Ross round the Cape of Good Hope. By the former route the distance from England to Ceylon, the point of centralization in India, is only 6959 miles; by the latter it is 11,993 miles—a difference so great that it goes very far to decide the question. Before, however, entering into a comparison of the two plans, we must bring up our report of steam communication with India, since the subject was last noticed in our Magazine for September 1838.

It was then stated that an arrangement had been entered into between Her Majesty's Government and the East India Company, for a regular communication between England and Bombay, through Egypt and the Red Sea. This was far from being satisfactory to the parties interested, as it confined the benefits of steam navigation to one port in India, instead of extending them to all the presidencies, agreeably to what is termed the comprehensive plan; and it was also extremely doubtful whether the steamers would be able to make their way from Bombay to the Red Sea during the south-west monsoon, in which case the communication would be altogether suspended for three months in the year; but the East India Company could not be persuaded to venture on a more efficient plan, and it was at least expected that, as far as they did promise to go, they would render the measure complete. What has been the result? For several months the mails arrived with sufficient regularity, though not as speedily as was either desirable or practicable: but, when the public were beginning to place some confidence in this regularity, the mails ceased to arrive, and for three successive months not a letter was received from India! The Court of Directors had made no provision for the dispatch of the mails during the south-west monsoon; and when applied to on the subject by the East India and China Association, the Directors were totally at a loss for an answer. Whether this is to be attributed to mere negligence, or to a fixed determination to frustrate the scheme of steam communication with India, it is conclusive as to the point of again committing the management to the East India Company; and it is now the general feeling to take it out of their hands, and trust alone to private enterprise and support.

In the meantime, the comprehensive scheme for extending steam communication to all the presidencies was being agitated in India, and no less than £140,000 was subscribed, chiefly in Bengal alone, for the purpose of joining any well-organized plan that might be set on foot in this country. The steamers at present employed in India and the Red Sea, are about 600 tons measurement, and from 160 to 230 horse power each; these are acknowledged to be inadequate both in size and power, and Dr Lardner proposed to have steamers of 1000 tons and 250 horse power, which at that time was considered a liberal scale; it has been, however, enlarged by Sir John Ross, to vessels of 1200 tons and 320 horse power; and, lastly, Captain Barber has proposed vessels of 1500 tons burthen, and 600 horse power. The objection made to Captain Barber's plan, is with regard to the expense; doubts being entertained whether the returns will cover the great outlay required to provide and maintain steamers of this magnitude. Captain Barber estimates the first outlay for five steamers of 1500 tons, and two smaller ones in India, together with omnibusses and vans in Egypt for crossing the desert, at £335,000—or, to meet all contingencies, £400,000; and the total annual charge at £227,000, which, as it makes no provision for the steamers to be employed between England and Egypt, is more than double the amount of Dr Lardner's estimate; and he calculates that, if only one-half of the passengers to and from India were to proceed by the steamers, there would be a surplus income over the annual expenditure of £70,000, and as much more from letters, &c., making the whole surplus about £140,000 per annum. We will not venture to hazard an opinion as to the scale which it would be most advisable to adopt; but will only state that there is no undertaking of the kind more likely to command general support and liberal remuneration than a safe, rapid, and regular line of steam communication with India. In very many cases the civil and military officers would be gainers by paying £100 more for a passage by a steamer than a sailing vessel, inasmuch as they would arrive in India three or four months sooner, and for all that period be in receipt of their additional pay and allowance; or, if in India, they might retain their pay three or four months longer, and yet be in England as soon as those who embarked before in sailing vessels. There would also be a considerable saving in the outfit of passengers, which, instead of being provided for a period of six months, would be reduced to a supply for one or two months, with the opportunity of replenishing in their journey through Egypt.

With regard to the comparative advantages

* "Steam to India via the Red Sea, and via the Cape of Good Hope."

of the two routes, by the Red Sea and the Cape of Good Hope, we must, in the first place, observe that the practicability of the latter for a single steamer within any reasonable time is as yet unproved, whereas the other route has been brought to the test of experience. We know what has been done under a very defective system, we know all the dangers and difficulties that are to be encountered on that route, and we have therefore substantial grounds for forming an opinion as to what may be done under a more perfect system of steam communication. We will, however, take it for granted, that Sir John Ross's plan is practicable, and that a single steamer will be able to reach Ceylon in forty-seven days, stopping only at the Cape of Good Hope for twenty-four hours; on the other hand, Captain Barber calculates that, by the Red Sea, the voyage from England to Ceylon may be made in thirty-six days, a saving of eleven days, or nearly one third; and if Collier's patent boilers were used, and found to answer the expectations of Sir John Ross, the voyage by the Red Sea might be made in little more than half the time required to go round the Cape of Good Hope. With regard to time, therefore, there can be no comparison between the two routes; but there are various objections urged against the route by the Red Sea. 1st, It is said that there is danger of infection from the plague in Egypt; 2dly, That the route through that country may hereafter be closed or rendered dangerous by political events; 3dly, That the frequent changes from vessel to vessel would be highly inconvenient, especially to families; and, 4thly, That the passage from Bombay to the Red Sea is difficult and sometimes impracticable during the north-west monsoon. To which we reply—that the plague is a mere bugbear; it does not appear for years together; and even then, seldom attacks any but persons of the lowest class, or those who live intemperately. Of the many hundred persons who have passed through Egypt to and from India of late years, we have not heard of one who has fallen a victim to the plague, or even been attacked by it. That the route through Egypt may some day be closed against us, is no reason why we should not take advantage of it while it is open; and indeed that step at the present time is the most likely means to establish and extend our influence in that country, and secure the permanence of the route. The frequent changes from one vessel to another is at most an inconvenience of no great magnitude, as the passengers will not be encumbered with much baggage; and with Collier's patent boilers there would be no occasion to change at all after embarking at Suez. The last objection regarding the passage from Bombay to the Red Sea, applies only to the present defective system; and it is one of the objects of the comprehensive plan of steam communication, to remedy this evil, by carrying on the line to Ceylon, and from thence to Madras and Calcutta. If Collier's patent boilers answer the expectations entertained of them, they may as well be used in the Red Sea as round the Cape of Good Hope;

and it is only by supposing the same machinery to be used in both cases, that any fair comparison can be made of the advantages of each route respectively. The question will be whether passengers to India will prefer the unceasing annoyances of a steamer for a period of forty-seven successive days, exposed to many changes of climate, to storms, and especially to the terrible passage round the Cape of Good Hope, without any stoppage to relieve or intermit the tediousness of such a voyage, and without, perhaps, even a sight of land, except for twenty-four hours at the Cape; whether they will prefer such a passage to one performed in little more than half the time, relieved by the journey through Egypt, and thus divided into two short voyages of about ten days and fourteen days respectively? There is no doubt, in our opinion, that passengers would prefer the route by the Red Sea—the two short voyages relieved by the land journey mid-way—even though it should occupy as much time as the voyage round the Cape of Good Hope; and as both Dr Lardner and Captain Barber calculate that the voyage may be performed by this route in less time with the ordinary machinery than Sir John Ross calculates upon with the improved machinery round the Cape, there will be a saving of time, notwithstanding the disadvantage of using the less improved machinery. The main support of any plan of steam communication with India, is considered to be from the resort of passengers; and their convenience and accommodation must therefore be secured in preference to any other object. On these grounds the route by the Red Sea appears to us far preferable to the other, while, at the same time, it holds out other advantages peculiar to itself. The intercourse of travellers with the inhabitants of Egypt and the shores of the Red Sea, is not only a source of gratification, but eminently calculated, at the same time, to promote commerce and civilization, and also to strengthen the political influence of England in those regions. A constant influx of British subjects of the wealthy and educated classes must be highly beneficial to Egypt, which would thus be bound to us by interest—while the increase of our naval power in the Red Sea, would render that country in a greater degree dependent on our friendship. How widely different is the dreary and solitary voyage round the Cape, in the whole course of which there is not one object to be gained or hoped for till its termination! Again, the advantages of the route by the Red Sea, in a military point of view, will be evident, should it ever be necessary to dispatch troops with haste to defend the north of India, the scene of the present operations. By that route troops may be landed on the banks of the Indus in half the time required to take them round the Cape; the voyages being short, and little space occupied by water and provisions, a greater number of men could be shipped on the same tonnage, and, with the benefit of rest and refreshment in Egypt, they might be expected to arrive at their destination in better order than after a long voyage. But although we are decidedly of opinion that the route by the Red Sea is the best for passengers, and that it will generally be preferred by them, it is by no means unlikely that those who disdain to mix among the throng, and who require ample accommodation and exclusive society, will, to secure these advantages, take the Cape route. Persons of this class will be content to pay handsomely for their accommodation; but they will require to be provided for in a style far superior to Sir J. Ross's estimate for passengers—four shillings a-day—which is, indeed, a most miserable allowance for any description of passengers, the usual allowance being ten shillings a-day for each passenger. There is one object, however, for which the Cape route seems better calculated than that by the Red Sea—we mean the conveyance of goods, which it is both inconvenient and expensive to unload and tranship. We reckon that there are about 3000 to 4000 tons of valuable goods, such as silks, indigo, &c., annually shipped from India, which could bear to pay from £8 to £10 per ton more than the ordinary freight on sailing vessels, provided they could be landed in England in two months, instead of five or six months. The saving of interest for three or four months would make up for the higher rate of freight, and it is always an advantage to have goods brought to market with celerity. The same observations apply to manufactured goods, and other articles shipped from England. Now, if the steamers are able, as it is supposed, to carry 500 tons of cargo, a vessel might earn, in four trips in the course of a year, from £20,000 to £30,000 by the freight of goods. Sir J. Ross calculates the earnings for this period at only £12,000 from freight, and £28,300 from passengers. He estimates the freight at only £6 per ton, which is barely what is paid in sailing vessels, while we are disposed to allow more than double that rate on all valuable goods, provided they can be conveyed to their destination within the time specified. We must therefore reverse his calculations, and place the larger amount of earnings to the item of freight, and the lesser to passengers. If these views are correct, it would require only one vessel to be dispatched every two months or thereabouts, instead of one every month, unless the quantity of goods capable of paying a high rate of freight should greatly exceed our estimate.

There is ample scope for both lines of steam communication; but, if only one shall be established and brought to perfection, it will exalt the power of England to an amazing height, and render this country, indeed, the envy and admiration of the world. Competition will be set at defiance, for no other country has the means or inducements to undertake so grand a work, which time would consolidate by the establishment of various branches, all tending to strengthen and enlarge the original line.

The committee appointed in London to take into consideration Captain Barber's plan, have lately reported, recommending steamers of even greater size and power than those proposed by Captain Barber. In this we have an additional proof of the progress of this important question. The more it is investigated the more evident does it become, that any plan of steam communication with India ought to be on the most enlarged scale which experience has proved to be practicable. By a comparison of the expenses and returns of steamers of various capacities, it is found that vessels of large size will pay better, on a long voyage, than small vessels, the returns being greater in proportion to the outlay; and they have also the advantages of greater speed, and more certainty of overcoming the difficulties of the navigation; and, as these truths have been established, the plans have been gradually enlarged, from steamers of 500 or 600 tons burthen, to those now recommended by the committee, of 2000 tons burthen, and 500 horse power. It has been proposed to have iron steamers of 2600 tons burthen; but the committee have judiciously resolved not to undertake experiments, being of opinion that, although great advantages may be anticipated from the substitution of iron for wood in the construction of steamers, present experience does not warrant them in recommending its adoption for vessels of the class, and for the distant employment contemplated. The plan of the committee is, to have seven steamers of 2000 tons burthen—four for the Indian, and three for the European side—with boats for navigating the Nile; the total outlay is estimated at £520,000, and the annual charges at £250,000.

While on this subject, we may briefly advert to a plan for establishing steam navigation on the Pacific, from Panama to various ports in South America, and eventually to be extended to China and Australia. It is intended to place this line of steamers in connexion with her Majesty's packets in the Atlantic, and, by improving the road across the isthmus of Darien, to reduce the time occupied in that journey from two days to eight or ten hours. The capital of the Pacific Steam-Navigation Company is to be £250,000, and the undertaking appears to be highly approved of by the British merchants resident in South America, who, from their local knowledge, must be supposed well able to judge of its success.

We look to the establishment of a complete line of steamers to India, as an era in the naval history of this country; and, great as the undertaking is, we confidently expect that it will not be much longer delayed. Amidst the variety of schemes that have been proposed and examined, there has been a great diversity of opinion, which has contributed greatly to the delay; but all parties seem now to be agreed as to certain general principles, and to be approximating with regard to the details. The establishment of steam-navigation across the Atlantic, has prepared the way for steam to India, and removed many of the doubts and difficulties with which the subject was before encumbered. Success in the one case augurs well for success in the other.

THE ROYALISTS OF PERU.

BY MRS GORE.

THE sun was setting gloriously, as became the midsummer sun of a tropical country, over the extensive plains spreading from the lower ridges of the Andes to the Peruvian coast; glittering at intervals upon the distant domes and towers of Lima, and streaming with fervid influence on tapi-fenced fields of maize and luzerne; between which, occasional thickets of wild cane, enlaced with glaring blossoms of the nasturtium of Peru, shot up in airy lightness into the summer sky.

But amid the fertile luxuriance of the season, and brightness of the scene, a blackening blight was discernible. The iron hand of the War of Independence had imprinted its fatal traces on that devoted province, the scene of a contention which has happily bequeathed another nation to the list of the free people of the earth. The troops of the two factions of Patriots and Royalists, (or, as they were termed in South America, "El Padre Rey," and "La Madre Patria,") successively cantoned in the environs of Lima, had left smoking and blackened ruins in place of prosperous villages; and, amid the olive gardens, or beneath the shade of the banana trees, many a spot of rugged and recently-turned earth revealed the existence of those hurried and unconsecrated graves to which the soldier is compelled to consign his comrades of the recent strife. Nay, the husbandman, retiring from the noonday heats into the shadow of the willow trees, planted along the banks of the Azequias, was often startled by the spectacle of a blue and swollen corpse polluting the stagnant waters; the festering gashes by which it was disfigured, bearing testimony to the untimely end of the victim. War, in short, had been there, with all its horrors—nay, was still there. The Patriot General, San Martín, had been proclaimed Protector of Peru; while the Royalist Generals, Canterac and Carratalá, were marking the progress of their retreat before the Liberating Army by the commission of a thousand enormities.

The Indians, the montoneros or guerillas of South America, and other irregular hangers-on of either faction, rendered, meanwhile, the disorders of the period a plea for the indulgence of their own lawless and marauding propensities.

The Viceroy of Lima had not yet, however, abandoned the city; and, though all avenues of the cercado were invested by parties of montoneros hovering round to cut off the supplies, the troops under Santalla, and the brigades of Carratalá, were still confidently expected to make good their promises of support to the Royalists.

Already they had sacked, burned, and plundered throughout the province. Of the town of Cangallo, not a trace remained; the villages of Utcumayo, Huailly, and Zancazo, were razed to the ground; the stores of the silver mines of Pasco plundered, and the works suspended. All was ruin and desolation! On the morning, however, of the 23d of June, an Indian, deserting from the retreating army of Carratalá to the division of Arenales, spread tidings, on his passage, of the defeat and discomfiture of the troops under Canterac, and the mutiny of the Royalist garrison in the castle of Callao; and the harassed Peruvians, crowding to welcome his reports, fell on their knees by the wayside, to render thanks to the Almighty for the termination of their afflictions. "Long live the Liberators!" "Long live San Martín!" "Peace to the Madre Patria!" resounded on all sides. The long-submitting Peruvians felt that their sufferings had sufficed; that Heaven, content with their patience, at length decreed them the reward of Liberty. The mita or compulsory labour in the mines was to be abolished; the exactions of the priesthood restrained; the Spanish tyrants expelled. Henceforward Peru and all her provinces were to be free!

The little town of Carguancuanga—situated, for its misfortune, in the direct route to Xanxa—was among the warmest in its demonstrations of rejoicing at the intelligence.

"But a few weeks more," cried the people, assembled in the Plaza of the town, and pouring forth acclamations in honour of the Liberadores, "we and our families must have resigned ourselves to approaching famine. Our crops are destroyed—our farms pillaged—our stores demolished. Every horse has been taken from us by the villain Santalla, and our oxen carried off. How, then, should we have faced the winter, but for the protection of the Patriots? Blessings on Cochrane and his fleet! Blessings on Miller and San Martín!—for, thanks to the exertion of these heroes, our children shall live and be free!"

Under the roof of one habitation of the little town, were these thanksgivings more calmly, but not less piously directed. It was from the lips of Juan, her son, that Osoria Almedo, the wife of the sexton of Carguancuanga, received the welcome tidings—Juan, the eldest of nine children, with which Providence had burthened her poverty, and brightened the sunshine of a warm and loving heart: for Osoria had tenderness for them all—industry for them all; her nights were short, her meals scanty—short as they were, often disturbed by inquiet dreams, the result of aching limbs, from excessive labour during the heat of the day; and scanty, because robbed of every delicate morsel, to be appropriated to the wants of her offspring. But then, her morning waking was to happiness, when hurrying from her hard pallet to attend upon the helpless ones which, like fledgelings in their nest, cried aloud upon her with fondling names to minister to their wants; and triumphant with motherly love were the impulses of her bosom, as, one by one, she dismissed the little creatures from her careful hands, fresh-faced, smiling, happy—herself their providence, herself their never-failing fountain-head of happiness. Yes! hungry and weary she might sometimes be, but blessed at all times and seasons, as the parent of such fair, and good, and loving children. Osoria often asked herself, indeed, as she bent over their sleeping heads, whether she loved them the more that they were the children of Isidro, or whether Isidro himself were the dearer, as the father of those promising children!

It is true, Osoria had more than common motives for wife-like devotion. Isidro Almedo, the son of wealthy parents in Lima, had quitted his own people and his father's house, and, incurring disinheritance for her sake, became the husband of one born to fill a menial station in the household of his parents. He had, even in the depths of penury which followed their rash marriage, accepted a hateful occupation, supportable only as affording bread to a wife and child on the verge of starvation.

But, from the period of that self-sacrifice, all had comparatively prospered with Isidro and Osoria Almedo. Their bread, though black and bitter, had sufficed to the rapidly increasing wants of the little family. Their daily mess of legumes became augmented in size, when, every year, another little face smiled beside their frugal board. The industry of Osoria supplied homely but decent garments for the family; and when, at night, Isidro returned from his sickening occupation, he was sure to experience that electric gleam of household comfort, a smile of love and peace upon the threshold of his home. "Courage, man, courage," Osoria would whisper, when he occasionally gave way to dejection. "I am young and healthy—the babes strong and beautiful—our will is good—our intentions honest. We shall yet prosper; we shall yet be happy. Our children, thriving and laborious, will do honour to our old age. There is a golden time in store for us. Isidro! the helpful hand of the Almighty is over our house!"

A blessing goes, indeed, with a cheerful spirit. Poor as they were, the little homestead of the Almedos was ever bright and joyous. The neighbours loved to loiter in friendly gossip beside their threshold, although too humble to deal in hospitality. Their children were general favourites; all in Carguancuanga had a kind word for them. No sooner did Juan, the eldest boy, attain the height of his father's elbow-chair, than the worthy Father José, the cúra or officiating priest of San Carlos, undertook his instruction; his sister Juanita being already employed as sweeper and weeder in the fine gardens of the Alcalde, Don Pepe di Aguero, in the suburbs of Carguancuanga. By this august protection, food and raiment were provided for two out of the nine; while, of the seven other little ravens, crying to the Lord for food, under the roof of the poor sexton, the youngest still nestled at the breast of its mother.

"Welcome! welcome! Joy and triumph for us and all!" cried Osoria, as she sprang to the neck of her husband, on the evening of that eventful day. "The Patriots are successful. Peace is at hand; and, with peace, plenty."

"Peace will scarcely add a measure of lentils to our granary, or maize-meal to our chest," replied the calmer Isidro. "But God's will be done! The Spaniards reap the reward of their oppressions; and, if the new people fulfil their engagements, our brethren will at least eat of their own harvests, and sit under the tree of their own rearing. But for thee and me, Osoria, what benefit? The church of San Carlos is not like to profit by the downfall of its ancient benefactors, or to deal more liberally with its servitors in the decline of its revenue. Father José may be displaced; and Don Pepe himself has sworn to abandon Carguancuanga, should San Martin obtain possession of the province. What omen, therefore, of good to us and ours, in the triumph of the Liberators?"

"Do not talk thus before the boy—prythee, do not talk thus!" cried Osoria, throwing back the long braided tresses, discomposed by the ardour of her reception to her husband. "Let not Juan learn that we are thinking only of ourselves, while our enslaved countrymen of Peru bless God for their prospects of freedom. A heavy hand has been upon the land. The efforts of the people have, with the aid of Providence, wrought their deliverance; and, oh! be not our thoughts, at such a time, of the rags that cover us, or the morsel that sustains us. Providence hath hitherto filled our cruise: in Providence, dear husband, be our trust!"

"My trust is in thee!" murmured Isidro, throwing his weary limbs upon a seat, and glancing round their humble but cheerful abode—ornamented, by the hands of little Juanita, for the Eve of St John, with a profusion of flowers, bestowed on her by the old gardener of Don Pepe. "A blessing is with thee, wife, and with all thy doings. Thy quiet, confiding spirit is as an anchor to my restlessness. But for thee, I should have long ago quitted Carguancuanga; which had been but a wild speculation. For, lo! all is well with us; and, as thou sayest, our children thrive; and there is, doubtless, a golden time in store for us and them."

Cheered by these reflections, (inspired, like every other noble thought arising in his mind, by the higher courage and finer spirit of his wife,) Isidro called his children around him, bestowed a word or gesture of tenderness on each; and taking, on either knee, the little prattling Luigia, the image of her mother, and a boy still younger—too young, as yet, for prattling—he placed himself at his accustomed post at table, and prepared to do honour to their evening meal.

"Mother, dear mother!" said Juan, suddenly placing on the board before Osoria a basket of limes, sending forth a delicious fragrance amid their fresh-culled leaves, "this fruit was given me by Father José, to celebrate our evening festival, as a reward for my diligence of the week."

"I myself saw it plucked fresh before sunrise this morning, in the plantations of Don Pepe, as a token for his reverence," added Juanita; "and here, dearest mother, is a musk melon, given me to-day by the Senora Dolores, to make merry with my brothers and sisters on the Eve of St John."

"We are to keep holiday then, at the expense of our children?" cried Isidro, in a cheerful voice, drawing his knife from its sheath, and dividing into shares the juicy and orange-tinted melon. "Well, 'tis a memorable day—a day of triumph for Peru. Children, draw near. Osoria, bring the babe on thy arm, and take a place by my side. The blessing of the Holy Trinity upon our meal—the bread is broken—children, let us eat and be thankful."

And the little voices that echoed the blessing thus pronounced, were soon heard, rising one above another, in joyous turbulence; for the morrow was held as a solemn festival in the church of Carguancuanga; and Juan was to be spared from his studies, and Juanita from her toils, and father and mother had promised to accompany their little family in the fresh evening, to witness the fundango, mariguita, and guachambai danced under the shade of the willow-trees bordering the ramparts of the town—

"Where young and old come forth to play Upon a sunshine holiday."

So loud, indeed, was the confusion of their gay voices, and so absorbed were the happy parents in noting to themselves and each other the progress of health and strength developed in those bright faces and exulting tones, that, for several moments, an intruder stood unnoticed on the threshold; and when Isidro at length observed the shadow interposed between them and the crimson gleam of the setting sun, an exclamation from his wife of "Father José—a visitor to our poor abode—rise, children, and welcome your benefactor!" scarcely sufficed to reduce the young ones to silence.

Already had Isidro placed a huge arm-chair of wicker-work, the only one in his possession, for so honoured and unexpected a guest, while Osoria hastened to lay aside the infant that slept upon her bosom, and place fresh bread upon the table. But Father José was there neither for rest nor refreshment. The old man's face was pale with consternation, and his voice more tremulous than when, in his moods of deepest emotion, heard calling from the pulpit some hardened sinner to repentance, as he led Isidro apart from the children, and bade him give ear to his instructions.

"All is lost for Carguancuanga—all all!" faltered the old man. "The tidings spread this day among the people, were the words of a deceiver. The troops of Carratalà are within a few hours' march of us; and what will then befall my unhappy flock? It is known to the Royalists that but a month ago the Carguancuanguites forced the wealthy and noble cura of San Carlos to flee from the town, instituting myself, a poor and humble Benedictine, in his room; and the vengeance of Carratalà will overtake them." And, as the old man clasped his hands despondingly, a heavy groan broke from the bosom of Isidro.

"Carratalà may, perhaps, be within a few hours' march of Carguancuanga," said Osoria, who had overheard all; "yet surely, reverend father, till daybreak we are safe; and, before daybreak, succour might yet reach us. A detachment of the troops of the Madre Patria is at Xanxa."

"Even so; and with them rests my only remaining hope," faltered the venerable priest. "The alarm once given to the outposts yonder at Moya, all might go well."

"But how to give the alarm?" cried Isidro; while the children, awed by the panic-struck looks of their parents, cowered in silence in a corner of the room. "The country is beset by montoneros; and the reports spread this morning have probably lessened the alertness of our friends. Who could be found to encounter the hazard of such an errand?"

"Myself!" replied the old man, in a firmer voice. "Should I become a victim, there will be neither widow nor orphan to accuse my rashness. I owe myself to the country, which has maintained me—to my parishioners, who love me; and, so I but succeed, would cheerfully lay down my few remaining years for their sake. But I feel that I shall not be sacrificed. The servants of religion command respect, even among the lawless. I shall go safe and free, when the young and brave could expect no quarter. My mule is sure and swift. Before midnight I could reach Moya; whence the commandant would dispatch further instructions to headquarters."

"This must not be!" interrupted Isidro, gradually recovering his self-possession. "It is to me, Father, this work is appointed. Give me the use of the mule. Not a minute must be lost!"

"And these?" said the old man, extending his shrivelled hand towards Osoria and her children. "What have they done that thou shouldst desert them? And what would be their fate, helpless, in the hands of the murdering ruffians of Carratalà?"

A cold shudder was the sexton's expressive reply; for he was no stranger to the tender mercies of the Royalist troops. Nevertheless, when he bent his eyes upon his benefactor—the aged servant of the Almighty standing before him—he dared not sanction the perilous enterprise of Father José.

"Trifle not with me, my son, nor with the precious minutes that are wearing away," hastily resumed the priest; "but attend to my instructions. To spread unnecessary alarm were mischievous; for resistance has already proved in vain. Should the Spaniards gain ground, and reach Carguancuanga before succours from Xanxa are on the march, all that remains for you is submission. Nevertheless, I would fain preserve the treasures of the mother church from sacrilege. To you, my good Isidro, rather than to the Alcalde, who is old and pusillanimous, I therefore intrust the keys of San Carlos; and, I charge you, yield them not one minute sooner than is indispensable for the safety of the town. Be firm, Isidro—be wise; and the blessing of God and his saints upon your good service!"

Again the bewildered sexton strove, by earnest entreaties, to shake the resolution of his superior, and obtain for himself, instead of the guardianship of the church and its treasures, the more active mission usurped by the priest of the altars.

"In both duties, my son, there is danger," replied Father José, depositing on the table a bunch of ponderous keys. "For thee, for me, this night must alike be a night of peril. The moon that is to light me on my way to Moya, may never rise again for either; and since, as regards this worn-out, worthless frame, a violent death will but forestall by a few years the sentence of dust to dust, verily, Isidro, my son, it is for thee that my prayers shall ascend to the Omniscient, that he will stretch forth his right hand, to be thy buckler in the hour of trouble."

Remonstrance was unavailing. The sexton and his wife, accustomed to stand in the presence of the man of God as in that of a superior being, were easily subdued by the mere authority of the voice from which they were accustomed to accept their tidings of salvation; and all that Osoria presumed to attempt, as Father José bent his steps towards the threshold, was to cast herself, with her elder children at his feet, and humbly implore a benediction. He consented that Isidro should bear him company to the extremity of the suburbs, to receive his last instructions; and, as the stalwart Spaniard outstripped the paces of the mule, the town's-people, standing beside their door-posts, believing the curate of San Carlos and his subordinate to be on their road to administer some sacrament of the church to the new-born or dying in some farm adjoining the town, bade "God speed them," as they went. Even the children, returning from the village-gardens, whither they had betaken themselves to beg for flowers, for the celebration of the morrow's festival, in the exultation of their little hearts, held up their baskets to Father José, mingling in their acclamations the names of the patron saint, and of the triumphant Patriots of Peru.

"Poor children!—poor innocents!" murmured the good priest, when they had passed the last hut of the suburbs, and had nothing before them but the open plains over which the shades of evening had already gathered, while the brilliancy of the fire-flies shone out upon the cane-stalks, and the heavy flight of the bee-moth was heard humming around. "May their hearts be as gay and fearless at this hour to-morrow; and thou and I, Isidro, once more clasp hands together!" Then, leaning from his mule, Father José bestowed a fervent grasp on those of his colleague. "Remember," said he, in a solemn voice, as Isidro returned the pressure, "unless thou seest the torch of the incendiary uplifted against the walls of San Carlos, I charge thee, on thy salvation, surrender not the keys."

After a few more counsels, Isidro returned towards the town, pausing now and then to ascertain whether the echo of the mule's hurried paces were yet lost in the distance.

"A protecting hand is with him," murmured he, as he resumed his way. "The fiercest of the guerillas would respect the white hairs of Father José. But for us—for Carguancunga—for Peru, alas! what hope?"

A light was already burning within, when he lifted anew the latch of his dwelling; and a single glance sufficed to shew him that the housewifely hand of the matron and mother had not, during his absence, suspended its routine of duty—the remnants of the meal were removed, the little ones laid to rest, and the two elder seated side by side, and hand in hand, listening with downcast eyes to the exhortations of their mother. Young as they were, the mystery of the good priest's enterprise was safe in their keeping, for that tender voice had adjured them to secrecy. No further thought of holiday—of rejoicing—for Juan and his sister; the evening was at hand, and their parents in peril and tribulation. Again a few minutes, and they too were laid down to rest, their nightly prayer murmured, beside their pallets of maize leaves, sanctified by an Agnus Dei suspended at the head of each.

And now all was stillness and sadness under the roof of the sexton. Door and window were closed for the night—only a small casement, in a passage adjoining the bed-room, was left unclosed, that Isidro might keep watch over the weather and its prognostics, his ear and eye alike vigilant to catch the most remote indications of alarm. But Osoria, instead of betaking herself to her distaff, as was her wont, until the children were soundly asleep, sat with folded hands beside the table, her eyes fixed upon the keys, her lips compressed, till Isidro, who, after wandering hither and thither with unquiet footsteps, suddenly placed himself by her side, encircled her waist with his arm, and drew her head towards his bosom. Not a word passed between them—their tenderness was too sad and deep for utterance.

"Scarcely six and twenty years have passed over this good and precious head," said Isidro, at length imprinting a long kiss on the forehead that lay cold and pale upon his shoulder; "scarcely six and twenty years, yet already there are traces of silver amid its raven tresses—already these brows are hollowed with labour and care. Wife! thou hast suffered much—hast struggled bravely with want, with weariness, with a mother's sorrows. Few have been thy hours of sunshine, my Osoria—many thy days of storm, even while I was beside thee to soothe and to sustain; and now, how will it be with thee—henceforward, how will it be with thee, and how with them, if thou must adventure single-handed against the troubles of the world!"

"No!" faltered the woman, clinging convulsively to his arm; "God is merciful; it will not be thus, it cannot be thus; help will be vouchsafed us. These innocent children will plead for us to the Mother of Heaven, who herself sorrowed as a mother. Isidro, be of better cheer!"

"I am of good cheer," replied the sexton, drawing her still closer to his side; "for I feel that thou art strong against suffering—strong in courage—strong in virtue; and thus it will be easy for me to die. But die, Osoria, I shall—perish, I tell thee, I must and shall! I have had warnings; omens have been around me. It was but this morning, girl, that, lacking employment in the Cathedral, I betook myself to the cemetery of San Carlos, my pickaxe and spade on my shoulder; and, under the shade of the two old cork-trees that branch from the western wall, digged a deep grave. What right had I to anticipate the decree of Providence, and dig a grave which there was none to fill? I, who have so loathed the calling which the wants of a wife and child forced on my adoption, what secret influence prompted me to go forth and exercise it in very wantonness? It was a tempting of God, Osoria; and in that grave shall I be laid to rest."

"Pray Heaven that hundreds of our countrymen be not soon lacking graves!" was the solemn rejoinder of his wife, whose thoughts were occupied rather with the position of the two armies than with the plight of their single household. "But a few hours ago, peace seemed restored to us; yet, again, alas! we are to be harassed with the terrors of war and the oppressions of the Royalists."

"To us and ours, their oppressions are of small account," replied Isidro.

"Is it nothing to have your wife stigmatized as an Indian?—your children as the children of a bondswoman?" remonstrated Osoria.

"Nothing! Osoria's name to me is wife—to my children, mother—whether styled by the corregidor of the province Spaniard, Peruvian, or Indian."

"Hush!" eagerly interposed Osoria, closing his lips with her hand. "I will not listen to what grieves me from the voice of my husband. Yet in such sentiments were you nurtured. When Isidro saw the light, his father's father filled, in the city of Lima, the office of Alcalde; and, though you threw off the authority of your family, to become poor and humiliated, for my sake!"

"Enough! enough!" cried Isidro, in his turn, straining her anew to his breast; and, to conceal his emotion, he betook himself to the still unclosed lattice, and looked forth, through the stillness of night, into the open country, over the bridge of Iscuchaca—on a rising ground above which ran the street in which was situated his humble dwelling. "San Lorenzo be our aid!" he exclaimed. "Beacons are already blazing on the distant hills! Father José's warning came too late! Carratala must be at hand!"

"You forget it is the Eve of St John?" replied his wife, with a gentle smile. "Yonder fires are tokens of rejoicing in the villages, according to the ancient custom of your nation."

"True—true! I had forgotten," replied the sexton, in a desponding voice; and again he threw himself into a seat, and moaned heavily.

"You will wake the children. Let the poor babes rest in peace!" said Osoria.

And, carefully shading the night-lamp with her hand, she led him towards the happy little sleepers. On one bed, enlaced in each other's arms, lay three lovely girls, whose dark curls, mingling on the pillow, presented a picture worthy of Murillo. Beside them was the resting-place of Juanita, on whose protecting arm nestled the infant.

"Behold them!" cried the happy mother. "What smiles upon their lips! what blessed peace upon their brows! The angels of God are with them in their rest. Their dreams are not of toil and suffering, like unto our own; but of happy islands, and heavenly beings that hover over them, to comfort and protect. O Isidro! Isidro! is there not joy, is there not wealth, in the possession of these treasures?"

The sexton replied by a pressure of her hand. He could not confirm her apostrophe. His heart was not that of a mother; with him the harsh realities of life were all in all.

"Thy rich brother yonder at Lima," pursued the exulting woman, "has but a lame and distorted son. Heaven, which gave him abundance, denies him the sight of fair and smiling faces round his board, and the sound of loving voices blessing him by the name of father."

"And how is it, when they call upon a father for food, that he cannot give—for protection beyond his power of granting?" replied the sexton, whose thoughts were embittered by the labours of his loathsome avocation, and the apprehension that the helpless ones before him were about to be consigned, fatherless, to the hard dealings of the world.

"Be not thus solicitous for the things of this world!" faltered Osoria. "The God of Christians, Isidro, hath his own good time for conferring benefits on his creatures. Ours may be at hand; if not on earth, in a brighter and happier place. There is a world elsewhere—a world of compensation—where the poor are exalted, and the weary find repose. Be patient, husband; let us kneel and pray for patience."

And the sexton and his wife knelt down, side by side, near the resting-place of their children, and prayed and were comforted.

In another hour, Osoria, having taken her babe to her breast, lay down in her turn; in another, she was gently sleeping. But the sexton still watched. He took down his old Spanish fowling-piece from the rack, and examined the lock; he drew his knife from its sheath, and whetted the blade upon his hearth-stone. He listened—he looked forth again and again; but all was still silent.

Morning dawned at last—mid-summer morning, bright and joyous; and, scarcely had the twilight given place to perfect day, when bands of children gathered in the suburbs of Carguan-cuanga, with garlands of flowers, and torches, and bird cages, suspended from poles entwined with wreaths, chanting hymns in honour of the festival of St John.

"Go forth with the rest," said Osoria, to her elder children, as she rose to her morning labours.

But Juan and his sister refused.

"There is sorrow in thy face, dear mother," replied the girl: "let us tarry at home and comfort thee."

And Osoria, remembering how much the children had overheard of the communication of Father José, judged it better to accede to the proposal.

Meanwhile, no tokens of the good Father's return! Twice did Isidro make his way to the extremity of the suburb, where they had parted the preceding night, but without success; and, thus disappointed and frustrated in the hope of succours from Xanxa, the sexton felt it incumbent upon him to warn Don Pepe of all that had come to pass, in order that the rejoicings of the day might be suspended, and the town of Carguanouanga placed in a state of defence.

"Close up thy house—keep thy spirits tranquil, and thy babes under thy wings," said Almedo, addressing his wife. "I must away, for a time, as soon as maybe. I will return to thee again."

And, after imprinting on her face a kiss of more than ordinary fervour—a kiss such as the hour of danger wrings out of the heart—he placed the keys of San Carlos within his inner vest, and departed.

Meanwhile, re-assured by the comfortable tidings of the preceding day, the Alcalde of Carguanouanga, Don Pepe di Aguero, was seated in his brocaded dressing-gown, enjoying his morning chocolate. A branch of orange blossom lay on the table by his side; presented by his withered governante in honour of the fête, but scarcely overpowering with its fragrance the high flavour of vanilla emanating from his dainty repast; when Isidro, the sexton of San Carlos, was announced, as entreating an interview from the man in place.

"Let him choose a more convenient season," mumbled Don Pepe. "Is a festival of the Holy Church a time for the execution of worldly business? Bid the fellow return to-morrow, my good Dolores—bid him return at noon to-morrow."

"The man's business seems pressing, and he is urgent," replied the ancient governante. "'Tis the father of little Juanita."

"Perhaps he brings a message from father José—perhaps"—

"My mind misgives me, Senor Alcalde, that things are amiss in the town. The matin bell is still unring—the doors of San Carlos"—

"Send Isidro hither. It was my intention to have attended, in person, high mass this morning," said the Alcalde, with dignity. "He must account for these omissions. Let him enter."

And the sexton, once bidden into the presence of the great man, his errand was briefly sped. He related, with force and brevity, all that he saw motive to unfold—the advance of Carratalá, the departure of the priest, and his prolonged absence.

"Carratalá and the Royalists advancing on the town of Carguanouanga!" ejaculated the Mayor. "The saints forefend! The Indian deserter of yesterday was then a traitor and deceiver?—A plot!—a manifest plot!—And father José to take himself off by stealth in our hour of peril! Succours from Xanxa?—Absurd—ridiculous!—Summon the Town-Council!—Let the tocsin be rung. Auxilio!—auxilio! Dolores, my vest of ceremony!—Dolores, my staff, my wig, my scarf, my—Auxilio!—auxilio! Carratalá is marching upon the town! At all events, no resistance. What did we gain by opposing the entrance of Santalla, five months ago?—Butchery and bloodshed, but not a word of thanks from San Martin, or the Junta Gubernativa! No, no! Free way to the troops! It is for the armies of La Madre Patria to meet them with repulse, and leave our peaceful town's-people to their civil duties."

Scarcely had Isidro heard and comprehended the instructions of Don Pepe, than, in all haste, he prepared to leave the house.

"The priest has, doubtless, carried with him in his flight the keys of the church?" inquired the Alcalde, as the sexton was quitting the room. "Ay, ay! his only care was for the treasury and altar-chest! Let his dwelling, however, be searched; and, should the keys come to light, bring them instantly to be deposited with the town-council.—Away!"

"Wife!" cried the agitated Almedo—having instantly made his way homewards—"I promised thee to return, and I am here; but for a moment only. The cowardly Alcalde is resolved to oppose no resistance to the ruffians of Carratalá. My only chance, therefore, of fulfilling my promise to our benefactor, is by taking up my position in San Carlos, and keeping fast the doors. The Royalists may have neither time nor inclination to proceed to extremities. Should I be sought, therefore, say that I have set forth to meet Father José; but, as thou art true to Heaven, let nothing force from thy lips the secret of my concealment."

"Nothing!" ejaculated Osoria. "And must we then pass the day here—and alone?"

"Wouldst thou rather bring thy children, and spend it with me in the church?"

"In San Carlos? The children shut up among those chilly aisles—those damp grave-stones? No! the wren is safer in its humble nest than in a palace chamber. We will abide at home—too insignificant to attract attention"—

"While, in traversing the streets towards the church, they could scarcely fail to attract notice. Now then, my gourd and a loaf, as when preparing for a long day's labour; and, once more, farewell!" said Isidro, striving to throw off, or, at least, conceal from his wife the dejection of his spirits. "Not a word to the children—not a word to neighbour or friend; but give me thy prayers, that, with God's aid, I may be the means of preserving San Carlos from the hands of the spoiler."

She smiled assentingly, then turned aside to weep; and, when she looked again, her husband was gone. She had not come to watch his departure, but, lifting bolt and bar, closed the door of the house upon the sunshine. Already the flowers, suspended to the lintel by the children the preceding night, were withered in the early sun.

"All withered—all dead!" cried Osoria; and she would fain have given way to desolate sentiments; but what leisure for vain repining has the mother of nine helpless children?

Presently, indeed, her household labours were suspended, by the sound of the bugle of the town-crier, and a proclamation to the inhabitants of Carguancuanga, to repair to their several habitations, and keep close till sunset. Then came a murmur of voices and tread of feet, as of people dispersing homewards; then a general silence, save when the snatch of a Royalist song, muttered by some half-drunken reveller, staggering through the suburb at the risk of arrest, gave token that the hopes of the party of El Padre Rey were re-awakening.

And now, while the town-council was assembling, Isidro, with stealthy movements, reached the postern of San Carlos, entered unobserved, and locked and re-locked its small, massive, iron-knobbed door of solid oak. The great gates, trebly and quadruply barred and bolted, were rarely opened, save for the high ceremonies of the church—such as on that very day, under the blessing of God, ought to have filled the groined roof of San Carlos with incense and anthems of praise. And thus Isidro was alone in the venerable temple, bequeathed, three centuries before, by Pizarro, to the worship of the Catholic faith. Often had he been there before, when engaged in the duties of his calling, but never under the influence of such a sense of loneliness. A vapour of damp, as if emanating from the caves of death under his feet, seemed to oppress him. And yet the high altars, and those of the Virgin and the Heart of Jesus, had been adorned with flowers the preceding evening, by the nuns of the convent of St. Agatha—flowers which, thanks to the damp and sunless atmosphere, preserved their freshness. Tapestry had been spread over the altar steps—the richest tapers stood ready in their sconces—all seemed prepared for a solemnization: whence, therefore, the unnatural stillness—the unnatural solitude of the place? Isidro half expected to hear the solemn peal of the organ suddenly awake amid the echoing aisles. But he checked the fantastic notion, and sternly reminded himself that he was alone—that he must remain alone, sole guardian of the treasures, temporal and spiritual, around him—that none could come to disturb him in his retreat, until it was his good pleasure to bid them enter. He raised his eyes to the grim-visaged saints, whose effigies adorned the chapels of the aide aisles, imploring their features to relax, and their lips to commune with him. But those gloomy faces looked down un pitying. The Immaculate Mother, her infant on her knee, preserved her immobility. "Better have recourse to God than to his saints!" muttered Isidro; and, falling on the marble floor before the high altar, he breathed, audibly, a simple paternoster, to which the hollow vastness of the deserted church returned an impressive echo.

That Father José had fallen into the hands of the montoneros, Isidro nothing doubted. The gray hairs of the good old priest, his benefactor, were, in all likelihood, defiled by the hands of ruffians. Or the mule might, possibly, have missed its footing in fording the stream, when none were at hand to give him succour. But on his behalf, good as he was, and in the fulness of years, there was little cause for lamentation; in the young, the helpless, the unprepared of Carguancuanga, were victims demanding ampler commiseration—and their doom might be at hand.

He listened and listened;—not a sound, save the flitting of a bird long domesticated in the old church, and accustomed to perch unmolested on the reading desks of the chancel. But, now, Isidro longed to silence even the feeble interruption of its faint note, its fluttering wings; as if those scarcely audible sounds could have drowned the tumults of an approaching brigade, the trampling and neighing of war horses, the clang of hostile arms. One other sound broke in, however, on his solitude—the heavy toll of the clock, proclaiming hourly, half-hourly, quarterly, the weary progress of the day. Noon had long been chimed; evening was approaching; for the sun now attained the lofty and richly-stained windows of the church. And now a murmur seemed gradually rising in the streets. "Glad tidings," thought Isidro, "have surely reached the town. The Council may have obtained news that succours are approaching, or that Carratalá desists from his expedition." And, while this notion, glancing into his mind, seemed to thaw the frozen current of his blood, the clatter of a charger suddenly resounded on the pavement, and loud and repeated blows were struck against the great gates of San Carlos.

For a single second, Isidro laid his hand upon the keys, in the belief that he was summoned to admit some messenger from Father José; when his ear was startled by a citation to deliver up possession of the church to the troops of El Padre Rey.

"Within there—ho—reply! By St Christopher, not a black-gown left in the place—all fled—all vanished!" exclaimed the trooper. And Isidro, thus apprised that his retreat was still undiscovered, maintained a strict silence. After several vain attempts, on the part of the Royalist soldier, to shake the ponderous gates from their staples, accompanied by fearful blasphemies and threats of vengeance, horse and horseman galloped away; and Isidro Almedo was left to a solitude a thousand times more fearful than before; for the Royalists were in possession of the town, and all was lost. Their disappointment of obtaining access to San Carlos might, perhaps, stimulate them to the acts of vengeance threatened by the trooper. His own humble household, his wife, his babes, might be included in their acts of violence. The blood throbbed in his temples, his hands were involuntarily clenched; and, resolving to escape from his self-sought prison, and fly to the defence of those he loved, the sexton, with hurried steps, entered the sacristy on his way towards the postern.

But what sound—what shrill, shrill cry startles him on his entrance?—Why does he stand transfixed on the stone floor of the sacristy, with his eyes riveted on the grated window, through which, during his daily occupations in the cathedral, his two elder children were in the habit of delivering him messages from their mother?—It is the voice of Juan! It is the frantic outcry of his eldest born, that curdles his very blood.

"Father, hasten! O father, father, hear me, and hasten, ere it be too late!" cried the agonised boy. "The soldiers have fired our house—the soldiers have dragged forth our mother—father, father!"

In a moment, the wretched man was in the street, rushing, wild and frantic, towards the suburb. Open, now, were the aisles of San Carlos to all comers; what were church or churchmen unto him? His abandoned home, his undefended wife—there were his treasures, there was his accusation.

Yet Osoria, amid the horrors of her fate, had never accused him. All day had she sat, her children round her knees, striving, with songs, and tales, and endearments, to console them for the loss of their holiday. Her cheek was pale, indeed, and her eye wild and burning, as she sang to them, and caressed them; but for worlds would she not have had their innocent bosoms daunted by the terrors that hung with leaden weight upon her own.

"Why are the doors and windows closed?" lisped one little fondling girl, kissing the mother's hand that rested on her head. "Sister Juanita promised me that to-day we should have flowers, and fruit, and music, and dancing under the green trees; and, after all, we are shut in prisoners."

"Peace, babe," whispered the mother, ending her murmurs with a kiss. "To-morrow, thou shalt go forth into the fields, and enjoy a double holiday."

"And wilt thou be with us, mother?" prattled another.

"I shall be with thee, my Luigia. I promise thee to be with thee."

"Joy, joy!" responded several little voices, while Luigia clapped her hands. "It is so long since our mother went forth with us. But she has promised. We are all witnesses. No work to-morrow! The mother—the mother will join in our holiday!"

In these exclamations of joy, however, the two elder children refrained from joining. They were initiated into the secret of their gentle mother's apprehensions; they had heard all, and only abstained from questioning her, lest they should add to her affliction.

Towards evening, however, Osoria suddenly started up, and advanced towards the still closed door. Her ear had caught the sound of a distant bugle. Drums, and the tramp of cavalry soon followed. Then outcries of alarm, a discharge of musketry, shrieks, confusion. Yes; the enemy had entered the town, and as she wrung her hands in despair, the children crowding to her feet, hid their little faces in her garments, and wept.

Soon, fearfully soon, they heard the name of Isidro Almedo called upon by angry voices; and numberless footsteps approached the door.

"Isidro, Isidro!" cried his neighbours, "come forth from your house? Father José is not to be found—Father José has absconded; and the Royalist colonel demands the keys of the church to quarter his troops for the night."

Osoria crossed herself devoutly. Even amid the tumult from without she could distinguish the sound of her own beating heart, as the children clung closer and yet closer to her knees.

"Isidro!" shouted the people, incensed by delay, "come forth."

"My husband is not here," replied Osoria, in a firm voice, as they attempted to force the door.

"Where is he?"

"I know not."

"The sexton has concealed himself," said they among each other; "break open the doors, and search the house."

The door yielded with a crash, and in an instant every corner of the house was ransacked.

"What seek ye here, ye pitiful villains?" cried one of the troops of Carratalá, attracted to the spot by the tumults of the people.

"Only the sexton of San Carlos, who has made off with the keys of the church."

"In what direction?"

"We know not. Interrogate this woman, who is his wife."

"Where is thy husband?" cried the soldier, striking a harsh blow on the shoulder of Osoria, while she vainly attempted to extricate her little ones from the trampling of the crowd.

"Where is thy husband? Speak, or it will be the worse for thee," he repeated, while the distracted mother warded off the pressure from the affrighted infant clinging to her bosom.

"I have already answered that I know not," she replied, when the question was, for the third time, repeated.

"And the keys of San Carlos?"

"Father José," she began—

"Is safe at the bottom of the river," interrupted the soldier; "but before the old carriage was pitched by our men into the stream, they took care to search his pockets. No keys or key helped to sink the priest. Therefore, speak—where is thy husband hidden?" persisted the man, seizing Osoria roughly by the arm.

"I say to thee again that I know not," answered she, with mild firmness.

"What art doing within there, Lazo?" cried an authoritative voice from the door. "What art thou at?"

"Demanding from the wife from the sexton of San Carlos the keys of the church," shouted the soldier.

"And she refuses to give them up?"

"Refuses to tell where her beast of a husband has concealed them."

"Drag her out," said the sergeant, whose troop now invested the house. "Let us hear what she will have to tell us when the hovel is burning before her eyes."

And, at this fearful threat, the town's-people still remaining under Isidro's roof came yelling forth. A fusé was applied to the thatch, and the blaze burst forth before the shrieking children could be extricated. Speechless with horror, Osoria Almedo burst from the hands of the brutal soldiery. In an instant she was re-captured—mocked with shouts of derision—tortured by the grasp of ruffians, amid loud appeals to the horror-struck people to rise in her defence and rescue.

"What shrieking fool have ye here?" cried one of the officers of Carratalá, riding up to the spot, attracted by the blaze that was beginning to redden the evening sky.

"'Tis but an Indian woman, the wife of a Spanish rebel, a sworn foe to government," answered the Ex-Fiscal of Carguancuanga, by whom he was accompanied.

"An Indian, yet so insolent!" interrupted the royalist captain. "Let my troopers teach her better manners. Away with her, boys; but take care to make an end of the business, that no tales may be told to-morrow."

And, at this brutal command, the frantic wife of Isidro was dragged from the street; while the terrified crowd shrunk in silence and consternation to their homes. The last object that met her eye, was the blazing roof-tree of her house—the last sounds that met her ears, were the moans of her defenceless babes—the last thought that sustained her courage, was the thought of the safety of her husband.

But, at that moment, Isidro, warned by his little son, was on his way homewards, maddened by the shouts of all who met him by the way, bidding him haste, for that his wife was in the hands of ruffians. The street wherein his house was situated, was thickly crowded with people; but all made way when they found that the panting, breathless man, by whom they were pushed aside, was the husband of the wretched victim they had seen hurried to destruction.

"Stay, Isidro!" said one compassionate woman, as he approached the burning ruins. "I pray thee, go no further. All is over. Thou wilt see her no more. Surrender the keys, if thou hast them; but, in pity to thyself, avoid this place. We neighbours will have a hand to thy children."

"His children!" It was not of them he thought! His soul was with her—his chaste wife—his faithful wife—his companion—friend—blessing! And, as a thousand conflicting terrors rushed into his mind, he reeled against an adjoining house—his arms fell powerless to his side—big drops of faintness and exhaustion rose upon his forehead; and, but that pitying arms were extended to support him, he would have fallen to the earth. The woman who had before addressed him, brought a cup of water for his restoration; and, when Isidro recovered his senses, he seemed inspired with the deadly ferocity of the wounded tiger.

"Whether did they bear her?" he inquired of those around him, in a concentrated whisper. "Whether did they bear my wife?"

"Across the bridge of Iscuehaca, to the suburbs! But seek not to follow them; it is too late," cried the people, trying in vain to restrain him.

Away, however, went Isidro; no curse upon his lips—no glare of vengeance in his looks; but, like a senseless thing, impelled to action by some inexplicable influence. "The bridge of Iscuehaca!" How often had he traversed it with her in sport—how often in joy! How often held their young children on the parapet at eventide, to watch the rippling of the blue waters, while the terrified mother stood tenderly chiding by his side! And now!

A group of intoxicated soldiers, shouting and exulting in their drunkenness, passed him on the bridge. Other troopers stood in groups on the road beyond, preparing to return to the town; and, further still, he discovered a confused assemblage of the town's-people of Carguancuanga, gazing upwards to a tree by the wayside.

"One would think the fools had never before seen a woman hanging to a tree?" cried one of the soldiers. "Well, her fate will be a warning to the rest!"

"She begged us to put an end to her miseries," replied his comrade. "What could we do but comply?"

The next moment, the knife of Isidro was buried to the hilt in his breast. But, ere the ruffian ceased to breathe, the quick justice of military law had avenged him on his assassin. The disfigured body of the sexton of San Carlos was swinging in the evening air beside that of Osoria.

Short, however, was the triumph of the Royalists. On the following morning, warned by their scouts that a brigade of cavalry, under the command of the brave O'Brien, was advancing rapidly upon Carguancuanga, the troops of Carratalá precipitately evacuated the town, leaving the way clear for the Patriots.

A deputation from the Town-Council, dispatched to compliment Colonel O'Brien, met him in advance of the brigade, just as he reached the bridge of Iscuehaca.

"I thank you, gentlemen, for your good intentions," said he, in reply to their address, having reasons of his own for misdoubting the good faith and patriotism of Don Pepe de Agüero; "but, with your leave, I would confer with the cura of Carguancuanga."

"Father José is, unfortunately, missing; and, as we fear, fallen into the hands of the Royalists," replied the Alcalde.

"A venerable ecclesiastic will undoubtedly be given up on the tender of a sufficient ransom," replied the Colonel.

"Not by butchering ruffians, the soldiers of El Padre Rey!" cried several eager voices from the crowd which now burst forth from the suburbs to welcome their deliverers; while an Indian woman, who had advanced near enough to cling to the horse's mane of Colonel O'Brien, pointed silently to a tree near the spot, where hung the discoloured corpses of Isidro and his wife. At the foot of that fatal tree, with uplifted hands and piteous wailing, knelt eight miserable orphans, crying upon their father—their tender mother—to come down to them—still unconscious, in their innocence, of the extent of their bereavement!

"Let the bodies of this unhappy couple have decent burial," said Colonel O'Brien, after having lent a compassionate ear to a brief relation of their unhappy fate. "I trust it is needless to commend their helpless children to the mercy of the good Patriots of Carguancuanga. Courage, my friends! The oppressors are serving our cause. God will not suffer such cruelties as these to pass unpunished!"

That very evening the bodies of Isidro and Osoria Almedo were accordingly laid in the grave, under the cork-trees, according to the prediction of the sexton. The infant, which had perished for lack of food, was placed on the bosom of its mother. Not even an humble grave-stone marks the spot; but every midsummer morning, their surviving children assemble there, to strew flowers upon the grave; and already the cause of these humble victims is gloriously avenged in the freedom of Peru!

LEGEND OF THE BLACK DOUGLAS.†

THE bloody Lord of Galloway
Sits in his castle hall,
In the lonely Threave; and Dee's dark wave Runs weltering round the wall.

He has called his trusty serving man—
Red Rob is at his hand;
And he bends his head with seemly dread,
And lists his lord's command.

"Go, see how looks the sky to-day—
If it be foul or fair;
And haste ye back, or else the rack
Shall teach you to be yare."

Red Rob stands on the battlement—
How beautiful the scene!
The sullen Dee sweeps far below
Its wooded banks between.

The lark is singing in the sky;
The sun shines cheerily
O'er high Bengairn, and craig and cairn,
And distant Solway sea.

Red Rob now stands before his lord,
Who turns, as on his prey;
The grizzly boar in Kenmure wood
Looks not so fierce at bay.

"The sky, my Lord, is fair and clear;
No cloud may there be seen;
But yet, far distant in the west,
Is one dark spot, I ween."

"Thou lying slave, thy sleepy eyes I'll open with my brand."—
"Oh, spare, my Lord, thy servant old—
His life is in thy hand.

"Upon thy banner, fifty years,
Through battle's smoke and steam,
Those eyes have looked—Oh, pardon me,
If now they should grow dim."

"Back, back, and see how looks the sky—
See if that spot draw near.
Now out my sword, and 'fend thy lord!
No mortal foe is here."

Why pales the bloody Earl's cheek—
What shakes the castle wall—
What storm is drawing near apace—
What darkens all the hall?

Red Rob, with palsied look, and pale,
Bursts in:—"Near, and more near,
My Lord, it comes!" He lifts his eye—
"Oh, see, my Lord, 'tis here!"

One sullen tongue of blood-red fire
Licked round the castle hall;
One crash of thunder shook the rock,
And reft the castle wall.

The trembling schoolboy still points out,
Upon the blackened wood,
Three dingy spots—and whispers low,
" 'Tis the Black Douglas' blood." G.

* Lieutenant-Colonel O'Brien commanded the advanced guard on the following day; and, entering the town of Carguancuanga, near the Bridge of Iscnehaca, inquired for the priest of the parish, supposing that he could give the most correct information of the enemy; but, as he had absconded, O'Brien next asked for the sexton. The Indians pointed in silence to a tree; and, upon approaching it, he beheld the sexton and his wife suspended by the neck from one of the branches. The crime of the unfortunate man was, the not being in attendance when one of General Carratalá's officers, on passing through the village, demanded the keys of the church, which he required to quarter his troops in. The crime of the woman was, in not revealing the hidingplace of her husband; which was, however, discovered; and both were immediately hanged. O'Brien saw their nine young children on their knees weeping most piteously, and praying to their lifeless parents to come down to them."—Memoirs of General Miller, in the service of the Republic of Peru, Vol. I., p. 367.

† The castle of Threave stands, about a mile's distance from the modern town of Castle Douglas, on a rock surrounded by the river Dee—a mouldering memorial of the powerful family of Douglas. Many are the fearful legends attached to this stern tower of other times, and "this is of them."

LAING'S SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

MR LAING's new work, "A Tour in Sweden," would lose half its value if not viewed in connexion with his previous work, "A Residence in Norway." These acute and able productions may, in one sense, be said to have been composed to prove the vast superiority of a popular and liberal form of government, such as that established in Norway, over the superannuated or ill-adapted institutions of feudalism, which, though under the deceptive exterior of a constitutional king and a new dynasty, linger on in Sweden. If such was not Mr Laing's object, such is the effect of his books. It is to the United States of America that, for the last thirty years, so many travellers, philosophers, and speculative politicians have turned for facts to illustrate the advantages of a popular representative government; of a people solely governing themselves; having a direct and potent voice in the management of their own affairs; and thus securing to themselves a far larger measure of the varied blessings of life than is enjoyed by the mass of the people under the old systems of Europe. Those who deny that these results arise from political institutions, and ascribe them wholly to the abundance of fertile land in America, and the high price of labour, will yet be puzzled by the new case of Norway. Without crossing the Atlantic, Mr Laing has found the old and the new systems side by side, and in immediate contrast, in the Scandinavian peninsula; in kingdoms federally allied under the same sovereign, and within a few days' sail of our own shores. It is chiefly in this most important point of view that we intend to consider Mr Laing's travels in Norway and Sweden. The one kingdom, in his language, "received a new and liberal constitution, and has started with all the freshness of youth—a new nation, as it were, suddenly called into life from among the slumbering population of the North;" while Sweden, according to Mr Laing's observation, either sleeps on or degenerates. What are the causes of this remarkable discrepancy in the social and moral condition of two neighbouring countries, which have been for twenty-five years under the same crown, though with forms of government and social arrangements essentially dissimilar? That the difference exists, is fully established by his observations on both States; and must, indeed, be obvious to every traveller. The most striking difference—that which will most powerfully startle every foreigner, whatever be his theories of government—is, that a poor country like Sweden, neither manufacturing nor, to any great extent, commercial, and removed from the many corrupting influences which affect the population of despotic, warlike, and luxurious states, is, nevertheless, the most demoralized in Europe; or, at all events, equally demoralized with any known European kingdom. This alarming and unexpected affirmation is based upon statistical facts, and deduced from tabular statements, upon which Mr Laing appears to have bestowed very great pains and care; and figures and official returns are stubborn things, and not easily turned aside. There must be fallacy somewhere; and we believe it may partly lurk under a class of offences, known in Sweden, but which are not recognised in other countries; and that the crimes of blasphemy, quarrels and assaults between husbands and wives, parents and children, and a variety of offences which are not treated criminally in other states, go to swell out the apparently vast amount of crime in Sweden. But that it is, with all possible deductions, very great, and, in some classes of crime, enormous, cannot be disputed. Yet, in Sweden, elementary education is universal; newspapers, and cheap, instructive, and entertaining publications abound; and the best education which the country affords is enjoyed by a very large proportion of the higher and middle class, and all under the nobility. They despise science and learning, though some of the young nobility, we should hope, are being educated in foreign countries; as the numbers attending the native universities, as shewn by Mr Laing, are considerably fewer in proportion than the youth of the humbler classes. Sweden also enjoys the equivocal advantage of a numerous and powerful body of learned Lutheran State clergy; meddling with everything, and controlling many things, and electing from its own body one of the four Chambers of the Diet. The personal and diffusive influence of the clergy appears to exceed their direct power; and they are untroubled with dissent or schism; no plague and curse of Puritans, Independents, Methodists, Baptists, Papists, Seceders, &c. &c. being known in the undisturbed Zion of fortunate, if immoral Sweden. The clergy, though, as a body, comfortably maintained, are not, like some other spiritual corporations, too rich to be placed above labour. The annual income of the Archbishop of Upsala is the miserable pittance (for an Archbishop) of only £800; and the Swedish equivalent to our see of Durham—the richest see, Linköping—is only £560; the poorest Swedish bishops have an income of £250 a-year, and the stipends of the inferior clergy, reckoning the houses, tithes in grain, and other dues or perquisites, range from £70 to £100. A few lucky incumbents have more; but none are too wealthy to be working clergymen; and they are assisted in their efforts to instruct the people by universities and schools; or, in other words, by professors and teachers, so numerous that one person in every 126 individuals in Sweden (including, of course, the families of the teachers) is maintained by law, to teach the people their moral and religious duties; and yet the Swedes remain the most demoralized people in Europe! They commit, it would appear, more crimes, proportionately to their numbers, against person and property, even in the rural districts, than are known in the most depraved and luxurious capitals, or in the most densely peopled of our manufacturing towns. Mr Laing says, with great justice, that this is a curious fact in moral statistics. It is, indeed, so singular, that he would not, as a mere traveller, skimming on the surface of a foreign country, have felt himself justified in affirming it, if he could not have established it from the official returns of recent years. In 1835, the total population of Sweden was 2,983,144 persons, of whom only 14,925 are employed in factories; and, in the given year, one person in 114 of the whole nation had been accused, and one in every 140 convicted of some criminal offence. By the returns from 1830 to 1834, one person in every forty-nine of the inhabitants of the towns, and one in every 176 of the rural population, had been punished each year for criminal offences. The fact seems inexplicable. In Sweden there is no agrarian agitation—the tap-root of Irish crime—and no anti-tithe rebellions; there are no game-law trespassers; and the excise laws are not of a kind to offer a great bounty on their breach or evasion, and thus to constitute the numerous body of the conventional crimes of other countries. Nor, according to Mr Laing, are police offences taken into the account, which would materially alter the amount. In the neighbouring State of Norway, where conventional or unique offences are probably of much the same kind as in Sweden, in the year 1835, one person only out of every 457 was accused; and one out of every 662 convicted of criminal offence. Thus, the kingdoms of Europe where crime is highest and lowest in amount, are found side by side, and, in every circumstance, save the all-important one of political and social institutions, precisely similar, save that in soil, climate, and maritime coast, Sweden enjoys considerable physical advantages over her poor and hardy, but virtuous, intelligent, and independent sister. Whence, then, arises the lamentable difference in their moral and social condition? Mr Laing has not been able to account for it fully, though he unfolds many efficient and powerful causes. One, of universal operation, he finds in the state of the Church, with a learned theology, a ceremonial ritual, and no animating, vital religion; and in the swarming numbers of state-paid instructors. “Too many cooks spoil the broth,” he alleges; and the homely adage is, in this instance, confirmed by the facts.

It is very generally believed that, in the illicit connexion of the sexes, Paris is the most corrupted capital in Europe. In Paris, illegitimate births are as one in every five, and in the other towns of France, as one in every seven and a half; in London and Middlesex, there is one illegitimate birth to every thirty-eight legitimate births; and throughout all England and Wales, one to every nineteen; but in Stockholm, with a population of only 80,000 souls, and the capital of a country where education, so far as reading, and writing, and knowledge of the church catechisms, and of the ceremonies of the Lutheran ritual, extend, is universal—where there is a numerous and influential clergy, a sufficient body of teachers, and no dissent—the proportion of illegitimate births is one in every 21⁵/₀. The facts appear incredible; and well may Mr Laing affirm, that, “in no other Christian community, is there a state of female morals approaching to this.” In this one respect, Ireland with all its imputed, inherent vice, is allowed, even by its enemies, to be a pure country; but much more may be said for Ireland, in going over the entire catalogue of Swedish crime, real or conventional; and at this particular juncture, we have much pleasure in citing the result of one branch of Mr Laing’s statistical inquiries.

In despite, however, of the demoralizing effects of a mal-administration of law, and of religious and political discord and excitement to outrage, the Irish nation stands very far above the Swedish in the moral scale. In the nearly eight millions of the Irish, there are 5644 fewer commitments for criminal offences, and 8039 fewer convictions, within one year, than in the scarcely three millions of the Swedish nation. These are singular results, and very unexpected, when we consider the cuckoo cry, repeated until nothing else can be heard, of the crime, vice, and social disorganization of Ireland, which by common consent is placed at the very bottom of the list of civilized nations; while Sweden is as generally held to be a country eminently moral. I can see no mistake in the results drawn from these official statements, although they overturn all my former notions of the comparative morality of different states of society, and of different nations. It appears an unavoidable inference from them, that the moral condition of Sweden is extremely low.

As we continue to contemplate the picture, its shades deepen. “Why,” he inquires—

Should this city of 80,000 people be so remarkably demoralized, in an age when all other European communities are undoubtedly advancing rapidly in an opposite direction? No man, who recollects the state of our manufacturing or sea-port towns of similar size twenty-five or thirty years ago, will hesitate in saying that moral and religious feeling has advanced prodigiously during that period among our lower classes. Figures do not bring home to our imaginations the moral condition of a population so depraved as that of Stockholm. In such a society, the offspring of secret adultery, and the births merely saved from illegitimacy by the tardy marriage of the parents, must be numerous in proportion to the general profligacy. If it were possible to deduct these from the one side of the account and add them to the other, to which morally they belong, what a singular picture of depravity on a great scale this city presents! Suppose a traveller standing in the streets of Edinburgh, and able to say, from undeniable public returns, “one out of every three persons passing me is, on an average the offspring of illicit intercourse; and one out of every forty-nine, has been convicted within these twelve months of some criminal offence!”

It is quite in harmony with the low state of moral feeling in Sweden to hear of brothels being openly established in Stockholm within the last three years, under the paternal care of the State, as one of its many benevolent interferences for the protection of the property, health, and morals of its subjects! The leading principle of the Swedish government, a principle which is fast creeping in in more enlightened countries, and most insidiously in our own, is everything for the people, but nothing by the people; or, in plainer terms, everything the governors find most conducive for the promotion of their own objects and purposes. It was this principle which induced the Swedish government, which either interferes with or manages all concerns, to assume, like the Dutch, the care of the public women. The establishment opened in a hotel of a principal street of Stockholm for this purpose by the Government, has, however, been closed, not because the citizens of the metropolis were shamed out of vice, but because "the wretched women fell victims to the barbarity of the regulations." So here was inhumanity added to depravity.

Mr Laing—besides his pithy remark, that, in teaching the people their moral and religious duties, "too many cooks spoil the broth," and his low estimate of the personal religion of a body of clergy who are as profound theologians as any in Europe—takes many other elements into consideration in explaining the degraded state of morals in Sweden. One leading cause is the privileges of caste, placing numerous classes, and, in the aggregate, a very large number of the whole population, above the wholesome influence, and, as it were, above the care of public opinion acting as a guardian on the side of morality and as a check upon individual conduct. Every man, down to the mere agricultural labourer, finds impunity or countenance, either within the pale of his noble order, or his privileged guild or corporation. Every man belongs to

A privileged, or licensed class or corporation, of which every member is by law entitled to be secured and protected within his own locality, from such competition or interference of others in the same calling as would injure his means of living. It is, consequently, not as with us, upon his industry, ability, character, and moral worth, that the employment and daily bread of the tradesman, and the social influence and consideration of the individual, in every rank, even the highest, almost entirely depends; it is here, in the middle and lower classes, upon corporate rights and privileges, or upon license obtained from government; and in the higher, upon birth, and court or government favour. Public estimation, gained by character and conduct in the several relations of life, is not a necessary element in the social condition, even of the working tradesman. Like soldiers in a regiment, a great proportion of the people under this social system derive their estimation among others, and consequently their own self-esteem, not from their moral worth, but from their professional standing and importance. This evil is inherent in all privileged classes, but is concealed or compensated in the higher, the nobility, military, and clergy, by the sense of honour, of religion, and by education. In the middle and lower walks of life, those influences are weaker, while the temptations to immorality are stronger; and the placing a man's livelihood, prosperity, and social consideration in his station, upon other grounds than on his own industry and moral worth, is a demoralizing evil in the very structure of Swedish society.

In short, Mr Laing seems to imagine that what Mrs Grundy may think, is not to be altogether despised even in a free society. In adverting to the fact descanted upon and denounced by Miss Martineau—namely, that of the tyranny of public opinion rendering the free citizens of America virtual slaves and cowards, which she calls the great blemish of American society—he takes the opposite side of the question, and regards this voluntary or enforced subjection and tenderness about public opinion, which is remarked even in children in the United States, as the best trait of the American character. In a country where every man can easily obtain a living, and even wealth, independently of moral character, this excessive regard to the public opinion is undoubtedly an important auxiliary in the preservation of pure morals. Were it always an enlightened and sound public opinion to which the Americans pay this excess of deference, we should cordially subscribe to Mr Laing's doctrine; but, unfortunately, it is not always so. Public opinion is in nothing, at present, more strong and tyrannical in the United States, than on the question of colour, race, slavery, and in points of religious belief. Now, we apprehend that it is in matters of this sort only that Miss Martineau would approve revolt and the braving of public opinion.

The passion of the middle classes in Sweden for the paltry social distinctions conferred by the Executive, the excessive desire for bits of ribbon and trumpery crosses, instead of an honourable ambition for the three rewards of good conduct, self-respect, and the esteem of our fellow-creatures, is traced as another cause of the low state of moral feeling in Sweden; where the desire for these decorative gimcracks supersedes the nobler motives of legitimate ambition, while, farther, they are often obtainable only by the sacrifice of principle. The Brummagem or Burgher order of nobility in Sweden, is as numerous as in some of the German States, and with the same consequences to industry and morals. "With us," says Mr Laing—

With us, a thriving tradesman, master manufacturer, or merchant, would think himself little honoured, and as little benefited, by the empty title of counsellor of war, counsellor of conference, counsellor of commerce, or any such idle distinction, to which not a shadow of duty or utility is attached; and a knighthood is accepted by men in ordinary civil station, generally with repugnance, with an awkward feeling of its incongruity with our solid estimate of social distinction,* and rather because, in some public situations, from custom, it cannot be declined, than because it is coveted.

A people so fond of distinctions, must naturally prize their symbols, and every sort of title. This taste descends as far as possible in Swedish society; and Mr Laing was, at first, nearly getting into disgrace by such breaches of good manners, as calling a bookbinder's wife "Madam," when her proper title was the nobler Fru, or "My Lady;" as her husband, though it was his business to make portefeuilles, and not to carry them, held some nominal office, which entitled his wife to the coveted distinction of Fru, or Ladyship; while his daughter was entitled to be addressed as Fröken, or "Young My Lady." He took care afterwards how he addressed a shopkeeper's wife, simply as Madame. The barmaid is Ma'amsele, but the girl who waits, only the native Jomfru. The lowest title of all is the Flikka, or simple girl, which, probably, to the ears of a foreigner, sounds the prettiest among them. Mr Laing does not regard this nonsense as merely harmless vanity; nor does it appear, from the illustration which he has taken from the Swedish newspapers, to be so:—

* We always believed this, with here and there the exceptions of a city banker or a provincial mayor with a wife entertaining the noble ambition of being styled "My Lady," until science and literature were first in this country attempted to be made ridiculous by the infliction of the GUELPHIC ORDER upon a few not altogether unwilling victims.

The title of Excellence, or the Order of the Seraphim, are stated in their political views as serious objects and motives of action for public men in public affairs. The public mind must be in a state to accept of this as reasonable, or it would not be presented to it. The value of public opinion, of those positions beyond all titles or orders, which Pitt, Fox, Canning, O'Connell, take from it, is unknown and incomprehensible to them.

The demoralizing influence of the example of a dissolute court amidst a poor and idle population, is another alleged cause of the general immorality. The Swedes prided themselves on being the most polished northern nation—the French of the north; and the moral taint of the age of Louis XIV. and XV. is still visible in their manners. The imitation of French manners, like every imitation of what is worthless, outdid what it copied, and was not confined to the court circles and the highest classes; and, as these became impoverished and reduced in means to the level of the middle class, their vices descended with them, tainting the more respectable orders of the community. But the faults peculiarly characteristic of every aristocracy—as idleness, frivolity, the inordinate passion for amusement, gaming, gallantry, and a false estimate of the objects and aims of life—are not in the middle class to be treated as mere weaknesses, but as vice, either interfering with the performance of duty, or as violating its injunctions. Such appears to be the opinion of Mr Laing, and there is solid foundation for it. Every observer is familiar with the processes by which the spendthrift, or slenderly provided sons of our wealthy nobility, sometimes graduate into black-legs and sharpening gamblers, and is able to estimate the moral mischief which such men spread in society; but in Sweden there appears to be at all times a large body of descending noblesse, carrying down the faults of their caste into the bosom of society, which there are fostered into vices. The whole body consider trade and the learned professions as beneath the dignity of Swedish nobility; and science and literature, which are still in good esteem in France and England, are despicable in their eyes; while the Church is not wealthy enough to tempt their cupidity. By the public returns, it is seen that not so many as a half of the sons of the nobility attend the universities; though perhaps the exclusive principle may dictate that some of them shall be well educated at home, and a few may be sent to foreign universities. As a body, the nobility are described by our traveller in the following terms:—

They are generally sunk in debt and in poverty; and military service, and places about the court, or under government, are the only means of living which their pride and poverty can allow them to bring up their sons for. The inferior schools, or gymnasia, in each province, the military schools, and such institutions, give the kind of cultivation necessary for these professions. They dance well, dress well; have the appearance and manners of gentlemen in an eminent degree; are musical, converse well, and in general know a little of French, German, and English; but with all these accomplishments, they are often ignorant and unprincipled. Much of the immorality of Sweden proceeds, directly or indirectly, from the want of education and conduct in this class.

In another place, he remarks that "they are, with few exceptions, extremely poor, living from civil or military employments, with small pay; or on their farms in great obscurity and poverty. Everything in the capital is in a corresponding style. The metropolis—which, at first view, appears magnificent, from the great number of public buildings, monuments, statues, the palace, which is the finest in Europe, and the spacious well-built quays—contains very few good houses, and few private carriages. The population is declining; the deaths in Stockholm considerably outnumbering the births. Yet the appearance of the street population appears to contradict the general misery and poverty of the metropolis. Mr Laing's reasoning on the delusive appearances held out by so many well-dressed people, might be applied to many towns besides Stockholm. It really proves nothing against the extreme poverty of the Liberties of Dublin, for example, that very fine shops and carriages, and richly dressed ladies and gentlemen, are seen in numbers in the fashionable streets. The gay appearance of these may, on the contrary, be generally held as a certain indication of the misery of another class existing in immediate contiguity.

The number of well-dressed people proves only that one class is well off; and, if supported by the public, is by far too numerous for the well-being of the country. The Swede also has a remarkable fondness for dress; and dresses well, converses well, dances well, has ease and elegance about him in stations in which in other countries people would be totally devoid of such accomplishments. This is the influence of a court in a small city. To appear well is their law of existence. I account in this way for the discrepancy of great poverty and distress, and a declining condition, established by statistical facts, amidst finery and apparent luxury of clothing in the streets of this city.

The domestic arrangements correspond with real poverty and the love of show. The houses of Stockholm, and also those of Christiania, the capital of Norway, have, in general, common stairs; the suite of rooms on a floor forming one dwelling. In the house where Mr Laing found lodgings, which was near the palace, and, for the country, expensive, and hence presumed to be in a fashionable situation, and in all houses of the kind which he examined, the furniture and paper were flashy, but not substantial; but the lustres, mirrors, sofas, and French engravings, scarcely atoned to an Englishman for the absence or inferior quality of the thousand and one comforts which he has learned to consider as necessities—such as, window-blinds, bed-curtains, wash-hand stands and their furniture, chests of drawers, and such like things. The houses of public entertainment are few, the wants of the permanent inhabitants being supplied by one club-house for the nobility, and another for the mercantile nobility, or privileged class of traders. The table-d'hôte of the Swedish capital is neither so well provided nor so well attended as are those of France and Germany; for, in Stockholm, as Irish provincial ladies say, the different classes "don't mix."

Political profligacy is another of the combined causes adduced for the debased moral state of Sweden. It was not the mob, not low seditious ruffians, who, either from base or sordid motives, prompted or accomplished the assassination of Gustavus III., and the murder of Count Fersen, or the more ignoble, if not blacker crime of selling the succession of their native kingdom to a foreigner; but political adventurers of a higher class, to whom the nobility offered no opposition. We must now cite Mr Laing in full, leaving him to be responsible for the boldness of his own opinions:—

Another cause I conceive to be, that, although Luther's reformation found the minds of men in part of Germany, Switzerland, Holland, England, and Scotland, prepared for it, and demanding a form of Christianity more intellectual, more addressed to the understanding, and less to the senses, than that of the Roman Catholic Church, the public mind in Sweden was in no such advanced state. The change was the act of government, connected, apparently, with the policy of the new dynasty, and supported by an enlightened few, and by the inferior resident clergy—not averse to be relieved from celibacy and other restraints; but the public mind appears to have been in a state of apathy in that age, on religious concerns. No sects, schisms, preachings, meetings, publications, indicate such a ferment in the public mind here, at the time of the Reformation, as in England, Scotland, and other countries. The resident Catholic clergy became, with few exceptions, Lutheran, and a few ceremonies less, a little difference in church forms, were all the changes which the mass of the people saw; for the public mind was not advanced so far as to appreciate the difference of doctrine. Gustavus I. always denied that he had introduced a new doctrine; and at the beginning of John III.'s reign, says Geyer, the people did not know but that they were still Catholics, singing Swedish mass. The country is too extensive, and too thinly peopled, even at the present day, for the effective diffusion of religious knowledge, or the spread of zeal, by preachings or the press. As far as regards the influence of religion on morals and conduct in private life, I conceive the Reformation has not worked beneficially in Sweden. It found the public mind dormant, and sensible to nothing in religion, but the external observances of a ceremonial church, and was superinduced on it in that state, and in that state it remains. In no country are the exterior forms and decencies of public worship better attended to. The churches are substantial, and not merely well kept up, but even decorated inside and outside; and there is a kind of competition between parishes, for erecting elegant structures for public worship. The clergy are fairly endowed, well lodged, and in general on good terms with their flocks; they are also well educated men, and form a body of great power in the state, the Chamber of Clergy being one of the constituent parts of the Diet. Yet, with all these exterior signs of a religious state of the public mind, and with all the means of a powerful church establishment, unopposed by sect or schism, to make it religious, it is evident, from the official returns of crime, that in no Christian community has religion less influence on the state of public morals. The just inference is, that no spirit, truly religious, has ever been generally kindled in this country; that the Reformation, as far as regards the moral condition of the Swedish people, has done harm rather than good, for it has merely substituted one ceremonial church for another; and that which it supplanted, if considered apart from religious doctrine or sentiment, and merely as an establishment for the check of immorality in private conduct, by its observances and rules, was, of the two, the more effective system of moral police over a rude and ignorant people. Rude and ignorant as the Irish Catholic population are, their priesthood keeps them free from such a list of heavy crimes as Lutheran Sweden presents from her rural population alone, in numbers little exceeding 2,735,000 souls.

The religious and moral condition of a Protestant country, with a large body of working clergy and schoolmasters appointed and maintained by the State, and where dissent is unknown, is matter of earnest inquiry at this particular juncture; so we are tempted to examine more closely the blessings which such a state of things is supposed to introduce and maintain in communities. We have noticed that, in Sweden, one person out of every 126 is maintained by the public to teach the people their religious and moral duties. And, first—

The clerical establishment costs the congregations 1,780,393 banco dollars; viz. the ministers 1,309,489 dollars, the assistants or chaplains 284,090, and the clerks or church servants 186,814 dollars, in direct payment in tithes, &c.—and a great, but not appreciable amount, in dues or offerings, at marriages, baptisms, funerals, Easter, Christmas, and sacramental occasions. These are very oppressive. The people are, in fact, as superstitious and priest-ridden as in the darkest ages, on many points; as, for instance, on having at burials a spoonful or two of consecrated earth, taken up by the priest, and strewed upon the grave before it is closed. The sexton gravely presents the shovel full or basket full of earth, and the priest as gravely takes a spoon or little spade, like a child's plaything, and dips it into the earth, and sprinkles about a handful of it on the grave; and this piece of mummery is thought absolutely necessary for the peace of the soul of the departed, and is highly paid for. . . . In many provinces, this payment of a cow, or its value, to the pastor on the death of a peasant, is matter of legal right claimed by the clergy. The payment of these offerings is so much considered a part of religious duty, that Lestadius [a missionary who has recently been telling tales out of school] calls one occasion, at Easter, I think, a cheese fair, rather than a religious meeting; and says that some of the people perform their devotions by proxy, and send their cheeses by a neighbour. These are but trifling isolated circumstances, but as they drop from a zealous missionary merely in the course of his narrative, and not as matters wrong, unusual, or of censure, they throw a light upon the relations of the clergy and the people. . . . The dues, fees, and rights, however oppressive these appear to us, are sanctioned by long use and wont, among a peasantry in whom a sense of property is almost extinguished by the exactions upon their time, labour, and produce, for the state and its institutions. It is only what is left to the peasant out of his land, not what he produces, that he views and feels to be his own. The interest of the parties, the tithe-payers and the tithe-receivers, produce therefore less animosity of feeling than with us; or, properly speaking, none. The clergy also, and the people, appear to me to view Christianity altogether in a different light from that in which we view it. It is a different species of religion here. This is a subject on which I give my impressions with reluctance, from the difficulty in explaining them. The Swedish clergy are, beyond doubt, a highly-educated body of theologians. The people also are educated, up to a certain point; which is, that of being able to read, and give proof of understanding the church catechism so well as to be entitled to confirmation, and to be received as communicants. Here the working of the establishment on the people seems to stop. A careful attendance upon all the ceremonials of the church; the saints' days or prayer days, or church-festival days; the high mass; the forms of baptisms, churchings, sacraments, funerals; the decorations of the church and altar, and of the priest's robes; the Easter offerings, Christmas offerings, and such observances—appear to stand in the place of all mental exertion or application, on their part, in religious matters, after they have once, if I may use the expression without offence, taken out their diploma as Christians, by the rite of confirmation, and by receiving their first communion. Religion seems to rest here. Whoever well attends to the course of conversation among our middle and lower classes at the present day, will hear a great deal of religious discussion and argument, which, whether to the purpose or not, have the use at least of unfolding and invigorating the mental powers and spirit of inquiry. Here, if by any chance a religious subject is started in the conversation of the same classes, it is—how well, or how ill, pastor A. masses, (that is, chants high mass;) how solemnly pastor B. performed such a service; how grand this church or that altar looked; the sermon you never hear discussed among them at all. The Lutheran Church, in fact, is, in the present age, as far behind the religious wants of mankind, as the Catholic Church was in the days of Luther.

It is somewhat discouraging to the believers in the infallibility of reading and writing, and the regular observance of religious duties, to learn that, while profligacy of manners abounds, every Swedish peasant must be able to shew that he can read and write, and that he understands the principles of religion, before he is permitted to take the Sacrament of the Supper; which is again an indispensable step before either man or woman is permitted to marry. Does not Mr Laing, in this ridiculous restraint—one among the infinity of restrictions placed upon the free action and the free industry of the Swedish people—find another cause for the prevailing licentiousness?

In a remote and primitive part of the north of Sweden, where Mr Laing spent part of the summer of 1838, and to which we shall afterwards trace him, he accidentally discovered a small body of worshippers—Dissenters—who he hopes may yet form the germ of the religious and moral renovation of Sweden. The whole scene is, to our feelings, singularly impressive and captivating.

July.—I got up very early this morning, and went down to the rapids, or fors of the river, to fish. I came unexpectedly upon a party of six or eight men, women, and young people, gathered in a snug hollow of the river bank, which only an angler would have thought of visiting at so early an hour. One man, with his hat off, was reading the Bible to the others, and just concluding and shutting the book. They seemed in a little confusion, until they saw that I was fishing, and taking no notice of them. When my landlord came to join me with his fishing rod, and they found that I was lodging with him, and not at the manse—and they asked the question—they seemed pleased, and came to admire my tackle, and my great success, for I was picking up the small fish—guinard or sisk, and trout of the size of herrings—sometimes two at once. There is, I had heard, a religious enthusiasm spreading itself in the north of Sweden, especially among these colonists or new settlers in Lapland, which the clergy attempt to put down and extinguish. These religionists are called Læsere—the readers—from their reading the Scriptures, and must keep themselves quiet; because, although they cannot be openly persecuted, and there is an enlightened and liberal public in Sweden, who would be reuced if any person were openly oppressed on account of his religious opinions, yet where the clergyman is all-powerful in his parish, and has the public functionaries to support him, there are many ways of making the poor man, who presumes to have either too much or too little religious zeal to suit the pastor, feel in his worldly concerns the ill consequences of wandering from the beaten church road. These Læsere do not form a sect having communications or internal regulation, which would probably expose them to the law, but they are numerous and increasing, and their preachings and meetings are attended by people from great distances. Of their peculiar doctrines I could get no distinct account: it is said that they preach the efficacy of faith alone, and the uselessness of good works; that some of their leaders have given themselves out as Christ to their followers; but the truth is, the distance between the upper class and the lower in Sweden is so great, the points of meeting so few, and no connecting links between, that the former do not know what the latter are about. This is very much the case, even with us, notwithstanding our numerous middle class. The upper classes talk and form opinions of the lower, without sufficient data, or knowing in reality their condition. In Sweden, where all society is classed and privileged into distinct corps, the higher are strangers to those below them, in a greater degree than in other countries. I doubt, therefore, the Swedish accounts of these Læsere, or their doctrines, especially as there is a tasteless attempt to ridicule them, and their affected use of scriptural phraseology. There may be hypocrites among them, and many langable personages and pretensions, but still it is a remarkable fact, that in this least depraved quarter of the country, a spirit is arising in religious concerns, which the Lutheran clergy are attempting to suppress, and which their own preaching and doctrines cannot satisfy. It will necessarily extend its influence over the morals and habits of the people. . . . It was a party of these Læsere, sitting like our Cameronians, in the hollow of the river bank, that I came upon this morning. I afterwards asked my landlord what all the people were doing so early at the river side. He assured me they only came there to drink the waters of a mineral spring which were very wholesome; he shewed me a little well in the neighbourhood, and I was satisfied.

Lapmark and these forlorn and far-between new colonies in its forests, are not the least interesting points of the Swedish dominions, while some of the settlements and small towns bordering the Gulf of Bothnia, are, from their close resemblance to Norway, in the manners and condition of the inhabitants, the most pleasing to the reflecting sojourner of any he sees in Sweden. Perhaps, therefore, the sooner we leave grave and melancholy, although instructive speculations upon vicious social arrangements and bad government—producing misery, and its sure attendant, a low state of morals—in other words, a discussion on political and moral cause and effect—our readers will be the better pleased; and there is a vast fund of entertainment, of a delightful kind, in these travels.

In the summer of 1834, Mr Laing went to Norway, in different parts of which he resided for about two years. He was charmed with all he saw, and finally and deliberately concluded the Norwegians the happiest people in Europe—the happiest people, indeed, in the world; for he considers the state of society there better, in many respects, than in America, and he imputes this mass of social happiness, found in a poor, uncommercial, northern country, solely to its institutions, and to the purely democratic form of the constitution which it gained for itself in 1814, when Norway was, at the general peace, transferred from Denmark to Sweden, in lieu of Finland, ceded by the latter to Russia. Norway, if nominally a monarchical state, is essentially a democracy. The feudal system was never introduced into it. Its peasantry have always been free, and its government representative, since it ceased to be personal. The Norwegian proprietors hold by no tenure; the present udal laws having always existed, which secures to every man his property without service or acknowledgment to any superior whatever. The Norwegian peasantry have been most tenacious of their precious and distinguishing rights, and, are accordingly, jealous of their infringement. Hence the late dissensions, or tendency to dissension, as often as their new sovereign has attempted to undermine their ancient institutions, or amalgamate their peculiar system with that of Sweden, and that which is found in the other monarchies of Europe.

A main feature in Norwegian society is, the extensive diffusion of landed property, and the general equality which is maintained by the smallness of the estates. In a population of rather less than a million, there are about 41,656 landed proprietors. By Mr Laing's estimate, one man in every twenty-two is a landed proprietor in Norway, and in Scotland only one man in every 700 of the population. It is needless to say that where feudal tenures do not exist, the law of primogeniture is unknown. Yet it is an important fact that the small Norwegian estates are not found divided and sub-divided, and frittered away, in the manner of which one sect of political economists have tried to make a bugbear. The farms or estates of the Norwegian yeomen, statesmen, or udallers, contain, in general, from forty to sixty acres of arable land, with a considerable adjoining tract of wood and natural pasturage, and a distant mountain range, used in summer, for grazing, after the custom of the Highlands of Scotland, Switzerland, and other pastoral countries. The sub-division of the little estates is provided against, by a law called the odelsbaarn ret, which gives all the children of the family, and the next of kin, according to the order of consanguinity, the right of redeeming it by repayment of the purchase-money and any outlay in improvements, if the right is claimed within five years from the time the estate was sold. The law of succession thus prevents landed property from being accumulated in large masses, as in other countries, or yet from being too far subdivided; but, whatever be the cause, the fact is incontrovertible, that the udal estates are, if seldom augmented, more rarely if ever frittered down into potato gardens and paddocks. In describing a Yule Fair held at Levanger, near which town Mr Laing lodged, with a small proprietor, during the winter of 1834-5, he remarks that, during the fair, which is held for three weeks, and to which flocked persons of all descriptions—remote country proprietors, to sell or barter their dairy produce, horses, &c.; seamen, in small vessels, with salted fish, and goods of all kinds, from Drontheim; and to which there was a constant arrival of caravans of sledges from the frontiers of Russia, and of Laplanders—in short, a very great concourse of people of different countries and languages, supplied with spirits in abundance at 14d. a gallon; there was little excessive drunkenness, no rioting, and only one case of theft. And he thus concludes:—
'The division of property among the children has not, in the course of a thousand years, brought the fair-going people in Norway to the state of the fair-going people in Ireland."

Though the estates of individuals are, in general, small, they are sufficient to furnish all the comforts and many of the elegances of life, as these are understood in Norway. The whole nation is well lodged; better than any other people in Europe, according to Mr Laing; and they are well fed, well clothed in their own household manufactures, and have abundant fuel. Leisure, ease of mind—those inestimable blessings gradually vanishing from more active, wealthy, and polished communities—are largely enjoyed by all the Norwegians. Nor are these blessings confined to one class. The housemen, or married labourers, and the workmen of all descriptions, are in a much better condition than the same class in other countries. When we speak of more polished communities, we do not mean a people really better bred—for the Norwegians of all ranks have nearly the same manners and language, and all are polite, kind, and courteous in their domestic intercourse, as well as in society. The rough and brutal way in which our peasantry and workmen talk to and treat each other, are unknown in Norway. They have not two sets of manners—one for company and the other for the fire-side. Every one pulls off his hat or cap whether to friends or strangers; common labourers, private soldiers, and fishermen, salute each other; and the children, scrupulously taught respectful manners, bow to each other in the streets. Almost every Norwegian plays on some instrument; and the nation is fond of dancing, to which social pastime their long winter nights and easy friendly habits are peculiarly favourable. Certain dandy, and even philosophical travellers, have represented the condition of the women of Norway as lower than in the corresponding class in other European countries. Mr Laing draws from the same data a quite opposite conclusion; and we believe that the opinions of the best-informed and most thoughtful women, in these more polished countries, will confirm his judgment. The women of Norway, from the arrangements of society—arrangements which are the groundwork of the entire system of superior social happiness which is found there—having a higher sphere of duty, perform a more useful and consequently a more dignified part. The secondary objects of music, dancing, and dressing, are considered as the ornament, the relief, not the main business of woman's life; business, by the way, which becomes as insupportable drudgery to its bond-slaves as the domestic employments of the Norwegian females. The condition of the farm-labourers is characteristic of the country. They have good roomy cottages, generally situated on the outskirts of the small estates, with grass for two cows, and half-a-dozen sheep and goats. They hold this little farm for two lives, that of the cottar and his widow, under a fixed obligation of furnishing so many days' labour in the year on the main farm, at a certain rate of wages, and with victuals, which are good and abundant, and the wages equal to those of many parts of Ireland. The labourer is entitled to throw up his holding, by giving three months' previous notice; but his employer has no power to turn him out, so long as the stipulated rent, or work-rent, is paid. What a grand step would this small one be in improving the condition of the Irish peasantry! The sons and daughters of these housemen form the domestic servants of the country; a class represented by the traveller as active, and neat, and respectful, without servility. They are all well fed. The Norwegians, of all classes, take four or even five meals a-day. The workman's day begins with a cake of oat or bear bread, with butter, and a dram of the brandy distilled on every estate. At nine they have, for breakfast, milk or soup, and bread and butter; or pottage and milk, with oat-cakes; and make a substantial meal. At noon they have dinner of herring, potatoes, and barley-broth with bread; or, bacon, salt-meat, and black puddings, instead of fish. The work-people eat meat at least twice a-week. In the evening they have another substantial meal, similar to their breakfast, and a dram. And as there is neither want nor restraint on the use of spirits, and as they might have more drams if they wished for them, they never exceed the customary quantity. Their oatmeal is inferior to that used by the Scottish labourer; but they have much greater variety, and plenty of other kinds of food. The bothy described by Cobbett, and the disgrace of so many magnificent Scottish corn manufactories, will ill bear comparison with the Norwegian Borstue, or unmarried servant's house, which is better than many of the farm-houses in the north of Scotland. It consists of a large well-lighted sitting-room, with a good stove, benches, chairs, and table. A kitchen adjoins, for cooking and washing; and the upper story is divided into bed-rooms, each with a window. The coarse, primitive bedding is put out to air in a covered gallery every day—indeed, this seems a universal practice; and every Saturday the Norwegian bothy is thoroughly washed, and the floors sprinkled with the tops of the juniper, exactly as in the most magnificent saloons of the country. A maid-servant regularly attends to cook and clean for the inhabitants of the bothy. The labourers in Scottish bothies, described by Cobbett, are exactly in the condition of the buccaneers and wood-choppers of Honduras Bay described by Dampier, save that they have no butcher-meat, which the buccaneers had in abundance. The rooms of the bothy or Borstue, whether parlour or chambers, are "as warm, cheerful, and clean as those of the main house." In the large room, the tailor, shoemaker, and harness-maker, and such other tradesmen as in this primitive country go round from farm to farm to work, execute their business. In respect of bedding and bed-clothes, Mr Laing remarks that the working-class are better off with us, as the Norwegians, instead of woven rugs and blankets, have only fells—that is, dressed skins of sheep, goats, and reindeer,
